Page 3, line 2, after the word "or" insert "who have enlisted for service with Czecho-Slovac, Polish, or other independent forces attached to the United States Army or to the army."

Mr. STAFFORD. So it will read——

The Clerk read as follows:

Shall be readmitted if it is proved the disability was acquired while the alien was serving in the military forces of the United States or of any one of the nations or who have enlisted for service with Czecho-Slovak, Polish, or other independent forces attached to the United States Army or to the army," etc.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. MEEKER. May I ask if the chairman of the committee will allow that time to be consumed, so that he can close debate if he so desires?

Mr. BURNETT. What is that?

Mr. MEEKER. I presume the gentleman would like to close debate.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as I some time ago had offered to give time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], that he be permitted to proceed for three minutes and then be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD. That will save two minutes of time for the chairman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman is yielding the gentleman three minutes?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; and I request that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] be permitted to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I intend to offer, on page 2, line 9, if I have an opportunity, after the word "Czecho-Slovak," the word "Jugo-Slav," and after the word "Polish," the words "Slavic Legion." It may be, and I think it is, that the present wording of the bill takes in both of these Army units, but think it better to make it more definite.

We do not hear so much these days, Mr. Speaker, about the scum of southern Europe as we used to hear. This war has proven what many of us have claimed, that if war came the foreign born would fight as loyally for the United States as our native born.

Many of our foreign born who became American citizens refused to go back to fight for the land of their birth, but they have not refused to fight for the land of their adoption.

These men of the Jugo-Slavs, these men of the Czecho-Slavs, and the Poles, are fighting to-day with a "noose around their necks." As is well known, these natives of Austria-Hungary know that in case of capture they will not be treated as prisoners of war but as deserters from the Austrian Army.

They also know that if word gets back to Austria and Hungary that they are fighting against Austria-Hungary, that their mothers and fathers and other relatives will be punished as well.

One of the glorious pages of the war is the march of the Czecho-Slavs through Russia and Siberia, but the fighting done by the Jugo-Slav Army will fill just as glorious a page when the world knows what these men did.

After the collapse of the military power of Russia, the Jugo-Slav Army in Russia—formed principally of men who had deserted from the Austro-Hungarian Army—was removed from the Russian chaos and by way of Archangel, England, France, and the Mediterranean was sent to the Saloniki front.

The Prince Regent of Serbia, commander in chief of the Serbian Army, ordered the formation of a special Jugo-Slav division, in which the former subjects of Austria-Hungary were placed, and in which these Jugo-Slavs have fought ever since.

This Jugo-Slav division uses not only the Serbian flag but also the Croatian and Slovenian flags, and is thereby to be considered to be the first unit of what we all hope will be the future army of Jugo-Slavia.

Shortly after the Jugo-Slav Army left Russia for the Saloniki front, another strong Jugo-Slav volunteer contingent left Russia by way of Siberia, Vladivostok, and the Suez Canal for Saloniki. This contingent numbered upon its arrival at its destination 4,800 men and officers.

From the beginning of the war a great number of Jugo-Slavs who were forced to serve in the Austrian Army but who surrendered to their brothers, the Serbians, joined the Serbian Army as volunteers and fought with it. These men also fight with a noose around their throats. Thousands of these brave volunteers perished during the Serbian retreat through the mountains of Albania. After this tragic collapse the remnants of these volunteer troops were reorganized and also sent to the Saloniki front.

Three thousand five hundred Jugo-Slav volunteers came from Russia by way of Roumania and also joined the Serbian Army. They also participated in the great retreat through Albania, and are now, in a large majority, fighting on the front at Saloniki.

To these must be added the contingents from both North and South America and from Australia. The United States has sent about 5,000 Jugo-Slav volunteers, many have gone from South America, and 550 from far-off New Zealand and Australia. These men all represent the true revolutionary spirit of the Jugo-Slavs in Austria-Hungary, who are in revolt against their oppressors and have been for hundreds of years.

During the campaign of this month in Macedonia the Jugo-Slav division was in action and scored a great success, taking the massif of Kozjak, one of the most important points in the present offensive. Accordingly, we can consider the recent campaign in Macedonia as an actual proof of the successful belligerency of the Jugo-Slavs.

On the Italian front 30,000 Jugo-Slavs surrendered to the Italian armies. These prisoners of war are now being organized into a Jugo-Slav Army, and the organization is almost accomplished. Most of this work has been accomplished through the Jugo-Slav committee.

Hatred of Austria-Hungary and boundless devotion to the ideals of national independence thoroughly pervade the army, and they are all anxiously waiting for the day when the advancing Serbian and Jugo-Slav Armies will clear Serbia of the enemy and then march victoriously through the other Jugo-Slav lands.

The Jugo-Slavs are fighting on still another front, the eastern or Russian front. The bulk of the Jugo-Slav troops left Russia when the Bolshevists came to power, but small Jugo-Slav units remained in Russia, where they now have a great chance to perform a historic task.

About 5,000 of them started from Odessa on the Black Sea, continued fighting, and succeeded in reaching the northern sea. On reaching Samara these Jugo-Slavs put an end there to the Bolshevik anarchy and installed their own authority, but soon afterwards they left for Archangel.

Many thousands of Jugo-Slavs are now cooperating with the Czecho-Slovaks in Russia and are under the command of Col. Marinkovitch, fighting against the Bolshevists. A contingent of 3,000 Jugo-Slav volunteers participated at the capture of Vladivostok.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of foreign-born Jugo-Slavs who are now fighting in our armies under the Stars and Stripes against the power in whose dominion they were born.

When the Slavic Legion is formed, as per page 27 of the last Army appropriation bill, there will be thousands more of Jugo-Slavs fighting under the American Flag.

I agree with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] said a little while ago, that the Jugo-Slavs should be acknowledged the same as the Czecho-Slavs, and seeing that the conflicting claims of Italy and the Jugo-Slavs have been adjusted, I trust and hope that their recognition will come at a very early day.

I hope that the United States will be the first to recognize their aspirations. It will mean a good deal for us, not only over here but over there.

I have here a copy of a resolution that I introduced some time ago which explains what the Jugo-Slavs are striving for and what they hope to obtain:

House resolution 384.

Whereas the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, known under the collective name of Jugo-Slavs, a people inhabiting part of the southeastern region of Europe, occupying principally Serbia, Montenegro, Dalmatia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, part of Istria, Carniola, Gorizia, southern Hungary, southern Styria, and Carinthia, part of the Littoral, which for centuries past have been known as a people of culture and one possessing all the qualities and conditions necessary for the creation of a strong State and for the realization of national progress, and which, thanks to these qualities, have in the past had their own independent States; and

Whereas the Jugo-Slavs, more by intrigue and fraud than by force of arms, were subjugated by the Germans and Magyars, who still hold all the power in the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, by which the Jugo-Slavs are economically exploited, deprived of all political rights, and culturally neglected; and

Whereas the Jugo-Slavs, through the geographical situation and the natural wealth of the countries they inhabit, and particularly through their many qualities, which prove them to be a people of great moral and physical force—as they have demonstrated in the present war—appear to be predestinated to become the living wall against the Germanic invasion of the East: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the national aspirations of the Jugo-Slavs shall find not only earnest and sincere sympathy from the United States of America but also the well-deserved help in their struggle for national liberation and unification, in order that by joining the ranks of the free peoples they may become the defenders of peace and participants in its benefits, a peace which shall guarantee to all the peoples the right of national existence, freedom, and progress.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I know the interest of the gentleman from Michigan in the worthy aspirations of the heroic Serbians, Croatians, and the other Jugo-Slavs, and I thoroughly agree with him.

Now, is it not a fact that the formation of a strong and independent Jugo-Slav State would break the spine of that gigantic imperial enterprise which Germany calls mittel Europa? Would not the recognition of the Jugo-Slavs by the United States Government be a most important step toward the establishment of conditions after the war which will remove a real threat to our own welfare and security?

And is it not also a fact that the immediate formation of the Slavic Legion and its assignment to the Balkans or Saloniki front would be of immense value at this time?

Recognizing that the gentleman speaks with authority on these little-understood questions, I should like to have his views on this phase of it.

Mr. JAMES. There is no doubt but that the formation of a Jugo-Slav nation would do more than any other one thing to absolutely destroy all dreams of a "mittel Europa," as it would separate Germany and Austria from their allies, Turkey and Bulgaria. As I have often said, we might as well go further and drive Turkey out of Europe and cut down the size of Bulgaria.

If we go ahead with our plans for a Slavic Legion, which I believe the War Department is now working on, and if we send them to the Saloniki front—the logical front to send this Slavic Legion—it will be of untold value for the United States and the allies in starting "a back fire" in Austria and Hungary. When this Slavic Legion get into Austria, though enemy soil, they will be in the lands of their friends, many of whom will be glad to join in the fight. On account of the late successes in the Balkans, if there was a call for volunteers for the Slavic Legion now it would create great enthusiasm among the Jugo-Slavs, and thousands of them would volunteer at once. I believe that now "is the time to strike."

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think that in all justice these men, who are fighting for the same glorious cause and for the same rights and principles as we are, ought to be readmitted, and I am sure that this bill will be passed by a unanimous vote.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 3, line 1, after the word "disability," insert "did not arise from his own misconduct and," so that it will read "or mental defect, shall be readmitted if it is proven that the disability did not arise from his own misconduct and was acquired while the alien was serving in the military forces of the United States," etc.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I am in cordial sympathy with the purpose which underlies this resolution. The question is, whether its language goes further than is desirable. I have read with approval the letter of the Secretary of State, which is made the basis of the committee report. The Secretary's letter, dated September 6, says:

I am sure you will agree with me that it would work a serious injustice on the aliens who will doubtless return to their own country for military service under the provisions of these conventions if after the termination of the war they were to be confronted with the provision of the existing immigration law which would prevent their readmission to the United States because of wounds or other disabilities incurred in the line of service in the common cause.

In other words, the Secretary of State wants to arrange by this legislation for the readmission of otherwise inadmissible aliens only if they shall have incurred wounds or other disabilities in the line of service in the common cause. It is an extraordinary relief which the Congress of the United States proposes by this legislation to hold out to men who go abroad, who fight in foreign armies, and who desire to return to the United States in spite of the provisions of our immigration laws. I believe it is a proper relief, but a relief which should be carefully safeguarded.

Now, the question comes naturally and inevitably whether we shall extend this relief to everybody for every kind of disability which he picks up on the other side, or whether we shall limit the relief, as the Secretary of State desires, in favor of men who have been wounded or who have incurred disabilities in fighting for the cause which America has made its own. I submit that the Secretary of State is right and that the bill is wrong. And it is to overcome what seems to me this very vital defect in the bill that I have offered this amendment.

Suppose an alien goes abroad and fights in the Italian Army and contracts venereal disease, or becomes a syphilitic. That has no relation to the work of a soldier, nor to the cause for which we struggle to-day. Yet this bill as it stands will allow that man to come back to America. Let us limit the relief. Let us say, as my amendment proposes, that he may come back provided the disability did not arise from his own misconduct.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have another amendment which I will ask unanimous consent to present at this time for consideration after the debate is over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 2, line 15, after the word "authorities," insert "to return to the United States."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the provision as it stands allows the alien to come back to the United States provided he has been honorably discharged or provided he has been granted a furlough. He may have a furlough of 3 days, or 6 days, or 20 days. He may take the period of his furlough to sneak off to the United States in violation of his military obligations. The amendment which I have just submitted simply requires that the furlough itself shall be the kind of furlough which authorizes him to return to the United States. No other furlough should give him the relief of this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. He would be a deserter if he got a furlough for 3 days or 6 days or 20 days and tried to come across.

Mr. ROGERS. If he got a furlough for 30 days he might succeed in getting to the United States in the period of the furlough. The purpose of the committee, as I understand from conversation with members, is that in case a furlough is given to the soldier to enable him to return to the United States for special medical treatment, there shall not be any barrier in the law. My suggestion is that the law should state in terms that the furlough, if it is to avail the alien, shall expressly authorize him to return to the United States.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, and also a committee amendment, to correct an error in the spelling of the word "Czecho."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SABATH: Page 2, line 5, after the word "military," insert the words "or naval."

Mr. SABATH. And the same amendment, on page 3, line 2, after the word "military," insert "or naval."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman had also a typographical amendment. Let him get that out of the way.

Mr. SABATH. I ask unanimous consent to change the spelling of the word "Czecko" by inserting an "h" instead of a "k." That is on line 8 of page 2, the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SABATH: Page 2, line 8, in the word "Czecko," strike out the letter "k" and insert in lieu thereof the letter "h."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the modification be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the modification indicated be made. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer two amendments and have them considered as pending.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 3, line 2, after the word "or," insert "who have enlisted for service with Czecho-Slovak, Polish, or other independent forces attached to the United States Army, or to the army."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 3, line 1, after the word "disability," insert "did not arise from his own misconduct and."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROGERS) there were 11 ayes and 34 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 2, line 15, after the word "authorities," insert "to return to the United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 50 ayes and no noes.

So the resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. BURNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BURNETT, Mr. STAFFORD, and Mr. ROGERS were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

PROTECTION OF THE TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, may be recognized to call up the bill H. R. 12976 for consideration under the general rules of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] be recognized to call up a bill, H. R. 12976, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads at this time for consideration under the general rules of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is this one of the measures for which a rule has been granted by the committee and was to be in order following this resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is one of the measures concerning which the Committee on Rules has reported a resolution.

Mr. WALSH. And this is the regular order in which it was to be considered?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There was no arrangement in the Committee on Rules touching the order. There was an agreement made among different Members after the resolution had been agreed upon, and it was agreed, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this should be next in order. It was agreeable to everybody.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not expect to bring up any other rule after this is considered to-day?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, we may bring a rule up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I could not give the gentleman any assurance as to that; I do not know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12976) providing for the protection of the users of the telephone and telegraph service and the properties and funds belonging thereto during Government operation and control.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if there will be no reading of the bill, then I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever during the period of governmental operation of the telephone and telegraph systems of the United States by the Postmaster General, under the act of Congress approved July 16, 1918, and the proclamation of the President dated July 22, 1918, shall, without authority and without the knowledge and consent of the other users thereof, except as may be necessary for operation of the service, tap any telegraph or telephone line, or willfully interfere with the operation of such telephone and telegraph systems or with the transmission of any telephone or telegraph message, or with the delivery of any such message, or whoever being employed in any such telephone or telegraph service shall divulge the contents of any such telephone or telegraph message to any person not duly authorized or entitled to receive the same, shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 2. That whoever shall steal, purloin, embezzle, or without authority destroy any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of any telephone or telegraph system operated by the Postmaster General under the act of Congress approved July 16, 1918, and the proclamation of the President dated July 22, 1918, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 3. That whoever shall receive, conceal, or aid in concealing, or shall have or retain in his possession with intent to convert to his own use or gain any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of any telephone or telegraph system operated by the Postmaster General under the act of Congress approved July 16, 1918, and the proclamation of the President dated July 22, 1918, which has been embezzled, stolen, or purloined by any other person, knowing the same to be embezzled, stolen, or purloined, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, and such person may be tried either before or after the conviction of the principal defendant.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall forcibly break into, or attempt to break into, any telephone or telegraph office, or any building used in whole or in part as such telephone or telegraph office of any telephone or telegraph system operated by the Postmaster General under the act of Congress approved July 16, 1918, and the proclamation of the President dated July 22, 1918, with intent to commit in such telephone or telegraph office or building, or part thereof so used, any larceny or other depredation, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 5. That whoever shall assault any person having lawful charge, control, or custody of any money or property of any telephone or telegraph system operated by the Postmaster General under the act of Congress dated July 16, 1918, and the proclamation of the President dated July 22, 1918, with intent to rob, steal, or purloin such money or property, or any part thereof, or shall rob any such person of such money or property, or any part thereof, shall be imprisoned not more than five years; and if in the effecting or attempting to effect such robbery, he shall wound such person having custody of the money or property, or put his life in danger by the use of a dangerous weapon, shall be imprisoned not more than 10 years.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, by joint resolution, known as public resolution No. 38, approved July 16, 1918, the President of the United States was authorized to take possession, assume control, and operate all telephone and telegraph and marine cable lines and radio systems of the United States for the purpose of the war and during the period of the war. By his proclamation of July 22 possession was taken of the telegraph and telephone means of communication, and they are now being operated by the Government of the United States. This action on the part of the Congress and the President changed the status of the property of the telephone and telegraph companies, the title of the property being thereby separated from the right of possession, the possession being in the Government and the title remaining still in the telephone and telegraph companies. It is the judgment of the law officers of the Government that under this situation there is not sufficient, if indeed there is any, protection through Federal authority to the property of the telephone and telegraph companies, and this bill has been introduced for the purpose of protecting the users of those instrumentalities and also for the protection of the property itself. The first section of the bill provides that which is not provided now in any Federal law. It prohibits the tapping of the wires and prohibits the making known of any communication that is caught over the wires that is not authorized by law. The House will readily see the importance of this, particularly as to certain matters; that of preventing the public from securing Government information that comes through these systems of communication not only in our own country but from foreign countries. The first section of the bill covers questions of that character. The second section of the bill—I will not attempt to state numerically the sections but what they contain and give the substance of the bill—another section provides for a penalty for embezzlement of any funds that belong to the companies or to the Government and the larceny or purloining of any of the property of the Government. Still another section provides for the prevention under penalties of any person forcibly entering any building or office that is in whole or part used and occupied by telegraph and telephone companies for the purpose of the commission therein of a felony.

Still another section provides that when places of that sort are entered and an assault is made upon the employee of the Government that a penalty shall be attached to that offense. The bill has been read in full to the House, and I need not undertake to explain in detail the sections or give the exact language of them. The importance of the passage of a law of this sort is altogether apparent to every Member of the House. It is true that against the simple crime of larceny or embezzlement of postal funds, and so forth, the State law would afford a measure of protection and so would the Federal laws as to those things within the territory where the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction. While that may be true as to property in general still it is not desirable that the Federal Government within the States shall have to call upon the State authorities to protect its property or its employees or its interests. It should be done by a Federal statue and not in any sense left to doubt. The law officers of the Government are of the opinion that it is too serious a question to leave to doubt or to State protection. This is about all I think it necessary to say in reference to the bill. If any gentleman desires to discuss it I will retain the floor and yield him time for that purpose; if not, I will move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. ESCH. The original act providing for the taking over of these lines of communication covered not merely the telegraph and telephones but also the cable companies and wireless?

Mr. MOON. I stated that in the beginning.

Mr. ESCH. This bill only makes the penalty so far as telegraph and telephone companies are concerned?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Is it a fact that the cable companies and the wireless companies are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. MOON. I think they are.

Mr. ESCH. That would be the reason why your committee did not feel they would have jurisdiction over the matter?

Mr. MOON. Yes. We deal only with postal matters.

Mr. ESCH. Does the gentleman know whether there is any law now providing similar penalties with reference to the conversion of property, or larceny, and so forth, in connection with cable and wireless companies?

Mr. MOON. I do not know of any.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that the wireless systems are under the control of the Government to-day?

Mr. ESCH. They have been for the last two years.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that the Secretary controls these matters, and they are being administered by officers and enlisted men of the Navy and not by civilians?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; under the Navy Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. And will be subject to the penalties of naval regulations?

Mr. MOON. I want to say this bill is strictly an administration measure, amended in some respects by the committee, but the material features are those as suggested by the administration in a tentative draft of the bill and intended to cover telegraph and telephones under the Post Office Department.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman think that wherever the United States have taken over the administration of anything, even if it be the railroads, embezzlement by the officers of the United States and interference with them ought to be provided for by one law instead of giving the right to the postmasters? It is not post-office business which is put in the hands of the Postmaster General, but he is only a special agent to take care of these telegraph and telephone companies.

Mr. MOON. That may be true; but our committee deals alone with matters provided in this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman think it ought to have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary on the question of crime, anyhow, or else have gone to the committee that passed this law, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. MOON. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is not this an addition to the law passed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and enforcing the provision, and should it not have been reported by them?

Mr. MOON. I do not know as to the jurisdiction of the committee. It is possible that the bill should have been sent to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and possibly to the Committee on the Judiciary, but it was not.

Mr. MADDEN. Is intelligence commerce?

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; intelligence is not commerce; in a jurisdictional sense under our rule the Post Office and Post Roads Committee has jurisdiction over telegraph and telephones, and should propose laws and pass on them in committee under the existing facts; but that question can not be made now, of course.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. SIEGEL. In view of the fact that cable messages are being received by the telegraph offices the same as usual, section 1, it seems to me, should be amended so as to include cablegrams, and not use the words in line 3, page 2, of this bill, "with the delivery of any such message." In other words, if a messenger boy was held up while carrying a cablegram and the message taken away from him, you could not prosecute him, while if he carried a telegram you could.

Mr. MOON. Yes, possibly.

Mr. SIEGEL. It seems to me that the words "cable message" should be included.

Mr. MOON. That is part of the telegram, anyway, when committed to telegraph wires.

Mr. SIEGEL. Use the words "the delivery of any such message" or "transmission of any such message," leaving out the word "cablegram."

Mr. MOON. I take it, as a matter of law, that when you speak of telegraph you do not mean merely a message that is sent from New York to Washington over the wire, but it might include all communications by wire or cable, by radio or any other way, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. SIEGEL. This is what occurs. Whenever the cablegram is sent here and delivered to a messenger boy, and the cablegram is taken away from that messenger boy, although in the employ of the United States at the present time, there could not be any prosecution.

Mr. MOON. I think "cablegram" and "telegram" would be the same so far as that is concerned, if that question should arise. But I want to suggest to the gentleman that this bill has had very close scrutiny by the law officers of the Government, and it has been presented here as they desire it to pass. Of course, we have a right to make any changes in it we desire to make, regardless of their views, but I imagine it is sufficiently protected. Every telegraph message is not a cable message, but every cable message is also a telegraph message, for the reason that it must go onto the wires after it is received from the cable, unless it is, possibly, at the point of reception.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for another question?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. In every criminal case it is necessary to prove the venue; it is necessary to prove that the court trying it has territorial jurisdiction over the offense committed. Now, this first section of this act forbids and punishes not only the tapping of wires but leakage, and the giving out of information obtained through them. Ought not there to be in view of the difficulties in proving the venue in criminal prosecutions a section in this bill providing that in view of the difficulty of making that proof, providing that any Federal court of general jurisdiction in any district through which the Telegraph system was operative might have jurisdiction of the prosecution of the offense?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It might be almost impossible to prove that the leakage incurred in any particular Federal district, and I believe the act ought to be made enforceable, and it is not enforceable as to leakage unless you have some such provision in it. It is not an uncommon provision in criminal law.

Mr. MOON. I think the venue in any criminal case ought to be at the place of the commission of the crime. While the Government's rights must be respected, the rights of a citizen must also be respected. It would not be just to a citizen of the United States to try him a thousand miles from his home or residence; to try him in not one but in every jurisdiction, if necessary, under the Federal indictment. The Federal indictment might lay a general dragnet in that way. It might indict a man in a dozen places for the same offense, and he could be tried in any of them.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. He could only be tried in one.

Mr. MOON. No. He could be tried, for instance, in the southern district of New York, and if it turned out that the offense was committed in Pennsylvania, you could get him down there; and you could indict him in Pennsylvania and in New York and in Washington and anywhere; and while you could convict him only in one place, you could put him to the inconvenience of undergoing trial in a number of places. I think the proper thing would be for the Government not to lay dragnets for citizens, but for the Government to know its business and find indictments where the offense has been committed, so that a man could be tried by a jury of his peers.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Let me suggest that a leakage might occur between Baltimore and Richmond, Va., and——

Mr. MOON. Then let the Government find out where the leakage is and punish it.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It will practically make the act unenforceable unless you make some such provision.

Mr. MOON. I do not think so, and the law officers of the Government do not think so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if no gentleman desires to occupy time I will move——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman answer one or two questions?

Mr. MOON. If I can.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman can. It may be due to a misunderstanding of his statement that I am asking the question. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that the law officers deemed the passage of this or a similar law necessary in order to properly operate the telegraph and telephone service?

Mr. MOON. Yes. The Solicitor of the Government for the Post Office Department was before the committee and was heard on the bill, and he regarded it as absolutely imperative that it should be enacted.

Mr. WALSH. So that if there is any interference with Government business going over the telegraph wire relating to the war, without this law the parties guilty could not be punished?

Mr. MOON. No; not under that first section, if at all.

Mr. WALSH. I do not agree with the gentleman. But I want to ask the gentleman another question. I notice for tapping a telegraph wire or willfully interfering with the operation of a telephone or telegraph by anybody they are liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000 and imprisonment for not more than one year.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Whereas if they receive or conceal or retain in their possession any property or valuable thing in connection with the telegraph system or telephone system they can be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and imprisonment for not more than five years. Why is that discrepancy between the punishments there?

Mr. MOON. I suppose it is because one offense involves a greater degree of moral turpitude than the other.

Mr. WALSH. Then why should not the monetary punishment be increased as well? The fine in each case is the same.

Mr. MOON. Those questions of fixing punishment are largely arbitrary. There is no rule by which you can determine that sort of a question. That is the judgment of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will agree that this is a criminal law?

Mr. MOON. Yes. That is what it is.

Mr. WALSH. Then I am inclined to agree with the gentleman that the committee jurisdiction rests with the Committee on the Judiciary. It may be too late to raise that question now.

Mr. MOON. It is too late to raise that question now.

Mr. WALSH. I did want to ask the gentleman one further question, and that is why the language is continually used in this act "of any telephone or telegraph system operated by the Postmaster General"?

Mr. MOON. It is because the Postmaster General is the man who operates them for the Government.

Mr. WALSH. The Postmaster General is the man who operates them?

Mr. MOON. Yes. The power was conferred upon the President, of course, to assume the control and operation of these instrumentalities; but, of course, the President is expected to operate them through an agent, and he conferred that power on the Postmaster General.

Mr. WALSH. Now, then, in that case, if the transfer of jurisdiction over these telegraphs and telephones were made from the Postmaster General to somebody else——

Mr. MOON. It is Government operation by the Postmaster General.

Mr. WALSH. Well, suppose the President should take it out of the hands of the Postmaster General and place it in somebody else's control. Would this law operate?

Mr. MOON. I do not know whether it would or not, but I think it would. I do not think there is any danger of his taking it out of the hands of the Postmaster General during the life of this administration.

Mr. WALSH. We can not tell what might happen. If anything should happen to the distinguished Postmaster General—which I trust will not——

Mr. MOON. The gentleman can not be serious about that. When you say "Postmaster General" you do not mean Mr. Burleson personally.

Mr. MADDEN. We might have Mr. MOON made Postmaster General.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. Then we would not need any law on the subject. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. The words "Postmaster General" do not mean the incumbent in that office at this time. That is a continuing office under the law, and whoever occupies it would be Postmaster General.

Mr. WALSH. It might be transferred to somebody else.

Mr. MOON. Congress might repeal the whole thing. But while it stands it is all right.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. Referring to section 2 of the bill, as I take it this bill provides for punishment of larceny of any of the property.

Mr. MOON. Yes; it provides against stealing, purloining, or embezzling, or without authority destroying any money or property.

Mr. SNOOK. The various States have laws providing for the punishment of larceny. What effect will that have upon the laws enforced in the different States?

Mr. MOON. None whatever. The State's jurisdiction is not impaired in the least by this. There are two sovereignties to which the offender against the law may answer. He may be indicted under a State law for stealing and be punished, and he also might be indicted under the Federal law and be punished, and he might get two punishments.

Mr. SNOOK. But if he is indicted under the Federal law, that would supersede the State law.

Mr. MOON. No, I think not; the State could punish him if it wanted to. Larceny is an infraction not only of the State law but under the Federal law.

Mr. SNOOK. Suppose a man was indicted by a Federal grand jury and also by a State grand jury in the county; if there was a clash of authority, would the Federal authority prevail?

Mr. MOON. The general practice between the State and Federal courts is that where both have jurisdiction, for the court that first takes jurisdiction to punish, and then the further practice has been that where a man once convicted and punished is convicted by the other jurisdiction punishment is not inflicted, or merely nominal punishment. So as a matter of judicial operation a man is seldom punished twice for the same offense, although he offends against two jurisdictions or two sovereignties and can be punished by both. This would not interfere with the State authority.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the latter part of the first section, line 4, page 2—whoever being employed in any such telephone or telegraph service shall divulge the contents of any such telephone or telegraph message to any person not duly authorized or entitled to receive the same, shall be fined—

And so forth. I want to call attention to the fact that this language does not require a bad intent necessarily. The disclosing of the message may be accidental or negligent merely. For illustration, take a telegraph message being left at the wrong place, misdelivered; there would be a violation of this statute. Then, I want to call attention to the fact that it is the practice now to deliver telegraph messages by telephoning them. For illustration, a message is received at a station where the addressee has a telephone. The employee usually telephones the telegraph message to the addressee. It might be given to an unauthorized servant or it might be overheard by a third person. This would make the employee guilty of a crime with heavy penalties.

Mr. MOON. If there was no criminal intent, that would be considered; and I think it would be covered by other language in the section necessary to the operation of the service.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. There is no provision for bad intent mentioned in this language.

Mr. MOON. There never was a criminal statute that could be enforced unless it had embodied in it the spirit of criminal intent to be proven before conviction.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If an employee discloses a telegraph message accidentally, it would be a violation of the law.

Mr. MOON. Not if he referred to it where reference was necessary and proper in the service; there would be no criminal intent.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is a serious matter, I want to say to the gentleman, to make a felony attach to the mere divulging of a telegram or a telephone message when the disclosure injures nobody and which may be done without any particularly bad intent.

Mr. MOON. So far as the penalty is concerned, it is like all other penalties attached to the Federal statutes—it is within the discretion of the court under the law. The court can fine a man one cent or imprison him one minute if he thinks that is the proper punishment for that sort of an offense under this bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Surely the gentleman does not think we ought to leave that to the pleasure of the court.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman wants to know my opinion about matters of that sort, I will say that I think no judge, State or Federal, ought to have the power under any circumstances to inflict punishment of any kind. That ought to be done by the jury, and the jury alone, as is the law in a number of States.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But the gentleman would give the judge such power in this case.

Mr. MOON. We can not change this bill and reform the judicial system at the suggestion of anybody who may make a mere hypercritical criticism of the bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is true; but it is incumbent on us to protect citizens from severe punishment for trifling offenses.

Mr. MOON. It may be done every day; we are not attempting to cure that situation in this bill. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman withhold that? Would the gentleman object to making the penalties uniform?

Mr. MOON. No. The penalties are fixed as the department desires them, and I do not think there ought to be any change.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, the department's word has preference over the wishes of the majority of the House?

Mr. MOON. No; if the majority wishes to change them it can do so.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is not willing to yield for an amendment.

Mr. MOON. I do not want to lose the floor and lose the right to call for the previous question. If by unanimous consent it is agreed that your amendment shall be voted on, and then the previous question be considered as ordered, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to have the gentleman speak louder.

Mr. MOON. I said that I had the floor and I would not yield it for an amendment unless it was unanimously agreed that the amendment should be voted on without debate and the previous question then ordered.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman wants to do all the debating on the measure.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman wants time I will not say a word and let him take it.

Mr. WALSH. I believe the gentleman from Wyoming has an amendment he would like to offer.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to discuss one or two features of the bill.

Mr. MOON. I will yield to the gentleman time. I said in the beginning that if any gentleman wanted time I would be glad to yield to him, that I did not want to discuss the bill five minutes myself, but I want to keep the floor. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman if he has seriously considered the possible effect of his legislation which seems to make it a felony to listen in on a telephone line? I am afraid that in some of the country districts—possibly not in the district of my friend, but in many country districts—if that law is enforced, a large part of the population will be in jail.

Mr. MOON. I do not know whether it will or not; perhaps it ought to be in some places.

Mr. MONDELL. I would not say that of the gentleman's district.

Mr. MOON. And I would not say it of the district of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. But listening in on the phone line is the regular rural evening occupation in some localities, I am told.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman's argument is that injustice might be done; but the courts, I am sure, would take care of each case according to the circumstances surrounding it. We could not legislate against real crime along the line the gentleman suggests.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I have no disposition to have the bill amended so as in any way to prevent the punishment of a crime. I simply made that suggestion to the gentleman as one of the possibilities of the legislation. Perhaps in those cases the courts would recognize the established custom and hold that listening to conversations did not come within the purview of the law.

Mr. MOON. Is that in Wyoming—is that the established custom in Wyoming?

Mr. MONDELL. It is, I am told, in some States. I will not say it is in Wyoming. I have not been able to understand just why the words "by the Postmaster General" and the words "and the proclamation of the President dated July 22, 1918," were inserted in this bill in various sections. It seems to me it adds nothing to the bill.

Mr. MOON. That is for proper identification.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it seems to me it adds nothing to the legislation. There is sufficient identification of the law under which we are operating the lines without that language.

Mr. MADDEN. It adds words.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; it adds words and provides additional facts that must be established before a conviction can be had.

Mr. MOON. It does not add any additional fact.

Mr. MONDELL. The insertion of the language I have referred to necessitates the establishment before conviction of the fact that the line is being operated by and under the Postmaster General and that it is being operated under the proclamation of the President. Why burden the courts with that sort of thing? It adds nothing to the legislation. If the bill read in the first section, for instance—

That whoever during the period of Government operation of the telephone and telegraph systems of the United States under the act of Congress approved July 16, 1918, shall—

And so forth, it would be clear, definite, and brief.

Mr. MOON. I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that at best his criticism is only as to tautology in the bill, it is not a legal criticism of it.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is rather more than tautology.

Mr. MOON. I do not know; I do not assume what a Federal court would hold about anything, but I should think they would take judicial knowledge of this staute which permits the President of the United States to operate these instrumentalities and also judicial knowledge of the proclamation that took them over in pursuance of the statute and would not have to prove that as a fact.

Mr. MONDELL. I assume there may be some other and additional proclamation relative to the management and control of these lines. What will happen then?

Mr. MOON. Oh, the gentleman is supposing something.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not assuming that the President will operate the lines under any other management than that of the Postmaster General, but he may. It does seem to me it is not wise in the enactment of a law to insert language which adds nothing to the legislation and might by a shift of administration render the legislation void.

Mr. MOON. Well, it takes nothing from it.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it has this effect——

Mr. MOON. I said before, all the criticism the gentleman had is as to the repetition of the words in each section.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, a little more than that I take it.

Mr. MOON. Each one of these sections is a separate law to itself; each one pronounces different penalties for different offenses.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand.

Mr. MOON. And if it is necessary in one it is not improper in all.

Mr. MONDELL. But it is not necessary in any.

Mr. MOON. I think it is.

Mr. MONDELL. In bringing an indictment under this act as it now reads and in securing a conviction it would be necessary to show that these telegraph and telephone lines, in addition to being operated under the law referred to, are being operated by the Postmaster General and under the proclamation of the President. It would be necessary to prove those facts. What good reason is there for creating such a situation?

Mr. MOON. It is not necessary to prove them at all; if so, it is easy to do.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it would be necessary and it might be overlooked in bringing and proving a case.

Mr. MOON. No; I think not.

Mr. MONDELL. As a layman I would not presume to differ from so good a lawyer as my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON. I do not claim to be any better lawyer than a good many laymen. I give my judgment for whatever it is worth. There is no use of our discussing the question that it is a mere repetition and tautology.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman would allow an amendment to be offered striking out the language I have referred to wherever it occurs in the bill, we could soon test the view of the House.

Mr. MOON. I will not agree to that; it is not necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. The House would be inclined to have it stricken out, in my opinion. Is the gentleman willing to put it to the acid test?

Mr. MOON. What does the gentleman call the acid test?

Mr. MONDELL. That is the usual term nowadays in regard to tests. I want an opportunity to test the opinion of the House. Evidently the gentleman does not want to test it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. MOON. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, very properly we view with apprehension and aversion the creation of new crimes. We are creating many new crimes in these times, and wherever it is necessary to create them in order to protect the Government or in carrying on the war I am sure we are all willing to do it, although we do it reluctantly. Yet the creation of a new crime which has no relation to the carrying on of the war and no relation to the business in hand particularly, which will merely tend to correct an evil which has always existed, which would exist to an equal extent in time of peace as it does now, it seems to me should be carefully considered. We propose by section 1 of this bill to make it a crime to divulge the contents of a telegram or telephone message by any employee of the Government. Heretofore such messages might be divulged without the act being punished as a crime. If the offense denounced had anything to do with protecting Government business, or would in any way tend to impair the operation of the telephone and telegraph systems, much could be said in favor of the provision, but it is not aimed at Government business, nor is it aimed at the guarding of Government secrets; it is designed for the protection of private secrets, social and business secrets, confidential matters between private parties, and other things of that kind.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it not provided in the law that a man who opens a letter in transmission through the mails and reads business secrets of anybody is guilty of an offense, and is not this just the same thing?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That depends upon the circumstances. Not in every case where you open a letter without the adressee's consent is a crime committed. Reading or disclosing the contents of a letter is never a crime.

Mr. STEVENSON. I mean while it is in the custody of the United States.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman is diverting me from the particular thing in hand, and that is the disclosing of telegraph or telephone messages, which are entirely different things from letters.

Heretofore such things might be divulged without punishment. Hereafter, if this bill becomes a law, they can not be divulged without punishment. On the contrary, the punishment will be extremely severe. That is the matter we have confronting us. When we are passing a law like this we ought to be absolutely sure of what we are doing and what the provisions of the law mean. No such law should be passed unless it provides that there must be a wicked intent, a malevolent intent, in the disclosure.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman will permit, suppose a telegram is sent to him which is of the utmost importance, containing business secrets, either by a telephone or telegraph, and the person having charge of it deliberately turns that message without authority or divulges its contents to some person else other than you have authorized to receive it, ought he not to be punished for that sort of thing?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; but the offense, it must be admitted, is more or less of a trifling nature, so far as its criminal aspect is concerned, and a year in jail and $1,000 fine does not fit the offense. The gentleman has stated a very extreme case. Criminal statutes are not framed, if they have any foundation in reason or philosophy, to meet only the most extreme cases. They are designed to apply to the usual case. On the other hand, let us suppose another case, in which a social message of the most trifling moment was divulged. For illustration, suppose a telephone operator, a young lady, should overhear a conversation between a young man and a young lady, in which he invited her to the theater or asked leave to call, and the telephone operator should disclose it, does the gentleman think that for merely disclosing that kind of message she should go to jail and pay a heavy fine?

Mr. MOON. There is no grand jury that would indict in a case of that sort.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman is a lawyer, and he realizes we ought never to throw a citizen on the mercy of a grand jury. Congress has the duty of passing the laws, and we should not delegate our functions to judges and grand juries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like some more time.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman has had sufficient time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am going to vote against the bill as it now stands.

Mr. MOON. I do not care if you do.

I want to say in this connection that the gentleman knows, if he has looked into this measure, that it is impossible for us to say on the face of the section that we do not want communications sent by telegraph or telephone to the Government of the United States or to its officers anywhere, and that are looking for the protection of the Federal Government, communicated or repeated for the benefit of the German Empire.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If that is the only purpose of this provision of the bill, it should be amended so as to clearly make such an act a crime and so as not to make criminals out of those who may innocently divulge a message of no importance whatever.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield me a half minute?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 4.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MOON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EMERGENCY WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on to-morrow morning, after the reading and approval of the Journal, the bill H. R. 12776 be taken up for consideration, and there shall be not to exceed four hours of general debate. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent that on to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal, the bill H. R. 12776 shall be taken up for consideration; that there shall be not to exceed four hours of general debate on the bill, after which it shall be taken up under the five-minute rule in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and after it is perfected the committee shall rise and report the bill back to the House, and that the previous question shall be considered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without any intervening motion except the motion to recommit. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the gentleman mean by four hours of debate on the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Not exceeding four hours.

Mr. MONDELL. He does not mean that it is to be confined to the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I was going to say that I have just read the rule that has been reported, and I do not understand that the rule, if adopted without amendment, would confine it to the subject matter of the bill. But I do hope that such may be the case.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, what is the purpose of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SIMS. The only reason I am doing this is to save time so that we can use on general debate the time that we would use in discussing and passing the rule.

Mr. MONDELL. It is understood that the debate is not necessarily confined to the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to say now, in order to stop this coming before the Committee on Rules and taking its time for two hours in considering bills of this kind, that I object.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina offers the following privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SIMS. Let the rule be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will not withdraw it. I do not think we should consider a bill of this importance at this stage of the evening.

Mr. POU. We do not propose to consider the bill but to consider the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 23.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask for tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A call of the House is ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota was on his feet demanding tellers before the Chair had completed his announcement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no kind of objection to ordering tellers. He thinks the gentleman from Minnesota is too late. Still the Chair will order tellers. The gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the Chair that it is too late when the roll call has begun.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no cause for controversy about that. As many as desire tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-two gentlemen have arisen—a sufficient number. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] will take their places as tellers.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Chair appoint Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will please take their places as tellers.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, we are in the House, and one-fifth of a quorum of the House is needed. I respectfully appeal to the Chair that 22 is not a sufficient number in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was a little bit in error. We are not in the Committee of the Whole. We are in the House. There were only 22. It takes one-fifth.

Mr. MADDEN. It takes one-fifth of those present.

Mr. WALSH. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the House to the rule in reference to ordering tellers. It provides:

> The House shall divide; those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats and then those in the negative; if he still doubts, or a count is required by at least one-fifth of a quorum, he shall name one from each side of the question to tell the Members in the affirmative and negative, which, being reported, he shall rise and state the decision.

At the present time the Chair is informed that a quorum is 216. A fifth of that would be 44. Only 22 having risen, tellers are refused. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 25.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House declines to adjourn. The Clerk will call the roll. This is just a call of the House.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Austin	Barnhart	Borland
Ashbrook	Baer	Bell	Bowers
Aswell	Barkley	Bland, Va.	Britten
Browne	Ferris	Lea, Cal.	Rouse
Browning	Fields	Lehlbach	Rowe
Brumbaugh	Flood	Lever	Rowland
Butler	Flynn	Linthicum	Russell
Byrns, Tenn.	Fordney	Little	Sanders, La.
Caldwell	Foss	Littlepage	Sanford
Campbell, Pa.	Francis	London	Saunders, Va.
Cannon	Fuller, Mass.	Longworth	Scott, Iowa
Cantrill	Gallivan	Lufkin	Scott, Pa.
Caraway	Gard	Lundeen	Scully
Carew	Gillett	Lunn	Shackleford
Carter, Mass.	Glass	McClintic	Shallenberger
Carter, Okla.	Godwin, N. C.	McCormick	Sherley
Cary	Good	McKinley	Sherwood
Church	Goodall	McLaughlin, Mich.	Shouse
Clark, Fla.	Gordon	McLaughlin, Pa.	Slemp
Classon	Gould	McLemore	Small
Coady	Graham, Ill.	Maher	Smith, Mich.
Connally, Tex.	Graham, Pa.	Mann	Smith, T. F.
Cooper, Ohio	Gray, N. J.	Mason	Snyder
Cooper, W. Va.	Green, Iowa	Mays	Steele
Cooper, Wis.	Greene, Mass.	Meeker	Steenerson
Copley	Gregg	Merritt	Stephens, Miss.
Costello	Griest	Miller, Minn.	Sterling, Ill.
Crago	Griffin	Montague	Sterling, Pa.
Cramton	Hamill	Moore, Pa.	Stiness
Crisp	Hamilton, N. Y.	Mott	Sullivan
Crosser	Harrison, Miss.	Mudd	Sweet
Currie, Mich.	Hayden	Neely	Swift
Curry, Cal.	Hayes	Nelson	Switzer
Dale, N. Y.	Heaton	Nichols, Mich.	Tague
Dale, Vt.	Heintz	Oldfield	Talbott
Darrow	Helvering	Oliver, N. Y.	Taylor, Colo.
Davis	Hicks	Olney	Templeton
Dempsey	Holland	O'Shaunessy	Thomas
Denison	Hollingsworth	Padgett	Thompson
Dent	Hood	Paige	Tillman
Dewalt	Howard	Park	Tilson
Dickinson	Humphreys	Peters	Tinkham
Dies	Husted	Phelan	Treadway
Dill	Hutchinson	Platt	Van Dyke
Dominick	Jacoway	Polk	Venable
Dooling	Johnson, Ky.	Porter	Vinson
Doremus	Johnson, S. Dak.	Powers	Walton
Doughton	Johnson, Wash.	Pratt	Ward
Drane	Jones	Price	Weaver
Drukker	Kahn	Purnell	Welling
Dyer	Kelley, Mich.	Rainey, H. T.	White, Me.
Eagle	Kennedy, R. I.	Ramsey	White, Ohio
Elliott	Kettner	Randall	Wilson, Ill.
Ellsworth	Key, Ohio	Rankin	Wilson, Tex.
Elston	Kiess, Pa.	Reavis	Winslow
Emerson	Kitchin	Riordan	Woodyard
Estopinal	La Follette	Robbins
Fairchild, B. L.	LaGuardia	Robinson
Fairchild, G. W.	Langley	Rose

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SIMS) there were 180 ayes and 10 noes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma demands tellers. All those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will stand until counted. Not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for an additional clerical force in the office of the Auditor for the Navy Department for the remainder of the current fiscal year (H. Doc. No. 1298); to the Committee on Appropriations.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations for rent of buildings for Government officials East St. Louis, Ill.; Evansville, Ind.; Harrisburg, Pa.; Huntington, W. Va.; and Newport, R. I. (H. Doc. No. 1299); to the Committee on Appropriations.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation for repair of Auditors' Building, formerly Bureau of Engraving and Printing (H. Doc. No. 1300); to the Committee on Appropriations.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation for the construction of a two-story vault in the north court of the Treasury Building (H. Doc. No. 1301); to the Committee on Appropriations.

5. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of a bill to provide for the reimbursement of civilians for the seizure of arms and ammunition by United States troops during the labor troubles in Colorado during 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1302); to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12998) to amend section 3528 of the Revised Statutes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 811), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12801) to amend section 1 of Title VII of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 813), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. JAMES: A bill (H. R. 13003) to prevent the wearing of ribbon, badge of membership, or button signifying membership of the United Spanish War Veterans by those not entitled to same in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GANDY: A bill (H. R. 13004) extending the time for commencing construction of bridge and for maintenance of pontoon and pile bridge by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. across the Missouri River at or near Chamberlain, S. Dak., and providing additional requirements for bridge to be constructed; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. FOSTER: Resolution (H. Res. 439) providing for the consideration of H. R. 12404; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GANDY: A bill (H. R. 13005) granting a pension to Fred E. Savage; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 13006) granting an increase of pension to Tillie Wester; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAGO: Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the Lithuanian people of Philadelphia pledging loyalty and support to the United States in this war for justice; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Letter of William C. Tenjost, president of the Retail Liquor Dealers' Association of the State of New York, protesting against the passage of the prohibition bills before Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petitions of Charles A. Carroll and other citizens and of Samuel Lindenbaum and other citizens, all of Los Angeles, Cal., in favor of the bill (H. R. 5531) to provide a pharmaceutical corps for the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 26, 1918.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, September 24, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Chamberlain	Fernald	Hale
Baird	Colt	Fletcher	Harding
Bankhead	Culberson	France	Hardwick
Beckham	Cummins	Frelinghuysen	Henderson
Benet	Curtis	Gerry	Johnson, S. Dak.
Borah	Dillingham	Goff	Jones, N. Mex.
Brandegee	Drew	Gronna	Jones, Wash.
Calder	Fall	Guion	Kellogg
Kendrick	Nelson	Robinson	Trammell
Kenyon	New	Saulsbury	Underwood
King	Norris	Shafroth	Vardaman
Kirby	Nugent	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Knox	Overman	Sherman	Walsh
Lenroot	Owen	Shields	Warren
Lewis	Page	Simmons	Watson
Lodge	Penrose	Smith, Ariz.	Weeks
McCumber	Phelan	Smith, Md.	Wilfley
McKellar	Pittman	Smith, Mich.	Williams
McNary	Poindexter	Smith, S. C.	Wolcott
Martin, Ky.	Pomerene	Smoot
Martin, Va.	Ransdell	Sterling
Myers	Reed	Thompson

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13 to the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," disagrees to the residue of the amendments of the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE of Georgia, Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, Mr. HAUGEN, and Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 152) to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 4194. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4543. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4722. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

SUPPLY OF MINERAL OILS (S. DOC. NO. 280).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there are two reports on the table which have come in from the Director of the Bureau of Mines in response to requests for information concerning the production of oil. One request was made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the other by myself. I thought they had been ordered printed, and I ask now that they be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTRACOASTAL CANALS (S. DOC. NO. 279).

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, there is a report on the desk of the Vice President, made by the Secretary of Commerce, in answer to a resolution which I introduced regarding the acquisition by the Government of certain canals. I ask that the report may be printed. I understand that there are certain illustrations in it, which under the rule will cause the matter to be referred to the Committee on Printing. I am not sure that that is correct. The report should undoubtedly be printed. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Printing present.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I was going to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the illustrations be printed with the report. I will do so now if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very anxious that the report, which is a very important one, shall be printed, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed, together with the illustrations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is the order of business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no order of business. This is a recess.

Mr. BORAH. Out of order, and by unanimous consent, I ask leave to submit certain petitions upon the suffrage amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be received and noted.

Mr. BORAH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Ashton, Moscow, Kellogg, Idaho Falls, Almira, Gray, Lund, Wayan, Pocatello, Twin Falls, Lewiston, Blackfoot, Mackay, Shoshone, and Boise, all in the State of Idaho, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a memorial of the Anti-Suffrage Party of New York, and a memorial of the Women Voters' Anti-Suffrage Party of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed suffrage amendment to the Constitution, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Palm Beach County; of the Florida Equal Suffrage Association of Fort Lauderdale; of sundry citizens of Pensacola, Miami, Tallahassee, Orange Park, Summer School, Orlando, Palmetto, and Jacksonville, all in the State of Florida, and the petition of Catharine Waugh McCulloch, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of the Anti-Suffrage Party of New York City and of sundry citizens of New Haven, Conn.; Hartford, Conn.; Jaffrey, N. H.; Westfield, N. J.; Canton, N. Y.; New York City, N. Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; and Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed suffrage amendment to the Constitution, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GERRY. I ask unanimous consent to have the telegram which I send to the desk inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROVIDENCE, R. I., September 23, 1918.

Hon. PETER G. GERRY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Following resolution unanimously adopted by the Democratic Party in convention assembled at Providence the 23d day of September, 1918:

"Urge upon the Senate of the United States the immediate passage of the Federal amendment for woman suffrage and recommend that the Senators from this State support said amendment, and further ask that this resolution be forwarded to Washington to be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

JOHN I. DEVLIN,
Chairman of Convention.
PATRICK S. QUINN,
Democratic National Committeeman.
JOSEPH CUNNINGHAM,
Secretary of Convention.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan presented a petition of sundry women students of the Michigan State Normal College, and a petition of sundry women students of the Western State Normal School, of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pittsfield; of the Central Labor Union of Lynn; and of the Massachusetts State Branch, American Federation of Labor, of Boston, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented resolutions adopted by the Republican State convention of Rhode Island in session September 24 at Providence, R. I., favoring the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

STATISTICS OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4924) to amend section 336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the annual report on the statistics of commerce and navigation of the United States with foreign countries, and I submit a report (No. 575) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 4959) to increase the rates of pay of officers of certain grades; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4960) providing for the promotion of certain officers in the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4961) to grant railroad rates at 1 cent a mile to men in the military or naval service; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MINERAL PRODUCTS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 281).

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, and to the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to provide for an adequate and increased supply, to facilitate the production, and to provide for an equitable, economical, and better distribution of the following-named mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products, metals, alloys, and chemical compounds thereof, to wit: Antimony, arsenic, ball clay, bismuth, bromine, cerium, chalk, chromium, cobalt, corundum emery, fluorspar, ferrosilicon, fuller's earth, graphite, grinding pebbles, iridium, kaolin, magnesite, manganese, mercury, mica, molybdenum, osmium, sodium, platinum, palladium, paper clay, phosphorus, potassium, pyrites, radium, sulphur, thorium, tin, titanium, tungsten, uranium, vanadium, and zirconium, as the President may, from time to time, determine to be necessary for the purposes aforesaid, and as to which there is at the time of such determination, a present or prospective inadequacy of supply. The aforesaid substances mentioned in any such determination are hereinafter referred to as necessaries.

"SEC. 2. That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase such necessaries and to enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign contracts for the production or purchase of same, to provide storage facilities for and store the same, to provide or improve transportation facilities, and to use, distribute, or allocate said necessaries, or to sell the same at reasonable prices, but such sales made during the war shall not be at a price less than the purchase or cost of production thereof: Provided, That no such contract of purchase shall cover a period longer than two years after the termination of the war.

"The President is further authorized, upon finding that importation into the United States of any of the necessaries covered by this act is likely to result in a loss to the United States on any necessaries which it may have acquired hereunder, to ascertain, fix, and proclaim such rate of duty upon such imported necessaries as shall be sufficient to adequately protect the United States from any such loss.

"The funds provided by section 6 hereof shall be used in carrying out the powers granted by this section, and all moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal of such necessaries, shall be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this act. Any balance of such moneys remaining when the object of this act has been accomplished shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to requisition and take over any of said necessaries and to use, distribute, allocate, or sell the same; and also to requisition and take over any undeveloped or insufficiently developed or operated idle land, deposit, or mine, and any idle or partially operated smelter, or plant, or part thereof, producing or, in his judgment, capable of producing said necessaries, or either of them, and to develop and operate such mine or deposit or such smelter or plant, either through the agencies hereinafter mentioned, or under lease or royalty agreement, or in any other manner, and to store, use, distribute, allocate, or sell the products thereof: Provided, That no ores or metals, the principal money value of which consists in metals or minerals other than those specifically enumerated in section 1 hereof, shall be subject to requisition under the provisions of this act. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, so acquired, is no longer essential for the objects aforesaid, the same shall be returned to the person, firm, or corporation entitled thereto. The United States shall make just compensation, determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, or operation by the Government of any such necessaries, or any such land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof. If the compensation so determined be unsatisfactory to the person, firm, or corporation entitled thereto, such person, firm, or corporation shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145, of the Judicial Code.

"The President is authorized to require statements and reports, to examine books and papers, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem appropriate for carrying out the purposes of this act. The fund provided by section 6 hereof may be used in carrying out the purposes of this act, and all moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the use, operation, or disposal of any such necessaries, land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, shall be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this act. Any balance of such moneys remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 4. That any person who shall neglect or refuse to comply with any order or requisition made by the President pursuant to the provisions of this act, or who shall obstruct or attempt to obstruct the enforcement of or the compliance with any such requisition or order, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or any rule or regulation adopted hereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 5. That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1919, for the payment of all administrative expenses under this act, including personal services, traveling and subsistence expenses, the payment of rent, the purchase of equipment, supplies, postage, printing, publications, and such other articles, both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential and proper.

"SEC. 6. That the sum of $50,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which, together with all moneys received from time to time under the provisions of this act, all of which shall be credited to said appropriation, shall be used as a revolving fund for carrying out the objects of this act, and for the purpose of making all payments and disbursements, including just compensation under section 3, by this act authorized: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purposes described in the last preceding section: Provided further, That a detailed report of all operations under this act, including all receipts and disbursements, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 25th day of each month, covering the preceding month's operation. Any balance of said revolving fund remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished, shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 7. That the President is authorized to exercise each, every, or any power and authority hereby vested in him, and to expend the moneys herein appropriated or provided for, or any part or parts thereof, by and through such officer or officers, department or departments, board or boards, agent, agents, or agencies as he shall create or designate from time to time for this purpose. He may fix the reasonsable compensation for the performance of such services, but no official or employee of the United States shall receive any additional compensation for such services except as now permitted by law: Provided, That no person employed under the provisions of this act shall be paid any salary or compensation in excess of that paid for similar or like services rendered in executive departments of the Government.

"SEC. 8. No person having a pecuniary interest in any transaction in pursuance of this act shall have any official connection under this act with such transaction. Any person violating this provision shall forfeit to the Government all proceeds which he shall have received from such transaction, and upon due conviction of such violation shall be fined not exceeding $10,000 or imprisoned not exceeding 10 years.

"SEC. 9. That the President is authorized, if in his judgment such action be necessary or useful for the objects of this act, to form one or more corporations under the laws of any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, for the purpose of carrying out the powers or any of the powers hereby authorized. The capital stock of any such corporation shall be such as the President may determine, but the total capital stock for all corporations so formed shall not exceed in the aggregate the appropriation of $50,000,000, made by section 6 hereof. Said appropriation, or any part thereof, may be used by the President in subscribing on behalf of the United States, through such person or persons as he may designate, to the capital stock of such corporation or corporations, and the capital and assets of any such corporation or corporations, together with all additions thereto under sections 2 and 3 hereof, may be used in carrying out the objects of this act. The directorate and organization of such corporation or corporations shall be such as the President may prescribe, and such corporation or corporations shall have all such charter powers as may be deemed necessary or desirable by the President to enable it or them to accomplish the objects of this act. The capital stock of any such corporation or corporations shall be held and voted for the exclusive benefit of the United States, through such person or persons as the President may designate.

"SEC. 10. Upon the proclamation of peace the President shall proceed as rapidly as possible to wind up and terminate all transactions under this act, and to dispose as fast as practicable of all property acquired thereunder, and after said proclamation of peace no contracts shall be made, property acquired, or other transaction performed under this act except such as shall be necessary for the purpose of this section and incidental thereto, and two years after such proclamation of peace this act shall cease to have effect and all powers conferred thereby shall end: Provided, That the termination of this act shall not prevent the subsequent collection of any moneys due the United States, nor shall it affect any act done or any right or obligation acquired or accruing or any suit or proceeding had or commenced before such termination, but all such collections, rights, obligations, suits, and proceedings shall continue as if this act had not terminated, and any offense committed or liability incurred prior thereto shall be prosecuted in the same manner and with the same punishment and effect as if this act had not terminated.

"SEC. 11. That employment under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any person from military service under the provisions of the selective-draft law approved May 18, 1917, or any act amendatory thereto.

"SEC. 12. That if any action or provision of this act shall be declared invalid for any reason whatsoever such invalidity shall not be construed to affect the validity of any other section or provision hereof."

And the Senate agree to the same.

CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
T. J. WALSH,
MILES POINDEXTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

M. D. FOSTER,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
M. M. GARLAND,
Managers on the part of the House.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 152. An act to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Chair whether the regular order of morning business is to be proceeded with?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is a recess. There is no regular order of morning business.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration House joint resolution 200, Order of Business 123.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [MR. WILLIAMS].

Mr. BORAH. May we have the amendment read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment pending is that offered by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], in line 9, before the word "citizens," to insert the word "white," so as to read:

SECTION 1. The right of white citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the world is passing through a period of change. Things that were new yesterday are to-day old and to-morrow will doubtless become obsolete. New principles and untried policies are passing through the processes of experimentation, and the mutations coming with lightning rapidity challenge our attention and present the world in the perspective as a cosmic phenomenon, kaleidoscopic in character. It reminds one of the cyclone that rushes through the country razing to the ground houses and forests, mingling the débris with the boiling, onrushing clouds, scattering woe and want, and leaving in its wake misery on every hand. After a while it will run its course. The twisting winds shall cease to twirl; they will assume their normal velocity; and the force which wrought widespread destruction but a few moments before will be changed to the gentle zephyr passing over the landscape, drinking in the perfume from the fragrant flower, or fanning the dimpled cheeks of joyous, innocent childhood. The frowning front of the cloud of war will pass away, and the rainbow of peace shall shine forth to quiet the troubled soul.

In the midst of this desolation and devastation, the deadly work of the typhoon of war, it is well—aye more, wisely prudent—that the American people, in the quiet of their homes, should take an inventory of their national assets and liabilities, indulge in serious thought, and make ready, in so far as possible at this time, for the great work of reconstruction and rehabilitation, which must engage our attention after the war is over.

In time of war let us prepare for peace, for in the performance of that great work we shall have need of all of the moral forces and mental strength which the wisest of men and women who make up the composite citizenry of this Republic can contribute. This we must do if we would perform properly our part in saving the world from a lapse into the barbarism of the Dark Ages. America must continue to lead the world in civic righteousness and democratic reform.

Offensive warfare universally brings about a recrudescence of brute force in government, and its general effect is to stifle the nobler impulses of the human soul. There was never a war in all the ages of the world that could not have been averted if the leaders on either side had been sufficiently wise, brave, patriotic, unselfish, and true to the highest ideals. I am quite sure, however, that there are instances in the world's history where wars were forced upon people, and self-preservation and the preservation of governmental existence made it necessary to engage in war. In such cases, which we will call defensive warfare, for a righteous cause, in individual cases the dross is separated from the gold and it also works for national exaltation and individual excellency. But at best war is a brutal business, "only splendid murder, the mad game the world so loves to play," if I may be permitted to quote Dean Swift; it is contrary to the teachings of the Prince of Peace, an impeachment of the world's Christianity, and violative of all the principles of altruism.

One of the unfortunate, very unfortunate, incidents to all wars is the disposition of even so-called righteous men and women to condone the violations of the moral law to a degree which almost amounts to suspension of the moral law. Constitutions are also set aside and Necessity becomes the final arbiter. To win is the goal to which and for which men fight; and particularly is that true in the desperate conflict now being waged upon the broad theater of the world. The unconquerable spirit which bids us fight until victory for the allied cause is achieved fires the heart and animates the soul of every patriotic American to-day. America entered this war, we were told by the President of the United States, to uphold the rights of her citizens upon the high seas and in defense of an ideal; and having entered, every citizen of the Republic will willingly lay his all as a fitting sacrifice upon the altar of his country's cause.

We must, however, not fall below or go beyond the first high purpose. We can not afford to lose sight of the real motives that moved us as a Nation in the beginning.

President Wilson's famous address to the Senate on the 22d day of January, 1917, contains the definition of the aim and end of America to which in after years posterity can point with pride. The brutality and wickedness of our adversary must not be permitted to betray us into doing the things which we condemn in others and to demand more at the hands of the vanquished than we started out to achieve.

Justice is not measured by the weakness of our adversary, and righteousness must not be determined by the superior strength of our arms. In the prosecution of this war courage and heroic devotion to duty must characterize our conduct if we would win the war, and the spirit of generosity, love, and charity for our fellow man must crown and glorify our acts in the hour of victory. God grant that out of this desperate conflict the principles of liberty and justice, of righteousness and Caucasian equality may emerge, reinvigorated and purified, to bless and lead the world to higher and better things.

But, Mr. President, after all of this sacrifice and suffering, blood letting, and money wasting, what will it profit the United States if we gain democracy for the whole world and still deny the application of its beneficent principles to the best part of our own citizenry? In reality, there can be no world-wide democracy in the true sense of the term as long as liberty has her favorites and justice is dispensed by the hand of partiality.

I have entertained for many years a very sincere desire to see the white women of America invested with the right of suffrage. I have not shared, and do not at this time share, the apprehension of many of my fellow countrymen, who, overwhelmed, unconsciously perhaps, with the vanity of their own sex superiority, that woman's possession of the ballot would lower the standard of feminine excellency, rob her of those refinements of manner and gentleness of soul which are the flowering of good breeding, the perfume of loving hearts, and the crowning virtue of her sex—qualities which all men reverence and worship in the perfect woman. I have not believed at any time that giving to woman the privilege of the ballot would be hurtful to her personally or result detrimentally to my country. The truth about the matter is, Mr. President, I believe, that the inherent virtues and superior moral and mental qualities of woman will rather purify the ballot, elevate the standard of citizenship, and, therefore, contribute largely to the sum total of virtue in government. All of which will necessarily elevate the standard of statesmanship in the Republic, which is so much needed at this time. I believe the responsibility which the adoption of this amendment by the American people shall put upon woman, the character of the work which she will be called upon to perform, will strengthen the moral fiber, develop the latent qualities of her heart and mind, and add to her personal charms, rather than detract from them.

Although woman has lived in a circumscribed sphere, with no power to reach out and do things—"do the things that others pray," as Edwin Markham expressed it—nevertheless, it is my judgment that we are indebted to her in a larger measure for what America has accomplished in the art of government and in the elevation of mankind generally than we are to man himself.

I would rather rely upon the intuition of woman to lead me in the right path, I would rather trust the promptings of her unselfish heart, than the boasted ratiocinations or the painful, logical processes of man. Woman usually thinks in straight lines, because her mind follows the promptings of her loving heart. In matters involving the welfare of humanity—the protection of the home, the God-given maternal instinct, the mother heart seldom deviates from the right course.

She understands instinctively that a right beginning is necessary to a successful ending. She knows that as the "twig is bent the tree's inclined." She understands well that—

You may talk of reformations, of the economic plan,
That shall stem the social evil in its course;
But the ancient sin of nations must be got at in the man.
If you want to cleanse a river, seek the source.
Ever since his first beginning, man has had his way in lust,
He has never learned the law of self-control;
And the world condones his sinning, and the doctors say he must,
And the churches shut their eyes, and take his toll.
* * * * * * *
It can never end through preaching; it can never end through laws;
This social sore no punishment can heal;
It must be the mother's teaching of the purpose, and the cause,
And God's glory, lying under sex appeal.

Her head and heart working in conjunction can more nearly approximate the real value of the human being to the State and to God. She understands that the most valuable thing beneath the stars in the sight of the Ruler of the Universe is a human being, and that all else, all governments, are made for man rather than man for government. She lives in an atmosphere of idealism, "and in spite of the stare of the wise and the world's derision she dares to travel the star-blazed road—to follow the vision."

She never permits herself to be tied by precedent or proscribed by custom; she hates an ancient lie as she despises a new error. She realizes that—

To sin by silence, when we should protest,
Makes cowards out of men. The human race
Has climbed on protest. Had no voice been raised
Against injustice, ignorance, and lust,
The Inquisition yet would serve the law,
And guillotines decide our least disputes.
The few who dare must speak and speak again
To right the wrongs of many. Speech, thank God,
No vested power in this great day and land
Can gag or throttle. Press and voice may cry
Loud disapproval of existing ills;
May criticize oppression and condemn
The lawlessness of wealth-protecting laws
That let the children and childbearers toil
To purchase ease for idle millionaires.

The best citizen is not necessarily the one who has the biggest bones or the strongest thews. The strength that counts does not always consist in bodily vigor. Napoleon was a stronger man than Jack Johnson, and Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln were more powerful than John L. Sullivan and Jim Jeffries.

The characterization of woman by man as "the weaker vessel" has never found approval in my mind, and it is not justified by history. Aspasia was not inferior mentally to Pericles, and Queen Victoria surpassed all of her successors in the art of statecraft to a degree which amounts to a contrast rather than a comparison. Naturally woman is as strong mentally as man. She is superior in the matter of physical endurance, and in spiritual exaltation she towers above her brother as high as the sun hangs above the earth. She is the custodian of the morality of the race and the preserver and savior of racial purity of Caucasian manhood of America. In brute force, I admit, as a matter, of course, she is man's inferior; and wherever or whenever brute force predominates and superiority is arrogated by man to himself for his own selfish purposes man has universally denied woman equality of privilege and rights under the law. It has been but a few years since man denied to woman the right to use, even without his consent, the products of her own toil and to own and control property which belonged of right to her. But the world has grown bigger, better, and wiser, thank God, and tyranny has given place to justice.

The self-assumed obligation which women have so splendidly absolved by the great service they have rendered to humanity and to our Government in this desperate conflict, which fills the world with woe, has compelled American public sentiment at last to grant her political status. No; she is not "the weaker vessel"—

For I tell you at this hour the worth of this world's future depends upon her power.
And down the stream of ages as life's flood tides are told,
The record of its excellency is marked by the place that woman holds.

And she has made her place in the political world by force of will, pertinacity of purpose, and the inherent justice of her cause. Man has never done anything, he has never invented an engine, written a poem, painted a picture—in a word, achieved anything worthy of being remembered—but that there was behind him, sustaining him with her prayers, inspiring him with her love, and guiding him with her unerring intuition, some true, noble woman.

The influence of woman is needed at the ballot box to-day more urgently than ever before; and while I would very much prefer, because it is more in keeping with the original plan upon which our Government was established, that the privilege of voting should be given her by the respective States, I know the tardiness of State action, caused in many instances by local prejudices, has already too long delayed the consummation of this great desideratum, and it will delay it further. There is no reason or excuse for postponing the issue another day. The whole civilized world has suddenly become aroused to the injustice which humanity has suffered as the result of man's stupidity in withholding the right of suffrage from woman.

The sentiment has grown. It is sweeping over the world to-day with the irresistible force of the moving tide. It has in it the potency of truth and the certainty of eternal justice. You might as well undertake to exhaust the circumambient air with a hand pump or fight back the all-pervasive rays of the rising sun as to attempt to defeat this world-wide movement for cleaner politics, purer government, and a more enlightened civilization. It is as reasonable, certain, and sure as the law of gravitation. I have infinite reverence for antiquity, and for the wisdom of our forefathers I have great respect, but—

New conditions teach new duties;
Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward, still and onward,
Who would be abreast of truth.
Lo, before us gleams the campfire,
We ourselves must pilgrims be;
Launch our Mayflower and steer boldly
Through the desperate winter sea,
Nor attempt the future's portals
With the past's blood-rusted key.

I, along with other southern statesmen, have been deterred from rendering this great service to humanity and to my country and at the same time doing tardy justice to woman because of the presence of the overshadowing race problem which exists in its most acute form in the Southern States—a problem which falls like a blight, a poisonous dew, upon the fair section of this Republic which I have the honor in part to represent in this Chamber. And if I may be permitted to diverge at this point, I wish to say, Mr. President, conditions that will grow out of this war will enhance a thousandfold the difficulties incident to that problem. I was in hopes that the white men of the South would appreciate the necessity for prompt, effective action in treating the race problem and unite in an effort to eliminate the negro as a race from politics by law before woman should be invited to take part actually in the government of the Republic. But in that hope I have been disappointed. The white men of the South, especially the mentally myopic, selfish, soulless little politicians have been so dilatory and in some instances so indifferent to the gravity of the question that I have almost despaired of any immediate action on their part. There is, however, one thing certain. I shall not wait longer.

Mr. President, I am convinced that the enfranchisement of woman will bring verve and vigor, intelligence and sound judgment to the support of such measures as may be necessary for the solution of the great race problem, a problem which I would impress upon the Senate, although more acute in the Southern States, is as national in its nature and scope as ever emanated from the pregnant womb of time. I believe that the enfranchisement of woman, I repeat, will accelerate the processes which will lead to a proper settlement of this great issue.

I understand, Mr. President, that to give woman the ballot by the adoption of the pending amendment will involve to a certain extent a change in the machinery of our Government. But this amendment to the Constitution will be made in the regular constitutional way; and whatever changes are made will be made by the people themselves. There is nothing revolutionary or radical about the proposition at all. It is true that it involves the delegation of certain powers which heretofore have been exercised by the States, though in part only, and I would now prefer that the States should continue to exercise those powers. But I do not apprehend that any serious harm will result from the adoption of this amendment; and if any harm should possibly result, I think the known good will so much overbalance any possible evil that may grow out of the change—I am so certain of that that I shall, with great pleasure, resolve the doubt in favor of the pending amendment and vote for the resolution, inspired, I trust, by the highest sense of duty to my State, the Nation, and the world.

Mr. President, I should be uncandid if I failed to state in this presence that I realize also when I cast my vote for this amendment the force of the objection urged by some of my colleagues from the South that it is going to bring to the ballot box, along with the negro men, a few negro women. I also understand that the negro woman will be more offensive, more difficult to handle at the polls than the negro man, for "verily the female of that species is more deadly than the male." But when I realize that five white women will be added to the electorate where only two or three negro women can possibly be brought to the ballot box, the difficulties are minimized—the antidote will neutralize the poison.

There is another phase of this question which has not been overlooked by me; and the gravity of it calls for close and careful attention on the part of the southern white people. The military negro out of harness is a menace to the peace and prosperity of any country governed by the white man. As stated before, this war is going to intensify the difficulties which must be met at first by the southern white people. The arrogance and impudence of the ex-negro soldier will greatly enhance the white man's burden. The discussion of this matter, Mr. President, should not excite the ire of the northern statesman or offend the pretended patriotism of the average private citizen. It is an issue that must be met, and the sooner the American people realize that fact the better for the country. But the women of the South and of the North will help to bear this increased burden. Every thoughtful white man living beneath the folds of the Stars and Stripes, whether his place of residence be north, east, west, or south, knows that the white man and the negro can not live peaceably together in the same country on terms of political and social equality; and they also know that political equality where the races are nearly equally divided in the States means, ultimately, social equality; and social equality means race amalgamation; and race amalgamation means race deterioration, which is followed in turn by the disintegration and death of the white man's civilization.

Thomas Jefferson, the wisest political philosopher the world has ever known, in my judgment, saw the dangers involved in such an experiment a century ago; and Abraham Lincoln—that patriot with the soul of a seer and the eye of the prophet, who possessed the unusual capacity of correctly estimating the times in which he lived—verified and confirmed the apprehensions of Jefferson. God Almighty never intended that the negro should share with the white man sovereignty and dominion in this country; and it is wicked—a crime against the white race and an injustice to the negro—to attempt it. It never has been done successfully in any country, and never will be done. The Southern States of America present the only instance in the world's history where two races, equal in number, differing radically in racial traits and qualifications, have lived in the same country side by side for a half century, invested with equal political rights, without amalgamating, or one race expelling or exterminating the other. That has been accomplished in the South by the white men of the South by force of superior mentality and taking the matter in hand, often in violation of the letter and spirit of the Federal Constitution, and keeping up racial barriers and guarding with drawn sword the portals of the homes wherein dwells the purity of the Caucasian race.

It involved another thing which we might as well admit here—the setting at naught by mere State legislative expedients of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The fight in the future on this question must be made along racial lines; and the fight must be made, and will be made. Do not forget that. This problem must be solved upon scientific principles, and I believe the white women of America, whose intuition and high sense of preservation is so much keener than man's, will see the necessity for prompt and radical action upon this issue and therefore hasten the proper settlement of the problem.

There is not a normal white woman in the South who does not feel the dangers involved in physical proximity with the negro as a race. She knows it is a menace to the peace and purity of the white man's home, and therefore a menace to the white man's civilization, and as woman always instinctively looks out for the best interests of the home, the preservation, the education, and the development of the child, we can rely upon her to take the proper interest in this question of paramount importance when it becomes a political issue; and I think we can rely upon woman to do this without regard to the geography of her residence.

Mr. President, if the resolution proposed by the senior Senator from Mississippi, providing for the insertion of the word "white," shall be agreed to it will be a long step in the right direction and simplify very greatly the problem which the Nation must ultimately be called upon to solve. In a government deriving all of its just powers from the consent of the governed, just laws, responsive to the demands of the people, will require as a condition precedent homogeneity of race, consentaneity of judgment, and a common goal for all effort.

I do not think in this Republic any man or woman, other than the members of the Caucasian race, should be permitted to vote or perform the supreme function of citizenship; and I feel that way about it, not only for the protection of the Caucasian race and the preservation of the white man's civilization, but for the protection and promotion of the better interests of the negro and yellow races as well. It is an historical fact that the negro has never shown any sustained power of self-development. He has never created a language or a civilization. As a matter of fact, the only civilization that he has ever enjoyed has been engrafted upon him by a superior race; and that civilization, thus engrafted, universally lasts only so long as the negro is under the control and domination of the race that trained him.

Of course I have no hope that the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Mississippi will be adopted. It ought to be adopted, and I am glad the Senator has proposed it. I wish he had proposed it 10 years ago, and had supported it with all the force of his great mentality and his usual enthusiasm, but I do not think it is going to be agreed to now. Whether agreed to or not, however, I expect to vote for it, and, in the event it shall be defeated, to vote for the original amendment also.

To say that woman is the mental inferior of man is only to proclaim the ignorance of the person making the statement. I repeat, woman has risen to equality mentally with man in every emergency in the world's history. It is a singular fact, worthy of the consideration of this honorable body, that those nations that have accomplished most in art, in literature, in science, and have risen to the highest plane of civilization have shown the greatest respect and adoration for woman. That is true alike in ancient and modern times. The late erudite and eloquent Senator from Mississippi, the Hon. H. D. Money, a few years ago in this Chamber said:

"I have noted the struggle those people made in that the highest form of civilization with which we are acquainted in ancient history—the Greek. The Greeks were not only physically the most beautiful people who ever lived but by far the most acute and subtly intellectual. They have furnished to the world the greatest epic poem that was ever written, the greatest tragedy, the highest principles of human philosophy, the greatest specimens of oratory that were ever uttered, and the wittiest comedies that ever have been written. They have given us forms of government and examples of individual devotion to the State; they have given us the greatest examples of self-abnegation and public spirit. * * *

"The struggle of those people to maintain their liberties, considering their extreme advancement, especially in the golden age, the age of Pericles, the classic age of the Greeks, is one that fills the inquiring mind of the student with melancholy. Here was a nation of people, as proud of their history and personally of themselves, as has ever been known. They had achieved progress in sculpture, in painting, in architecture, in poetry, in philosophy, in eloquence, and oratory, and in rhetoric, which, as some English critic once said, 'Was not only the admiration but the despair of succeeding peoples.' They made every effort that men could make to keep in their grip the loosening bands of their political freedom. Their orators thundered their eloquence in the agora, their philosophers taught in the sacred grove of the academy. Socrates gave his disciples those profound lessons that reach to the immortality of the soul and the first vital principles of human action and human life, the copy of other philosophers since his day. * * * Their women were so wise that no Spartan warrior ever thought of taking any action without consulting with his wife; and we are told that when Cleomenes received the Persian ambassador, the ambassador laid before him first the request that everybody should leave the chamber, and they were ordered out.

"The ambassador said, 'Send away the child,' referring to Gorgo, the 9-year-old daughter of Cleomenes. The king responded, 'She is only 9 years old; let her play.' The ambassador began his speech—a very seductive speech. It tempted the Spartan king with splendors he had never dreamed of—magnificent presents and honors from him whom the Greeks were pleased to call 'the great king.' After a while the girl stopped from her play and said to her father, 'Get up, father, and leave the room or this stranger will corrupt thee,' and the king told the ambassador to leave the hall. The daughter was afterwards the wife of Leonidas, who fell at Thermopylæ, and the sister-in-law of Pausanias, who won the greatest battle the Greeks ever fought—the battle of Platæa, where the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and a few Legæans destroyed 300,000 Persians under Mardonius and their Theban and other allies.

"The influence of the Spartan women over the Spartan men is illustrated by the answer of this same Gorgo to one who said to her, 'Sparta is the only country in the world where the women rule the men.' She replied, 'And the Spartan women are the only ones who give birth to men.'"

Mr. President, Spartan women were no greater, more learned, more beautiful or refined than the women of America. The wisdom of woman has been demonstrated in every emergency in the world's history. The penetrating intuition of Pontius Pilate's wife, who had probably but once looked upon the pure, sad, majestic face of the Galilean Carpenter, caused her to warn her husband not to do Him wrong. How many a man has had his life utterly ruined and finished with failure when, if he had followed the advice of a wise, good woman, he would have had it crowned with glorious success? The inspiring, beneficial influence of woman in the home will be felt alike at the ballot box.

We must not forget the self-sacrificing conduct of woman, her willingness to immolate her precious self on the altar of her country's cause, in order to serve her race in the great emergency which overshadows the world to-day. We have but to look around us to see what woman is doing in this day of trial. In all the industrial walks of life she is taking the place of her husband, her father, and her brother, and she is doing the work well. When we consider further the fact that she is wholly inexperienced in such work which the exigency of the hour calls her to perform the success which crowns her every effort appears almost marvelous.

When we shall have won this war and our stainless flag comes back flaunting triumphantly in the air we shall be as much indebted to the women for the victory as to the men. There is no argument that can be advanced against giving woman the ballot. Prejudice and ignorance may loudly inveigh against it and the assertion of superiority may fall from the lips of bigotry, but to the serious student of public questions history is teeming with the examples of woman's wisdom and heroism too numerous to be mentioned in this discussion, which amply answer every objection.

They talk to me of woman's sphere
As though it had a limit;
There is not a place in earth or heaven,
There is not a task of mankind given,
There is not a blessing or a woe,
There is not a whispered yes or no,
There is not a life or death or birth,
That has a feather's weight of worth
Without a woman in it.

My estimate of woman is well expressed in the words employed by a distinguished author who dedicated his book to a "Little mountain, a great meadow, and a woman." "To the mountain for the sense of time, to the meadow for the sense of space, and to the woman for the sense of everything."

Mr. President, I deem myself fortunate to be a Member of the Senate which will, I trust, pass the joint resolution which will give the people of America an opportunity to vote woman the privilege of the ballot—a privilege so splendidly deserved, and yet so long delayed and withheld from her. I hope that her brave fight for political liberty and equality of opportunity is to be crowned at this session with the splendid success which will be achieved by the passage of this joint resolution by the Senate. It is the fulfillment of the dream that has glorified the brain and stimulated the efforts of the great forward-looking men and women who have stood out among their fellows—Apennine in character, intellectual Pikes Peaks above the shrub-covered hills of mediocrity. I am reminded that woman is about to enter the promised land of equality which the dreamers of her sex have described vividly for more than a half century. Mr. President, the dream has always been the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night to lead peoples out of the wilderness of oppression and over the highways of difficulties. The dreamer stands within the shadow of the night, and looks beyond it toward the coming light, and sees far off, with trance-prophetic eyes, the consummation of the centuries.

May great good grow out of this reform; may justice and truth mark the way of our Nation's future; may the wise and humane ideas which spring indigenous to the mind of woman help to save our Republic from the pitfalls into which other republics of the past have fallen. I believe that the influence of woman alone is capable of saving the world from the blood lust and greed for gain which seems now to poison the soul and dim the mental vision of mankind. If the women of the world had been consulted, there would have been no war, and if the women of the future are permitted to participate in the governments of the earth, peace and prosperity, equality of opportunity, enlightened justice, and good government will bless the world. The parliament of man and the federation of the world will come only through an understanding, mutual respect, and confidence of the people of the different countries of the earth. There can be no permanent world peace except that which shall be based upon human love, and the principles taught and bodied forth in the life of the Man of Galilee.

There is a destiny that makes us brothers,
None goes his way alone,
All that we send into the lives of others
Comes back into our own,

Mr. President, I think to confer upon woman the right of suffrage is the highest form of moral conservation. It is the one bright star that twinkles above the horizon of our Nation's future. It is a covenant with the future, a guaranty that the criminal blunders of the past shall not be repeated, and that this Republic shall henceforth be dedicated to the service of mankind, which is the most acceptable service to God, rather than to the service of Mammon. And that will answer the question—

When wilt Thou save the people?
Oh, God of Mercy, when?
Not kings and lords, but nations;
Not thrones and crowns—but men:
Flowers of Thy heart, O God! are they.
Let them not pass like weeds away!
Their heritage a sunless day.
God save the people!

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the question of how I should record my vote on this joint resolution has given me great concern. I am compelled to admit an unrelenting conflict between my own conviction as to the merits of extended suffrage and what I regard as my duty as a representative of a State. My own judgment is against the joint resolution. But since 1914 by legislative action the State of North Dakota has become a general suffrage State. The political platform of each and every party has declared for this Federal amendment. The State legislature, by an almost unanimous vote, has requested its congressional delegation to vote for it. Here is the State record on the subject of woman suffrage, and I give it that it may throw light on the position I shall be impelled to take in the matter:

The question of extending the right of equal suffrage to women was submitted to the people of the State of North Dakota in the fall election of 1914. The proposition was then defeated by a good, fair majority.

At the very next term of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, beginning in January, 1917, that body passed—and, as I am informed, by a large majority—an act which extended the right of suffrage to women to include the election of presidential electors and county, city, and township officers.

On what theory or process of reasoning these legislators acted in granting to women the right to vote to fill the highest and most important official positions in the United States, and also the lower official positions, and withheld the right to vote for the intermediate positions—extended the right to vote for President of the United States and withheld the right to vote for the governor of their own State—would require one more skilled in psychological phenomena than myself to decipher. I can only account for it on the grounds that there was, way back in the masculine consciousness, a reluctance to disrupt and shatter the social structure builded through centuries of human progress and so admirably conforming to the different powers and functions of each sex, and so, under the pressure of feminine solicitation, always a most potent power, they sought to salve the sense of repugnance by yielding just a little at a time. This law of four-fifths suffrage is a most grotesque one. During the same term of the State legislature in 1917 a concurrent resolution to the Federal Congress and the Senators and Representatives therein was passed, I am informed, by a nearly unanimous vote of both houses of the Legislature of North Dakota. This resolution reads as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate of North Dakota (the House of Representative concurring therein) as follows:

Whereas there is now pending before the National Congress of the United States an amendment to the Federal Constitution known as the Susan B. Anthony national suffrage amendment; and
Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota believes that the same should be submitted to the States of this Union as an amendment to our Federal Constitution: Now, therefore, be it
Resolved, That the State of North Dakota through its legislative assembly does herewith respectfully petition and urge the National Congress of the United States to favorably consider and early approve the said Susan B. Anthony national suffrage amendment; and be it
Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the Senators and Representatives of the State of North Dakota in Congress.

At the next ensuing term of the legislature and on the 29th day of January, 1918, the following resolution was passed by the North Dakota Legislature:

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States has passed a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending equal suffrage to the women of our Nation; and
Whereas the proposed amendment is now before the Senate of the United States for consideration; and
Whereas all the political parties in the State of North Dakota have declared in their platforms for equal suffrage; and
Whereas equal suffrage has been indorsed by the President of the United States: Therefore be it
Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That our Senators in Congress be urged to vote for the equal-suffrage amendment; and be it further
Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the President of the United States, and to the Secretary of State for the United States of America.

This resolution passed the house by a unanimous vote and passed the senate by a vote of 34 to 6. I especially note in this resolution what seems to be a growing sentiment in favor of extended suffrage. And this is emphasized in the third paragraph of the preamble which reads: "Whereas all the political parties in the State of North Dakota have declared in their platforms for equal suffrage." Conceding the right of the State to have its sentiment expressed through the legislature to the United States, when it is certain that the sentiment has had due and proper deliberation in the State, I have attempted through other sources to ascertain the sentiment of the public irrespective of that of the legislature. Since our entrance into this war, I am convinced that many sections of the State where the vote was strongest against the extended suffrage have, because of some influence which I shall not attempt to analyze, changed their viewpoint on the subject. I had hoped that before this matter should come up in the Senate again I might have had another expression from the people of the State themselves.

This, however, is the record of the State as it stands to-day, and while the question of public sentiment is not free from doubt, I can not remove from my mind the conviction that the people of the State to-day are as a whole in accord with their legislators whose actions, so far as I can learn, have never been criticized, but whose course in most cases has received the stamp of approval by reelection.

And, Mr. President, I feel that as a representative of the State I should vote their views rather than my own on the subject. However, I should do myself an injustice and should be guilty of a lack of candor and frankness if I did not freely admit that in casting a vote in the affirmative on this resolution I am registering what I believe to be the conviction of my State rather than my own judgment as to its wisdom and propriety.

To my mind this is not a political but a sex question, pure and simple. It is not a question involving a superior or inferior mental endowment, but rather a question of the division of labor, duties, and responsibilities between the two sexes. I dare say that the average girl of 21 understands the principles of this Government as well as the average boy of 21, and that if the privilege and duty of exercising the right of suffrage were imposed upon all alike, it is probable, other things being equal, that the girl of 60 will keep pace with the boy of 60.

If it be alleged that the bent of the girl's mind is naturally toward society or adornment to the exclusion of the more serious side of national life, I fear she can truthfully retort that our young men, as a rule, have far more accurate information on the baseball scores than on the drift of political affairs. That the one sex might be influenced more by the emotions and less by calmer reflection than the other is probably just as true as that the mind of the one is more emotional and the other more reflective. But to my mind the real question lies far more deeply embedded in the stratum of human nature.

Mr. President, from the time the cave man by skill or daring competed with the beast of the forests in the battle for food and brought to his cave the product of his strength and valor, from the time he stood at the mouth of his cavernous abode with club and ax of stone to guard against robber tribes or carniverous beast, from the time the cave woman fed her little brood safe behind his sheltering arm, up to the present crest of human enlightenment these two beings, man and woman, have been developing distinct and separate characters, harmonizing their lives, and deepening and intensifying their sentiments of admiration and love toward one another, man with the greater physical strength, firmness, courage, and endurance, the provider and defender; woman, frail of form and more tender of sentiment, the beautifier of the home, maintaining and blessing the world at the shrine of motherhood.

Mr. President, our characters are not builded in our schools but in our homes, and perfected in all the avenues of active life with all their duties and responsibilities. And talk as much as you will, preach to the limit of endurance, there is one truth that deep down in our hearts will ever remain unshaken. That unassailable truth is this: Each sex finds in the divergent nature, character, and mental traits of the other that which quickens admiration, enhances esteem, deepens the sympathies, better secures the sanctity of home, and assures the happiness of humanity.

And while, Mr. President, I have no fear that womanly character or manly character, which the Lord has been millions of years in developing, can be changed in any brief period by changes of laws or conditions of life; while I regard as worse than childish the fear that mothers will lose the sentiment of motherhood, the strongest, deepest, holiest tie on earth, will lose that natural instinct which has made it possible for the human family to survive and on which it must ever depend, and will thereby neglect their children or household duties by widening their sphere of activity or increasing their responsibilities; while I believe the real masculine nature will still regard it a privilege as well as a proud duty to provide for and protect, and real feminine nature will still realize its deepest joy as the recipient of that masculine sentiment, my own observation has taught me that common vocations converging and leading the masculine and feminine minds into and along channels of common thought and sentiment, and even common earning capacity, relieving the one from any dependence and the other from the consequential duty which such dependence imposes, the disarrangement of the old plan of provider on the one hand and home maker on the other, dulls these sentiments and weakens that magnetic attraction which is the soul of home.

So, too, Mr. President, I have little patience with the argument that women need the ballot to protect them against their masculine kin. I know, as every man must know, that no woman has ever found or ever will find in her own sex a kindlier consideration, a truer friendship, or a more sympathetic deference than that which she ever receives from men. The records of our courts, with their men jurors, with their almost universal acquittals of women charged with offense, even though their hands be encarmined, speak such volumes against this assertion that I can not understand how in candor it could ever be made. In our courts she ever finds in masculine nature an asylum of protection, even though she may have committed great wrong. While the mind may be convinced beyond any doubt, the masculine heart finds it almost impossible to pronounce the word "guilty" against a woman.

And, Mr. President, fathers, sons, and brothers guarding the lifeboats until every woman, from the highest to the lowest, has been made safe, waving adieu with a smile of cheer on their lips, while the wounded vessel slowly bears them to a strangling death and a watery tomb, belie the charge.

To-day, on the fields of France, our soldiers are battling, suffering, dying for the sacred cause of all humanity. And he who declares that these fathers, brothers, sons are incapable of defending, or can not be trusted to defend and protect every interest of wife, mother, and sister slanders our American manhood.

I repeat, Mr. President, the question is not one of comparative abilities of the two sexes or of the necessity of the one to defend herself against the other. It is a question of division of labor in the scheme of human advancement. Her eye may be as true, her aim may be as sure, but the soldier's sword could never be fashioned to fit her hands, and the fact that she bears her part in every war, nursing the wounded, rearing the young, the fact that she shares in common with the fighting men in all the sufferings and agonies of war and must suffer in common the results of defeat, carries no argument that she should, therefore, in common with men shoulder the musket or charge over the trenches. Her work and her duties, while none the less important, are and must forever be of a different character.

Closely associated with this feature is another, to my mind even more important. The political field always has been and probably always will be an arena of more or less bitter contest. The political battles leave scars as ugly and lacerating as the physical battles, and the more sensitive the nature the deeper and more lasting the wound. And as no man can enter this contest or be a party to it and assume its responsibilities without feeling its blows and suffering its wounds, much less can woman with her more emotional and more sensitive nature.

But, Mr. President, you may ask why should she be relieved from the scars and wounds of political contest? Because they do not affect her alone but are transmitted through her to generations yet to come. And whether the child's heart pulsates beneath her own or throbs against her breast, motherhood demands above everything else tranquility, freedom from contest, from excitement, from the heart burnings of strife. The welfare, mental and physical, of the human race rests to a more or less degree upon that tranquillity. To so shield and guard her is a husband's and father's most sacred duty, and to so relieve her, in my opinion, is the obligation of human society.

While, Mr. President, I do not think that extending the suffrage to women will as a rule do more than increase the total vote, provided the same proportionate number of all classes of women avail themselves of the ballot, their abhorrence of war may throw the weight of public sentiment against a very just and necessary war. The masculine mind will look further ahead and give greater weight to remote consequences to country than will the feminine mind. The greatest danger to any country is that it should yield to unjust encroachment upon its rights by another and so yielding become gradually weaker and weaker until in the end it is subverted by the other. I confess, Mr. President, some fear that in this extended suffrage we may weaken that firm, national policy upon which the progressive welfare of the Nation depends

When the seas are calm and the winds but play it might not matter what hands guided the ship of state. But when the black and ominous clouds of war are gathering, when the sound of the tempest is heard afar, or the storm comes rushing on I feel—yes, I know—we need the masculine hand and the masculine heart, with all its unyielding firmness—yes, with all its belligerency—at the helm. And I can not but feel that it would be a real danger to a nation if, at such a time of stress, out of the darkness should come a voice equal in control, "I want to stand by my country, but I can not vote for war."

Mr. President, these are my personal convictions. But my State has spoken through its legislative enactment, granting the right of women to vote for the highest office in the land. It has spoken through its resolutions, which have twice passed its legislature by an almost unanimous vote, requesting its Members of Congress to support this amendment and submit the question to the judgment of three-fourths of the States of the Union. It has so spoken through the declarations of the platforms of every political party in the State; and I can not but feel that, with this record and as one of the sovereign States of the Union, it has a right to insist that its wish rather than the judgment of a single representative be recorded on this proposed amendment. And, therefore, yielding my own convictions to what would appear to be the almost universal sentiment of my State, I shall cast the vote of the State rather than my own conviction on this resolution.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I believe firmly in giving to women the right of suffrage on perfect equality with men and shall vote for the pending amendment to the Constitution, which provides that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of sex.

My views on this subject were formed several years ago, and have been matured and strengthened by the most careful study and deliberation. On July 31, 1913, I said in the Senate that "I was in favor of the joint resolution giving the right of suffrage to women and would do what I could to secure its adoption." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 1st sess., p. 2947.)

Since then I have been a member of the Committee on Woman Suffrage and have joined in several reports favoring the pending amendment. My position as a strong advocate of woman suffrage has been frequently stated publicly and privately during the last five years and was well known in this city and throughout my State.

It is a source of deep regret that my views on suffrage differ from those of many friends in Louisiana and elsewhere, for whose opinions I have the highest respect. In particular do I regret that the Legislature of Louisiana recently memorialized Congress in opposition to this measure. Members of that legislature were inspired by the loftiest motives, and I have no criticism of their action. They performed their duty as they saw it, and I shall do mine as I see it.

It gratifies me extremely to know that in voting for woman suffrage I am in company with those loyal southern Senators, CULBERSON and SHEPPARD, of Texas; JONES and FALL, of New Mexico; ASHURST and SMITH, of Arizona; GORE and OWEN, of Oklahoma; ROBINSON and KIRBY, of Arkansas; MCKELLAR, of Tennessee; and VARDAMAN, of Mississippi, not to mention CHAMBERLAIN, of Oregon, and PITTMAN, of Nevada, who are sons of Mississippi by birth and rearing.

Two other southerners whose names are highest on the roll of fame are also ardent suffragists; CHAMP CLARK, of Kentucky and Missouri, one of the wisest and most patriotic men in America; and that great son of Virginia and New Jersey, Woodrow Wilson, whose heart is as loyal to the South as to every other portion of the Republic, who embraces the whole world in his grasp of subjects affecting the welfare of the human race—by long odds the ablest statesman on earth. Mr. CLARK recently introduced a resolution at a meeting of the national Democratic congressional committee indorsing the pending amendment, and it was adopted unanimously. President Wilson has repeatedly announced his approval of this amendment, and only a short while ago gave out a public statement earnestly appealing to the Senate to vote in favor of it. I have several times discussed the question with him and know personally there is no stronger supporter of suffrage for women by amendment to the Federal Constitution than our President. He is a safe leader and no harm will come to the South or to any part of the Union from following him.

Some of our southern friends insist that there is grave danger in giving negro women the right to vote, and for that reason they oppose the Federal amendment, while willing for women to vote under State laws. I can not believe there is such a menace from this source as warrants the whole Nation in refusing to adopt the suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution. In my judgment the situation as to negro women can be handled as has been done with negro men for the past 25 years. Negroes in the South are prosperous, happy, and contented. They are acquiring homes, are rapidly becoming educated, are mastering all of the trades and some of the professions, are good, law-abiding citizens, and are working out the salvation of their race in peace and amity with their white neighbors and friends. As a rule they do not attempt to vote in States where there are a great many negroes, like South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, but are satisfied with their lot and are as well cared for as any laboring people on earth—infinitely better than those of Mexico, South America, Europe, and Asia. It is inconceivable that these conditions will be destroyed or even interfered with by permitting women to vote.

The whole Nation is united now as never before. There is no longer any South, North, East, or West, but we are one great, patriotic, loyal people bound together by ties which can never be broken, and there is not the slightest danger that Congress will ever attempt to pass sectional election laws that would ruin any part of the Republic. This particular phase of the subject has given me the greatest solicitude, because so many of my friends take a different view; but I have worked it out to the very best of my ability with the same earnestness and sincerity of purpose which influences them, and I trust they know me well enough to feel that if I were in doubt I would not insist upon following my own opinion, which is that the passage of this amendment will prove very helpful to the South and to the Nation.

The Creator never intended man to be superior to woman and to enjoy rights and privileges denied to her. Man established for himself by brute force in the early dawn of civilization the higher place he has occupied in the political and business world, but his action in so doing was not founded on justice, and should be righted, like all other wrongs.

To refuse suffrage to women because of their sex while giving it to men is legislative unfairness which no one can justify. Suffrage is not a natural right. Neither man nor woman has an inherent right to vote because he or she is 21 years of age, but votes because the law permits it. Minors, insane persons, and those convicted of felony are not permitted to vote anywhere in the Union; and the right to vote is denied in 35 of our sovereign States to women who are college presidents, lawyers, doctors, bankers, heads of business firms, ministers of the gospel, college graduates, and leaders in every movement for human betterment, while most of these same States give suffrage to illiterate men who can not read the ballots they are voting nor speak the English language, and many of whom at this crucial moment, when the liberty of mankind is at stake, are avoiding military service because of sympathy with our enemies. Surely this is not giving women the "square deal" of which good Americans boast so proudly.

Males and females are equal before the law in their responsibility for crime, payment of taxes, and most of the obligations of citizenship, and they should be equals in lawmaking. Certain duties, such as military and jury service, have not been imposed upon women, as a rule, but there is no reason why they should not be as good jurors as men; and the function laid by nature on women, of bearing, rearing, and training patriotic citizens and soldiers is more onerous and important to the Nation's welfare than mere military service. Moreover, soldiers can not fight well unless properly clothed, fed, munitioned, and nursed, and all these essentials to war fall very heavily upon women. They are doing a noble part in the present world war, and their services are just as necessary to success as are those of our heroic soldiers.

Suffragists have the best of the argument on all sides. The opposition is due to sentiment rather than to sound reason. Practically I see no valid objection to woman suffrage, and feel certain that none of the womanly qualities of the gentler sex will be lost by voting. Women in several of our States and in many countries of the world have voted for years, and there is no evidence that they are less womanly than before or have been changed in any way; they are just the same.

Women are permitted to vote in Louisiana's sister States—Arkansas and Texas. They vote in 13 States of the Union and in every English-speaking country on the globe, with the single exception of the United States. Is it possible that this great, free country, which is spending countless billions of wealth and giving many thousands of its best young lives to "make the world safe for democracy" is going to longer deny this plain, simple act of justice to the better half of its citizens? I can not believe it, and am firmly convinced the Senate will demonstrate by its vote to-day that we are practicing at home the democracy we preach for mankind.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the particular amendment which is now before the Senate, but to offer as briefly as possible and in as condensed a way as possible the reasons which prompt me to oppose this joint resolution.

I am opposed to the joint resolution for the following reasons:

First. If and when woman suffrage is desired, it may be obtained through the States. There is no question about that, and my convictions of a lifetime compel me to insist that is the only safe or wise method to pursue.

Second. The joint resolution proposes the most impracticable, if not impossible, way to get woman suffrage, because involved in this procedure are dangerous precedents. Federal control of elections, race problems, and the necessity for conducting campaigns for ratification in at least 36 States, while in some States, if not in all, campaigns for submission of the proposition to the people of those States must be considered.

Third. The proposal to enfranchise 2,000,000 additional voters of the same class as provided under the fifteenth amendment, and at the same time and thereby accentuate and add to the strength of Federal control of elections in the States, does not commend itself to my judgment and conscience.

Fourth. I am not willing to have States outside the South vote upon the States in the South laws that will tax and complicate problems and burdens which the States so voting do not understand or have to contend with. I take the same position with regard to States in the South putting upon other States laws which may be oppressive to them.

Fifth. The fifteenth amendment was a mistake, and it is so recognized by other sections of the country. I do not believe we remedy that by repeating it.

Sixth. The most controlling reason I offer is that which reaches to the foundation principle of the Republic, to wit, each State has, and it is vital that each State preserve, the absolute right to say who shall vote for its State officers.

Without keeping this principle of local self-government inviolate, the Republic, as the fathers saw it, can not endure. That doctrine, sometimes discarded, somewhat worn, the doctrine of State rights, to my mind, is still vital and indispensable.

"The principle of local rule and a representative agency to carry the expression of that local power into national affairs" was settled by the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution. The late Justice Harlan well declared:

> Any serious departure from that principle would bring disaster upon the American system.

If I say to California and Washington what the measure of their electorate, respectively, shall be, what argument shall I present to those States if they undertake to say "You shall pass no law prohibiting the marriage of people of the white and negro races in Florida"?

If Florida assumes to dictate the laws upon which the electorate may exercise the privilege of voting for officers in New York and Massachusetts, what answer have I if those States undertake to say to Florida "We propose to determine who shall own real estate in Florida"?

On the other hand, if Washington and California undertake to dictate the qualifications of voters in Florida or to take away from Florida the right, always recognized and undisputed, to control and determine the question of franchise, what can they say if Florida, New York, and Massachusetts then say, "We insist that by amendment to the Federal Constitution you shall not discriminate against the Japanese and Chinese entering your schools or owning your lands"?

How would these States like to have the thousands of Japanese and Chinese women there given the suffrage? My contention is that is their problem, and we should leave it to them.

It is fundamental that the States are vital parts of our system of government, and as such their powers must be maintained as essential to the preservation of our liberties. They possess, and we must so recognize, all governmental powers not granted to the General Government, expressly or by implication, and that are not inconsistent with their own constitutions or with the Constitution of the United States or with a republican form of government.

Justice Miller, one of our greatest jurists, said:

> In my opinion the first and equal observance of the States and of the General Government as defined by the Constitution is as necessary to the permanent prosperity of our country and to its existence for another century as it has been for the one whose close we are now celebrating.

This joint resolution contains a second section, providing that—

> The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

We had Federal officers in charge of the polls at one time in Florida; do we want them again? I hold that the people of Florida, directly interested, are capable of prescribing the manner of conducting elections and the proper system of holding them in that State, and I am not willing to transfer to other authority the power to fix a different time, to require a different ballot, to provide a different registration system, or to put on us a primary law which our people would find highly objectionable and would be unable to change.

Seventh. The Constitution originally provided and still provides for the House of Representatives to be apportioned according to population. Section 2 of the fourteenth amendment—happily a dead letter—provides that the basis of representation shall be reduced under certain conditions in the proportion which the adult males whose voting privilege is "in any way abridged" bears to the whole number of male citizens. If this joint resolution is adopted and ratified by 36 States, we still have a House of Representatives based upon the total population—men, women, and children—elected by men and women, and subject to reduction in membership with respect to the qualifications of one-half the electors who choose its Members.

Eighth. The platform of the Democratic Party of 1916 declares:

> Women suffrage: We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country BY THE STATES upon the same terms as to men.

That platform is existing party law.

Ninth. The State Democratic executive committee, at its meeting in Jacksonville in February last, voted down overwhelmingly a resolution calling on the Senators and Representatives from Florida in Congress to vote for the joint resolution respecting woman suffrage.

Tenth. The question of woman suffrage is one for the people of each State to settle for themselves.

The sole sovereignty of this Government was intended from its inception to rest in the people. The people of Florida have affirmed a constitution which expressed their view. If they desire to change or modify it on this question, it is for them to determine. No other State helped make that constitution and all other States have no business to change it. Only the people of Florida have that right.

This covers the present issue and the whole of it. There can be no other for consideration until the legislature, if that is done, submits a proposed amendment to the State constitution to the people of Florida.

It will be noted that I am not basing my opposition to the submission of this proposed amendment on the merits or demerits of woman suffrage, but rather on the grounds, for the reasons stated, I believe it proposes an unwise and unjustifiable encroachment of the Federal power, upon the wisely reserved powers of the State.

One thing more. It has been urged, upon the floor of the Senate and elsewhere, that we are not asked to pass upon the merits of this question, but merely to submit the proposed amendment to the legislatures—not the people, but the legislatures, bear in mind—of the several States for their ratification or rejection. I can not agree with this view any more than I could vote for any ordinary matter of legislation before this body on the theory that we were merely "submitting" it to the President for his approval or veto. Every State has a voice in the election of the President; three-fourths of the State legislatures would determine this matter.

The Constitution of the United States provides two ways in which amendments may be submitted—by a vote of two-thirds of the Members of each House, or by a convention called by Congress upon application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States. In the latter case the duties of Congress are limited to the calling of the convention and providing whether the amendments submitted by them shall be ratified by the State legislatures or by conventions in the several States. We have no discretion whatever as to the wisdom or policy of calling such a convention and no control of the amendments it might propose. We could only obey the plain mandates of the Constitution and call the convention, upon application by the required number of States. But where an amendment is sought, as in this instance, through the initiative of Congress, I hold that each Member of the legislative branch is chargeable with all the responsibility that attaches in matters of ordinary legislation; and more, because the Constitution is the fundamental law of the land and itself limits our right to initiate amendments to those cases which we deem "necessary," not merely cases involving only questions of expediency or temporary policy, and once we pass this resolution, it is beyond our recall. Unless the proposed change is one which this body believes to be a "necessary" one to make to the Federal Constitution, we have no right to adopt or pass it; and when we do so, we send it to the legislatures of the several States with the sanction of the Congress of the United States, whatever the mental reservation of any individual Member.

My objection primarily to the joint resolution as it now stands is, as I have heretofore attempted to make clear, that it proposes a radical change in the fundamental relations of the State and Federal Governments, denying to the several States the right of controlling their own suffrage qualifications, which I regard as essential not only to the preservation of the theory of our Government, but as a very grave practical consideration in my own State and neighboring States with similar domestic problems.

I also object most seriously to the resolution as it now stands for the additional reason, as before stated, that it puts it within the power of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States not only to work a radical and irrevocable change in the suffrage system provided by their State constitutions, which may be amended only with the concurrence of the people of such States, but also permits this radical change to be foisted upon States where neither the people nor their chosen representatives favor it.

Congress has always possessed absolute power over suffrage qualifications in the Territories and in the District of Columbia, everywhere in fact subject to the jurisdiction of the United States outside of the sovereign States. If a recognition by the Federal Government of the principle of equal participation of the sexes in the voting privilege would be of any benefit to the Nation in the present world situation, such recognition can be given by extending the vote to women on the same basis as men in jurisdictions subject already to the full control of the Federal power, without the necessity of effecting a revolution in the vital, reserved powers of the States composing our Union.

I am willing to go that far to accomplish this and no more. Accordingly, I shall, when it is in order, move, Mr. President, to amend the resolution by striking out in line 11, page 1, the words "or by any State," so that section 1 will read as follows:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be abridged by the United States on account of sex.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HARDWICK obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Gulon	Martin, Ky.	Sherman
Bankhead	Hale	Martin, Va.	Shields
Beckham	Harding	Myers	Simmons
Borah	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Henderson	New	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Smith, Mich.
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Smoot
Cummins	Kellogg	Page	Sterling
Curtis	Kendrick	Penrose	Thompson
Dillingham	Kenyon	Phelan	Trammell
Drew	King	Pittman	Underwood
Fall	Kirby	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Fernald	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh
Fletcher	Lenroot	Ransdell	Warren
France	Lewis	Reed	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Robinson	Weeks
Gerry	McCumber	Saulsbury	Wilfley
Goff	McKellar	Shafroth	Wolcott
Gronna	McNary	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I have some observations I wish to submit to the Senate in opposition to this joint resolution. I am opposed to it on three grounds, every one of which is totally disconnected with the proposition as to whether women ought to be allowed to vote, on the merits of that question taken alone, or not.

In the first place, I am opposed to this as a Democrat, and can demonstrate in any forum where reason prevails that no Democratic Senator in good faith can vote for it.

In the second place, I am opposed to it as a Senator from the South, and I think I can demonstrate that the interests of the South are such that this measure ought not possibly to receive serious consideration at the hands of this body.

In the third place, I am opposed to it as an American citizen who believes in the fundamentals of the American system of government, and I think I can demonstrate that any American citizen who believes in the American system of government that our fathers founded and which we have so far maintained can not support this proposition.

Mr. President, in the national platforms of the two parties in 1916 I find these expressions. First, from the Democratic Party:

We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

There is not a Democratic Senator present who does not know the history that lies back of the adoption of that plank. There is not a Democratic Senator who does not know that the plank was written here in Washington and sent to the convention and represented the deliberate voice of the administration and of the party on this question, which was to remit this question to the several States for action. And let me say now what I then said, that a more consistent course for Democrats could not possibly have been suggested, one more in accordance with their principles and traditions.

It is true there was a recommendation—I did not approve of it—that the States should be requested one by one to adopt this suffrage amendment, but that was a matter of taste. The recommendation of the convention had no binding effect upon any one of the States, and on matters of taste I did not feel that there was any room for any serious objection, although I was opposed to the recommendation.

Now, that being true, if a party is to live up to its platform after election, if a party is to stand after the election where it promised in its plank asking the people to support it with its suffrages, then I do not see how Democratic Senators can vote to do something absolutely different from what we promised to the people to do in the platform in 1916, from what we then pledged the people we would do if we were given political power in the two Houses of Congress.

It has always seemed to me that parties as well as individuals ought to be governed by principles of honor. If parties or individuals go out before the country promising the people when they are seeking to obtain their suffrage that they will maintain certain positions, and do that before election and at the election, then it seems to me after the election the question is foreclosed and the party is honorably bound until it makes another platform and goes to the people at a time when the people have a right to vote again stating that it is going to change its position, and then give the people a chance to vote for or against the party candidates after full notice that the position of the party has been changed, and exactly how it has been changed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator contend that there is anything in that platform that binds the Democratic Party to insist that woman suffrage be adopted by State action only? Does it not say "we recommend"?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It does not preclude by any prohibitory words the proposal of a national amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Colorado knows full well that this was a recognition by the party of the ancient Democratic principle that in matters of local concern the States were to be supreme and their jurisdiction was to be exclusive. The Senator from Colorado knows full well that the platform was written with the concurrence of the administration, which was then seeking reelection at the hands of the American people.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the wording of the plank itself is not of a prohibitory nature. It is simply a recommendation for them to do it, which recommendation for years before has been adopted by many States. National amendment has not been regarded as something that should not be permitted. The recommendation, as I understand it, is simply that we recommend to the States to adopt woman suffrage. There is no objection whatever to doing it that way, but there is nothing in the language of the plank that is prohibitory of its being done any other way.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that is quite true. But the Senator from Colorado knows that he and other Senators from the Western States where this franchise has already been granted were begging and demanding and threatening the Democratic Party if the suffrage plank they insisted on was not adopted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think I was threatening, but I was begging.

Mr. HARDWICK. You were threatening about the election. I do not mean in a personal way, of course.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We did not have that matter up. We were asking the Democratic Party in the national convention assembled to do it, asserting that it was the part of wisdom to do it.

Mr. HARDWICK. And you said we would lose the election if we did not do it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And that it was a part of the system of our Government that we should do it. That was the theory on which we urged it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not mean my remarks to have more than a general application to the Senator—but we were warned that unless we did it and did adopt the recommendation, if the Democratic Party did not insert the proposition to so amend the National Constitution, we would lose the election, that we could not carry the Western States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. This plank was enacted in direct response to and in direct negation of that demand.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator must let me answer, for he has asked a question. I understand what he means.

But the President of the United States then stood against the Senator's views and then stood on the ancient Democratic doctrine that each State should settle for itself the qualifications of its own electors, and was reported in the newspapers to have sent this particular plank in the platform from Washington, supposedly by the hands of one of his Cabinet officers. The Senator knows, and everyone in this body knows, and everyone in this country with a memory that is two years old knows, that it was in denial of this very demand that you are making to-day that we said at St. Louis in 1916 that we would remit this question to the States, where it belonged.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator will remember that the Republican Party had held its convention and had adopted a similar provision.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will not anticipate me, I am going to come to that right now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now I want to address my Republican friends. Let us see what were the promises to the people. You said:

> The Republican Party, reaffirming its faith in government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of the country, favors the extension of the suffrage to women, but recognizes the right of each State to settle this question for itself.

In other words, faced by this same demand on the eve of an election, when you were asking the people of America to give you their votes, you replied that you would not do it; that you, too, would stand by the basic American principle of local self-government; that you would stand by this fundamental doctrine, on which our American system itself rests, that each State should settle for itself in its own manner and according to its own will what should be the qualifications of its electorate.

Now, what happened? We had just as well be frank about it. The suffrage movement is gaining strength and force in the country. A great many politicians and a great many Senators—and of course the terms are by no means synonymous—have come to the conclusion that this is going to happen, and they are all trying to get on the band wagon first, so that when the votes are given to women, if they should ever be given to women, they may claim that they did it. And each party is vying with the other in the speed and alacrity with which it can reverse its position and gain the favor of these future electors. That is the situation. There is no need to mince words about it. We know what it is. Both parties think that this movement is going to succeed, and each party is trying to get ahead of the other in proving to the American people that it is more willing than the other to break its plighted word.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that this sentiment has been growing for years, and the statement contained in the Declaration of Independence, that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, was the power and force which ultimately would bring this result, unless you deny that women are not subject to the jurisdiction of government?

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator for his interruption, but it is by no means pertinent to the question I have just suggested. I said I thought this movement was gaining strength, and I think both parties are playing politics about it. That is all there is to it. We promised the people we would not do this by the Federal Government. Both parties remitted it to the jurisdiction of the States when they came to write their platforms two years ago on the eve of the last election, and now both are striving to show the American people how easily they can break their promises, each with more alacrity than the other. My remarks are by no means partisan. They cover the whole field, and cover it impartially and truly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have the Senator show wherein the Democratic convention promised anything in its platform to the effect that it would not enforce suffrage by a Federal constitutional amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Democratic Party did not promise any more than the Republican Party, but it did not promise any less. The demand was that our party provide for an amendment as a matter of national program, and they replied to it by saying, "We will remit it to the States, where it belongs." That is what your party and mine did, and that is what both of the parties are now trying to get away from, whether we like it or whether we do not. We had just as well be frank about it.

Of course we might say that this was merely another illustration of the truth of that saying that has come almost to be an adage in American politics—that platforms are written only to get elected on and not to stand on after you get elected.

But there is vastly more than that in it. I object to this amendment as one of the Senators from the South. I object to it in behalf of many imperial States in the southern portion of this Republic, whose free institutions may be imperiled by the ease and carelessness and alacrity with which you rush into this sort of business.

Mr. President, in the period that is to follow the war, the South, in my judgment, is going to have a heavier white man's burden to carry than it ever had in that period of reconstruction which followed the Civil War. That may sound like a strong statement to Senators who do not live in the South and who may not understand the situation there; but let me point out to you how true it is and how accurate my words are on this question. Under the State constitutions of the 11 Southern States most of them have attempted to get rid of the awful mistake made during the reconstruction period at the close of our Civil War on this very suffrage question; that most of the wisest men in the Republican Party now admit was a mistake. I say, in the attempt to avoid the ruinous effect of that mistake the States of the South wrote constitutions in which they disfranchised ignorance and in which they put a premium on military service. The conditions were such in the South that it was impossible to impose or to get passed simply a straight educational test for the whole electorate. The South had been impoverished as a result of the Civil War; it had not recovered; it was impossible to pass straight educational tests that were no more than educational tests, because the effect would have been to disfranchise too many white people. That was the actual condition that confronted us when these so-called disfranchisement acts were adopted in the Southern States, and we acted accordingly.

Therefore, in the constitution of most of those Southern States the language was written that military service either in behalf of the United States or the States, in any war in which the United States or any one of the Southern States had engaged, or descent from a person who had rendered such military service should qualify a male person to be a voter and to remain on the voters' list if he was 21 years of age and was otherwise qualified, even if he did not possess the educational or property qualifications required in the constitution.

Now, this war has come on. We have drafted impartially from the male population of the South, and if the war lasts long we will draft hundreds of thousands and it may be a million or more negroes of voting age in the South, who will go into the service of the country under the Stars and Stripes and to France. When they come back, under our own State constitution, the only one we could write under the Constitution of the United States, they come back as fully enfranchised as any white voter in any one of the States, and they come back exempt from the educational tests and the property tests of the States of the South.

Not only that, but—I say this in the utmost of kindness and good feeling toward my friends who sit on the other side of the Chamber—we are liable to be treated to a revival of the race question in this body and throughout this country that will far surpass anything that we ever saw or heard at the close of the Civil War. We are liable to have a new crop of perfectly good-intentioned and well-meaning people, like Harriet Beecher Stowe and William Lloyd Garrison, who were honest enough in their own way. I am not throwing anything on their memory—I know how you revere them—but they were not acquainted with the practical conditions that existed in the South, and whom I think your wiser statesmen now admit did not have sufficient moderation and judgment to deal with the political phases of the great race problem that followed and resulted from the Civil War. This question is going to be revived with redoubled force, because honest but impracticable men in the North and West are going to insist after the war is over that the black men from the South who went to France and who stood under the Stars and Stripes and risked their lives in their country's cause are entitled to the same rights—personal, political, social, and everything else—in the South or anywhere else in this Republic that any white man is entitled to. I can see the force, the tremendous driving force, of that sort of an appeal upon people who have not any considerable number of negroes among them.

The race question is largely a question of numbers. It is the presence of numbers that makes it vital and keeps it alive. It is all right in your States, it may be, not only to contend for that doctrine but to put it in actual force, although I should not like to see it done even there. But when you go to a State that has a population half black and half white, and in some cases more black than white, and undertake to carry that sort of a policy into effect it would be destruction and ruin and worse.

Gentlemen, I speak from the standpoint of the South, in view of the tremendous problem that we must face and solve, the awful burden that we must carry at the conclusion of this great struggle; I bid you pause before you put your feet into the very footprints of the same mistake that your fathers made just after the Civil War. You have adopted the very language of the fifteenth amendment, and yet you have stood here complacently for many years and submitted, because you thought it was wise statesmanship to submit. I am not criticizing you for it; I honor you for it. I am simply calling your serious attention to the fact that this effort to nullify the control of the States over their own electorates is dangerous to a degree, and is wrong in principle.

I warn you, Senators, when another war comes on and hysteria again reigns in your land that you will not insist immediately on making the same mistake you made in 1869, and on making it at a time when it will do infinitely more harm than it did after the Civil War. I assert, as far as the South is concerned, that this is a grave question, and that our whole civilization is bound up in it; our whole economic, civil, political, industrial life is at stake. I tell you that you had better stand by the doctrine of permitting each State in the Union to regulate its own domestic concerns and internal affairs, and you had better not overturn the fundamental principles of the American system that is almost as important as the existence of the National Government itself.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will not the Senator recognize that this question is not the product of this war; that it has been growing year by year; that four years ago we took a vote in this Chamber and carried it by a majority of one? It seems to me that it can not be said that this is the product of any hysteria during this war.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I have listened to that argument, and I expect the Senator is going to make the same argument. I would not be so ungallant as to dispute with the Senator or any Senator present on the abstract subject of woman's worth. Women have done so much for the country in this war, about it and in connection with it, that you contend that they have demonstrated their ability to vote, and you are using the hysteria that inheres in any war time to enhance the strength and power and force of this movement, which I think will be defeated, and I believe it is going to defeat whenever the vote is taken here, to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. President, I have an objection to it not only as an honest Democrat who wants to stand on the pledges that his party made when he went to seek the suffrages of the people two years ago, not only as a southern man who fears to the very depths of his being and to the bottom of his soul the danger to the South if there is any tinkering with this question, but I also want to protest against it for the third and last and, if possible, the very strongest of all reasons, as a believer in the fundamental American principles.

It is true that you propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and in manner and form you comply with the requirements of our organic law. If two-thirds of each House of Congress will submit this proposition and three-fourths of the legislatures of the States should ratify it, of course it would be a part of our Constitution and the Constitution would itself be changed to that extent. But, Mr. President, the question I raise is far different from that. There are certain fundamental and basic principles that underlie the Constitution itself, on which the Constitution itself rests, that can not be violated even in the guise or under the form of an amendment to the Constitution without doing violence to the American system of government, without endangering the success of the system of American Government in the years that are yet to come.

Let me illustrate. I will take an extreme case to make my meaning clear. Suppose it should be suggested in the form of a constitutional amendment that we should abolish the Republic in this country and should set up a limited monarchy in lieu thereof, and provision should be made for the naming of a king under that form of government, what would you say to the proposition, if two-thirds of both Houses of Congress submitted and three-fourths of the States of the Union agreed to it? It would then become a part of the Constitution of the country and a part of the organic law of the country. It is unthinkable, and yet if that were to happen, if three-fourths of our people became believers in monarchy and deserted the principles of democracy and republicanism and undertook to set up over the other one-fourth of this country a monarchy or despotism, I think the right of revolution would be the only remedy on this earth that could save the one-fourth who were loyal to republican institutions.

Mr. REED. It might not be three-fourths of the people.

Mr. HARDWICK. Three-fourths of the legislatures. It might even be done with three-fourths of the people against the proposition. That is possible, under our Constitution.

Senators, there are a good many things like that that could be done in the form and guise and shape of an amendment to the Constitution that can not be done without doing violence to those basic, organic, and fundamental principles that underlie the Constitution and on which the Constitution itself rests and must continue to rest if this is to remain a free country and the people of America are themselves to remain free.

I say that one of those basic and fundamental principles is the right of each local subdivision of our society, of each State, to control and regulate its own domestic and internal concerns, and that most important, most sacred, among those rights is the right of each State to regulate its own electorate, to prescribe its qualifications, and to determine of whom it shall consist.

Senators, your suffrage proposition goes a long way. This proposed amendment not only undertakes to deny to the States the right to abridge the right of women to vote for President and Vice President and Members of the two Houses of Congress, but in the manner and form that it is submitted you propose to take away from the States the right and power to determine, each one for itself, what shall be the qualifications of the electors to elect its own officers. Its governors, its sheriffs, its county clerks, its members of the legislature, every local officer of every State will have to be elected by an electorate the qualifications of which are determined here in Washington, under the terms of this amendment, if we should pass it and it should be ratified by the requisite number of States. Now, I do not think that is wise and I think that is going entirely too far. The proposition violates the fundamentals; it utterly ignores the principles on which this Government rests; and if the Federal Government wants to say who shall vote for Members of Congress, on what principle does it undertake to say who shall be allowed to vote for county sheriffs and county clerks and officers that are purely local and have no connection whatever with Federal administration? Yet that is what this proposition does. It goes to that length.

Mr. President, I have seen during a somewhat brief service in this body and a somewhat longer service at the other end of the Capitol, approaching now the completion of its sixteenth year, Federalism grow by leaps and bounds.

I have seen the rights of the States impaired and denied until the States themselves have become careless and fail to discharge their functions, and until everybody in almost every State says, if the State does not do anything, we will get the Federal Government to attend to it for us. If this continues, we will utterly and completely destroy not only the form but the very substance of the American system of government, and then when that is done, when you set up an imperial power here in Washington, dealing with the most purely local matters in every part of this great country, I want to know how the legislative bodies are to obtain the information and the light and the time that each of them will need in order to know how to deal at all with these local and domestic affairs in every one of the innumerable local communities of this Republic. It is time, I think, to call a halt on this sort of business. It is time we should begin to readjust the balance between Federal power and State authority.

It is absolutely necessary if this Government is to remain what it was when our fathers created it, and if this dual system of government which has been the glory, and the distinguishing glory, of this Government during all its existence is to be preserved, that we should sharply and permanently check this movement in the very near future.

Mr. President, I see before me honest and earnest men who have got to deal with those questions after my own responsibility in connection with them is ended, and happily ended as far as I am concerned personally, and I want to appeal to them here to-day to stop and seriously consider this great question and not continue to subvert and undermine not only the form but the very substance of our Government itself. I can not think that it is any answer to this proposition to say, "Well, this is a proposition to amend the Constitution." It is just as immoral to violate substantial, fundamental, and basic American principles by amendment to the Constitution as it is in any other way; and, in my judgment, it is just as dangerous.

It has always seemed to me that the crowning virtue of our local system of government, and the greatest and chiefest power that can reside in any government, is the power to determine the qualifications of the electorate; that there is the real force that rules and governs and controls the whole system. When we undertake to take that away from the State, in whole or in part, it is the most dangerous tinkering that we could possibly do; and it is one that, if we do not mind, will result in utter ruin if it is kept up long enough. I hope I am not getting into a despondent frame of mind about things of this sort, but I have seen so much of it done that I must confess I am alarmed.

I can not see why these local matters should not be left to the control and regulation of the States. I can not see how men belonging to two great political parties that two years ago promised to the people of this Republic that they would leave this very specific question to the States, for the determination and regulation of the States, and the States alone, and who expressly denied the suffrage petition made at that time to both party conventions, should favor this proposition of acting on this question by way of amendment to the Federal Constitution and treating it as a Federal and national question. I can not see how Senators and Representatives who belong to two great parties, who have that record, will gain anything in the popular confidence or in the popular esteem by rushing over each other in their efforts to break their plighted words to the American people.

I shall, therefore, Mr. President, for the reasons that I am undertaking to give to the Senate, with some brevity, vote against this proposition; nor is my judgment on it to be controlled or influenced by the fact that any man on earth, wherever he is placed and however high his position is, may have changed his own mind since the election.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with this joint resolution, and I want to do nothing that will impede its passage at the present time; but as the joint resolution is drawn, I think it is a sinister menace to the electorate of this country. I believe that the joint resolution should be amended. The Constitution of the United States provides that "the Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Congress has enacted naturalization laws. To become naturalized there must be a declaration of an intention to become a citizen and, in addition, five years' residence. There are also qualifications as to age, education, and character, renunciation of order of nobility or hereditary title, and then of allegiance and the renunciation of prior allegiance. Under the Revised Statutes it is provided that:

Any woman who is now or may hereafter be married to a citizen of the United States, and who might herself be lawfully naturalized, shall be deemed a citizen.

When this joint resolution is passed and when it shall have become ratified by the States of the Union an alien woman who is married to a naturalized American citizen automatically becomes a voter under the law without the safeguard which is thrown around the male alien. The male alien, it is provided, must have five years' residence; he must declare his intention to become a citizen; and then, after two years, the court of jurisdiction in the locality in which he resides shall examine him as to his allegiance, as to his loyalty, and as to his educational qualifications; but under this joint resolution, without that safeguard, automatically we enfranchise thousands of women who are married to American citizens who may be at heart alien in loyalty to this country.

I want to see every worthy woman in this land have the vote; but I want written in the Constitution the same legal safeguards we throw around the male citizen. I want the only safeguard that can be provided by law to compel her to be worthy to assume that high privilege.

We are living in very strenuous times, very serious times. German propagandists are rife throughout the country. There are Russian societies in this country which believe in the destruction of government. Are we going to increase the powers of that class by giving to the wives of the men who are members of those classes and societies the right to vote without court examination, without safeguarding the honest women who vote from their dangerous policies? Under the resolution as drawn every alien woman who may be a bitter enemy of our country can become a citizen and attain that right by marrying some gullible, easy-going American citizen.

Therefore, Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk in order to correct what I believe to be a danger in this joint resolution. I ask that the amendment be stated by the Secretary and that it be considered pending after the present amendment to the joint resolution shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "sex," in line 11, change the period to a semicolon and add the following:

But no person, male or female, shall hereafter exercise the right of suffrage hereunder at an election for Senators and Representatives in Congress and electors for President and Vice President of the United States, unless such person shall have acquired citizenship by birth or under the naturalization laws of the United States, and, if a female, otherwise than by marriage. The Congress shall provide by law the requirements for conferring the right to vote for the officers herein named upon those who have acquired citizenship by marriage.

Mr. GUION. Mr. President, I do not believe anything I may say at this time will change, alter, or modify the views of a single Member of the Senate; but that I may not be misunderstood when I vote against the pending amendment, I have concluded to give briefly my reasons for opposing it.

By this I mean that while I am not opposed to extending to women by the States of this Union the privilege of suffrage on equal terms with men, I am unalterably opposed to the granting of such privilege by the Federal Government.

In my State the legislature at its last session submitted an amendment to the constitution of that State by which women will be permitted to vote under the same requirements as that constitution imposes upon men.

That amendment will be submitted to the voters of the State at the congressional election to be held on the 5th of November next, and, if adopted, will give to the women of Louisiana the same political privileges, in respect to the right of suffrage, as are now enjoyed by the male voters of that State.

The same legislature which submitted that amendment has gone on record as being opposed to the pending amendment by adopting House concurrent resolution 9, memorializing the Congress of the United States to reject the pending amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Personally, as I have just said, I am not opposed to granting to women by the several States of the Union the privilege of suffrage, and, in fact, I intend to vote for the proposed amendment to the constitution of my State at the approaching election in November.

My objection to the amendment now pending in the Senate is that under our form of government the right to give or withhold the privilege of suffrage rests with the States and is not given to the General Government.

Suffrage is a matter of local or domestic concern, to be dealt with by each State, acting in its sovereign capacity in the exercise of the power reserved to the States under the Federal Constitution, and as may best subserve and accord with existing local conditions and without interference by the Federal Government.

Under my interpretation of the Constitution of the United States it was never intended that the Federal Government should ever assume the power or authority to establish, regulate, or control the right of suffrage in the several States, but that the States themselves should be given exclusive power and authority in respect to the entire subject-matter.

I am not willing, therefore, to wander away from the well-defined landmarks set up for us and for future generations by the founders of this great Government.

It may be said that it is because of this want of authority in the Federal Government thus to legislate that the amendment now pending is sought to be submitted to the States; but my objection is to such submission, because, in my opinion, it is against the spirit of our Constitution that the Federal Government should interfere with or seek to supplant the States in matters of suffrage or in any other matter where the police powers of the State ought to be exercised.

Feeling, therefore, that the action of the legislature of my State, by submitting to its voters the amendment to the constitution of that State just referred to, by which women may be given the suffrage upon equal terms with men, and by protesting against the submission to the States of the pending amendment, is practically an instruction to me on the subject, and feeling further, as I do, that by voting for this amendment I will be surrendering a distinct right of State sovereignty which the framers of our Constitution intended should be reserved to the States and never surrendered to the Federal Government, I am unwilling by my vote to sanction so radical a departure from what they conceived to be, and which has been proven to be, for the best interests of our common country; and for that reason I shall vote "no."

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I have addressed the Senate several times upon the question of woman suffrage. I have said at those times about all I know of the subject. It would serve no good purpose to consume time now by repeating what I have already said. Both sides of the question have been very thoroughly presented and completely exhausted. However, on April 20, 1917, I made some remarks before the Woman Suffrage Committee of the Senate giving the experience of my State with woman suffrage for many years—over 60 years—which I should be glad to make a part of my remarks at this time, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Without objection, the request of the Senator from Kansas will be complied with.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"Senator THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, coming from a suffrage State, I take pleasure in testifying before this handsome assembly of women, and this committee of men who are trying to learn something about equal suffrage, to the wonderful advantage woman suffrage has been to my State. There is no element that has contributed more to the improvement of our political conditions than the participation of the women in suffrage from the time of the adoption of the States constitution, away back in 1859, down to the present time. We have had, perhaps, a longer experience with woman suffrage in one form or another than any other State, for we gave the women, when we wrote the constitution, the right to vote on all educational questions. We attempted to give them full suffrage even in that early day, but it was defeated by a narrow margin. It was preferred, by the men at least, to take three bites at the cherry; and, as sweet as it is, do you not wonder that we would do it? You know, however, that we men are given to doing things the wrong way sometimes.

"We first gave the women suffrage on all educational questions in our constitution, and I challenge anyone anywhere to point to a single objection that can be made after nearly 60 years of experience in their voting on educational matters. We are forced to admit that women have been a wonderful advantage in this respect. We all concede that they make our best county superintendents and our best teachers, and by their cooperation with the men we have gradually reduced the percentage of illiteracy in the State until it now ranks the lowest in the Union—less than 2 per cent. Will anyone say that the influence of women and their participation in the ballot in educational affairs has been in the least detrimental? This is one of the principal objections raised by those who are not familiar with this great question, and it turns out just the opposite to their predictions in acutal practice.

"Next, in 1887 we extended this right to the women to vote on all municipal questions in our city elections. While that matter was being considered I remember an interesting incident that occurred in the State senate. One of the senators was holding out on the question. On the morning the vote was taken a very beautiful bouquet of American Beauty roses appeared upon his desk with a large placard reading, 'Presented by the women of the city of Independence who do not want to vote. History will honor the man who dares to do right.' But nevertheless the effort of the opposition was defeated, and it was later discovered that this bouquet was contributed by the saloon element, who were opposed to woman suffrage, and you will find that class everywhere against it. This fact alone should be one of the strongest arguments in its favor. The women in my State helped with even limited suffrage, and their great power by that right, to make Kansas the leading prohibition State of the Union. At this time there is not a single saloon, and not a single place, drug store or hovel, commonly known to anyone in any locality where you can go and barter for a drink of liquor within that broad territory, 400 miles long, almost the distance from here to Boston, and 200 miles wide. At least that much of the United States is cleared of the saloon, and largely through the influence of the women.

"As early as 1867 the women began the fight for equal suffrage and the question was submitted to the people, but the fight at that time was so intermingled with questions growing out of the result of the war that it was lost sight of and defeated. But you know a little defeat does not seem to affect the women of this country in the least, for they are still on the battle field, and they are going to keep up the fight, and the men might as well make up their minds first as last that, as always, the women are going to conquer, and the men might as well surrender first as last. The question was resubmitted in 1894, and for the third time met defeat.

"But with the third bite of the cherry we gave the women complete suffrage in 1912; and in refutation of the charge that they do not know how to vote, just look over the election returns of the State for the last presidential election."

Mr. THOMPSON. In conclusion, I wish simply to briefly sum up the situation and give a few reasons why this resolution should be adopted:

1. Woman suffrage is absolutely right, and wherever tried it has proved a complete success.

2. The right or privilege, whichever you may choose to call it, was wrongfully taken away from the women by usurpation of the men. Under the National Constitution as originally drawn and as subsequently amended there is no provision whatever against the right of women to vote, and had the women assumed that right in the beginning no one would have ever dreamed of requiring some direct declaration to be written in the Constitution permitting them to do so. Government has wrongfully taken this right away from women by assuming that it was for men only, to the exclusion of the women. We should now be honest, fair, and gracious enough to give it back to them when they want it or without their asking for it. They have earned it by their education, worthy citizenship, work, devotion, and general helpfulness in all the affairs of the Government equal to that of the men.

3. In all the argument and voluminous discussion there has been no good, sound reason assigned by anybody why equal suffrage should not be granted; there has been no demonstration or suggestion by anybody that it has failed in any particular wherever tried.

4. If for any reason, however, technical or otherwise, it was not thought just or advisable to grant women this right, there certainly should be no hesitancy in doing so at this particular time. If there were no other reasons, it should be done as a righteous measure growing out of the prosecution of the war. Women have performed more than their part in this great struggle for democracy, freedom, and liberty. They have borne the men, the boys who are braving the dangers of battle and making the supreme sacrifice for the glorious cause. They have helped make and raise the money to carry on the war and to aid our allies. They have helped raise the food to feed the people at home as well as the soldiers in the field. They have helped make the clothing, the ammunition, the guns, the flying machines, the railroad trains, and the ships. They are even ready, if necessary, to shoulder the gun and march to the front themselves; and indeed they have done so in many instances. They have done practically all of the nursing, and who doubts but what they can do it better than any man? They have performed wonderful feats in surgery, together with the men. No great surgical operation was ever performed without the skillful aid of the women. They are now doing the drudgery work in France and England, as well as in many places in the United States, such as running elevators, handling trucks and baggage at the stations, running street cars, driving hacks, taxies, automobiles, trucks, ambulances, making the gardens, cultivating the fields, and gathering the grain and caring for the stock. This latter work in France and England they are doing practically alone, and they will do it in this country should it become necessary. Who will say that they are not doing it just as well as the men ever did? In all my travels through the war zone I never heard anyone even hint that all this work was not being properly and efficiently performed, but, on the other hand, I heard their work commended by everybody who discussed it. Above all else, the women are the ones who are "keeping the home fires burning." They are feeding, clothing, educating, and otherwise caring for the families while the men are away from home. Can anyone doubt that they can do this better than the men? And they are only asking equality in a very less important matter. We would be more justified in disfranchising the men than we would be to permit the women to remain disfranchised.

So let us, as men, recognize our appreciation of woman's great sacrifice for our common country by granting to them an equal voice in the management of all governmental affairs, where experience demonstrates beyond all question of a doubt that they are just as useful and indispensable as in every other sphere in life.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, ordinarily I am very much averse to speaking with notes, but down in the section of the country from which I come there is a considerable divergence of opinion among the men voters at any rate on the subject of woman suffrage, and for that reason I am going to beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I give from prepared notes the reasons which actuate me in casting my vote to-day.

Mr. President, I have long been an advocate of equal suffrage. I would have preferred that equal suffrage should have been brought about by the action of the several States rather than by the action of the National Government, but I have long since come to the conclusion that this is substantially impracticable. I say this because of the object lesson that is now before us, namely, that the women in many of the States are permitted to vote while the women of many other of the States are denied the privilege. It is not right that this sort of a condition should obtain, and certainly it is not right that this kind of a condition should be continued when we are able to remedy it here. It is much easier to obtain the ratification of this amendment in 36 States than it is to get individual action in all 48 States.

In the nature of things it might be that the women of three-fourths or four-fifths or even seven-eighths of the States should secure and enjoy the right of suffrage for 50 years, and yet through some local conditions in the few remaning States the women of those States would be deprived of the right to vote for all time unless this amendment should be passed.

For these reasons, and believing firmly in the principle of woman suffrage, four years ago I voted for the national amendment while I was a Member of the House. Coming from that portion of our country which is commonly understood not to be in favor of equal suffrage, I was given considerable criticism by some in my State for this vote, but believing that I was right I stood the criticism then and am going to stand it again, for I shall vote in favor of this resolution. I am still not willing to say that the intelligent and splendid women of Tennessee are not as worthy of the privilege of suffrage as the women of New York or those of any other suffrage State.

REASONS FOR VOTING FOR IT.

HALF FREE AND HALF NOT FREE.

In the first place, I believe that the question of suffrage is such a question as was intended by the framers of our Constitution might be made the subject of an amendment. They tinkered with it themselves, and then left the qualification of voters to the States and granted to the Federal Government the right to supervise the time, place, and manner of choosing Senators and Representatives. It certainly can not be said that such an amendment as this is not germane to jurisdiction already given, and I believe the present conditions of suffrage in this country warrant the submission of the question. In other words, I believe that, inasmuch as the women of the great West and the women of many of our Northern States, including the great State of New York, already enjoy the privilege of voting, it is only fair that by constitutional amendment all women in this country should have the right to vote, if they have the other necessary legal requirements.

It is wholly unjust to the women of Tennessee, for instance, who may want to vote for President or other Federal officers to be denied the privilege of voting while the women of New York are accorded that privilege. I, of course, have no criticism for the views of any man on this subject. At the same time, I can not conceive how any legislator can believe that the present mixed conditions in this country on the subject of women voting are fair. I do not see how the Representative of any State which denies the privilege of voting to its women can be willing, by his vote, to permit that condition to continue while the women of other States are allowed to vote.

If there was no other reason than this inequality of the present system, it seems to me it would be a full answer to any objection that could be raised to this resolution.

THE NATURAL RIGHT.

I am not going to stress a proposition that I believe in, namely, that women have a natural right to take part in the public affairs of their own country. When a boy I remember reading one of George Eliot's novels, Adam Bede, in which one of the men characters was made to say: "Women are curious creatures"; and Mrs. Poyser, another character, answered, "Yes; God made them so to match the men." These quotations are from memory only. I never took much stock in this doctrine of mental and spiritual and moral and natural and even supernatural superiority of the men. I think well of men, of course, but I have known some very able women in my day, too; and, taking them by and large, there are brainy men and brainy women, and there are dull-minded men and dull-minded women, and that is about all there is to the proposition. The women that I have been associated with the most of my life I have felt were as capable of voting as I have been, and many of them were probably giving it a great deal more attention than I did. Their mentality has not been exercised in this particular line because they have been heretofore denied any participation in public affairs, but give them a chance and they will vote as intelligently as we do.

TEACHERS OF MEN.

For the most part, women are the teachers of men. My recollection is that there are some seven or eight hundred women teachers in the Memphis public schools and perhaps a dozen men. The same is true of all our schools throughout the land. They teach our boys and our girls, and surely if the male students thus taught by women are capable of making good voters, the teachers of these students also are inherently capable of making discriminating voters. Why put the taught over the teachers? Why debase the teachers and exalt those who only learn from them?

TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION.

The American people are a peculiar people. They threw off the British yoke in 1776, and one of their reasons for rebelling against George III was "for imposing taxes without our consent." They succeeded in winning their freedom in great part on this slogan, and yet ever since they have taxed the women half of their population without giving them any representation in the Government.

At the lowest calculation one-eighth of the women of this country above 21 years of age pay taxes. Surely, these taxpayers should have the right to take part in their Government's affairs. If we are not going to give them that right, we should not tax them. A mere statement of the case is sufficient to show the justice of the contention.

SOME OF THE MEN WHO VOTE IN THIS COUNTRY.

If they are men, we allow idiots and lunatics to vote. In many States criminals are allowed to vote. In many States men who can neither read nor write are permitted to vote, and men who can not speak the English language are allowed to vote. We allow the Malays to vote, Turks to vote, negroes to vote; but women alone are the objects of our undying enmity so far as the privilege of voting is concerned. There is no rhyme nor reason in denying them this privilege. There is naught but justice in giving them the legal right.

WOMEN IN THE WAR.

But if no other reason obtained for the passage of this resolution, the position of women in this war is sufficient to justify us in passing it. From the very beginning of the war no part of our population has been more patriotic than women. They have stood by the Government, with some inconsequential exceptions. They have upheld our country. They have undertaken every employment of which they were at all capable. They are engaged by the hundreds of thousands in war work of every description. They are taking an equal part with the men in Red Cross work, in war savings stamp work, in liberty loan work, in Y. M. C. A. work, and in every other good cause connected with this war. They are going into the fields, into the factories, into the commercial houses, and into every other avenue of business and trade where they can aid in the carrying on of this war. They are giving up their means and their time, and in many cases they are risking their lives as physicians, as nurses, and helpers in the conduct of this great strife. Women workers are taking the place of men workers everywhere. Surely, under these conditions there is no reason why the remaining women of the country whose States have seen fit to deny them the right of suffrage should not be given it by the Federal Government, whose interests they have so splendidly served in the years of this war.

I now come to a subject to which the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has referred, and I think what I am going to say on the subject forms, in a feeble way, an answer to the argument of that able Senator in this body.

THE REASONS URGED AGAINST SUFFRAGE.

THE NEGRO WOMEN.

The first reason that is always urged to a southerner against equal suffrage is that that would permit the negro women to vote. Well, this is true. The Government has already set the example by permitting the negro men to vote, and I have known negro men and negro women very well in my part of the country, and I think that the negro women are equally as capable of voting as negro men. Of course, we all know that the very large majority of both classes are incapable of voting intelligently, and that comparatively few negro men now vote at all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will wait until I get to the end of this paragraph, I shall be delighted to yield to him. I will ask the Senator to excuse me for just a moment.

But however that may be that is a question that need not concern us here, or if it should concern us, it is a question that makes it all the more necessary why we should pass this resolution.

The negro population is in the majority in but two Southern States, South Carolina and Mississippi. In South Carolina the negroes constitute a little more than 55 per cent of the population. In Mississippi they constitute a little more than 56 per cent of the population. In all other States the whites are in the majority. The result is that if we adopt woman suffrage the white majority, because of education or other qualifications, will be increased in every single State except South Carolina and Mississippi. In these two States it may be said that the number of negro voters will be increased, and that is true; but in these the majority of the whites will be increased because of various qualifications. In Mississippi they have what is known as the grandfather clause which eliminates most of the negro men——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, Mississippi has no "grandfather clause," and never did have.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I have misquoted the Mississippi law, I beg the Senator's pardon for it. I believe it is another of the Southern States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg to assure the Senator that he has.

Mr. McKELLAR. But I will say that even if they have not the "grandfather clause" in Mississippi they have educational qualifications, they have registration qualifications, they have tax qualifications, or property qualifications, all of which make it impossible for the negro men in the largest degree to vote in Mississippi. They have similar laws in South Carolina, which practically eliminate the ignorant negro vote. They eliminate the ignorant negro men vote, and they will eliminate the ignorant negro women vote. The passage of this amendment would not preclude the States in any way from putting any restriction upon the right of suffrage that they see fit—the only requirement of the Constitution being that all persons must be treated alike.

The result is that, according to the figures, the white majorities would be largely increased in all of the Southern States except two; and in those two States the situation will be vastly improved, because the educated white women of the States of Mississippi and South Carolina will cast their votes like the educated white men of those States cast them to-day, whereas the ignorant negro women will be just exactly like the ignorant negro men, they will not be able to vote in large numbers in either one of those States, and thereby the majority will be increased.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield. I wanted to have the Senator wait until I finished my paragraph, but I will yield now.

Mr. REED. The point of my inquiry is really past, as the Senator is passing to a different subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I shall be glad to have the Senator propound his question right now.

Mr. REED. The Senator has stated that he knew negro men who were intelligent enough to vote and that he knew negro women who were intelligent enough to vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator misunderstood what I said. I have not said that; but I will say to the Senator now that I know some negro men and some negro women, too, who are intelligent enough to vote.

Mr. REED. What was the Senator's remark about the negro vote in his State?

Mr. McKELLAR. I said that I knew both negro men and negro women in the South, and that, so far as my observation and experience went, the negro women were just about as capable of voting as the negro men. That was the statement I made.

Mr. REED. Very well. That suits me well enough for the purposes of my inquiry. Is it the general opinion of the white Democrats of the Senator's State that either the negro man or the negro woman should vote?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not say that that is true; but I will say to the Senator, however, that we have no trouble about the matter of negroes voting in Tennessee. I will say to the Senator that we have educational qualifications, we have property qualifications, we have registration qualifications, we have poll-tax qualifications, which cut out the ignorant men of all races; and if this amendment is agreed to they will cut out the ignorant women of all races.

Mr. REED. The Senator states that in Tennessee they have educational qualifications, property qualifications, and poll-tax qualifications. You have shotgun disqualifications, do you not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I know of no such disqualifications as that. The Senator is entirely in error about that. I am happy to say that I have lived in Tennessee for 25 years, and we have never had that kind of disqualifications since I have been there. I do not think they have shotgun disqualifications any more in Tennessee than they do in Missouri or Illinois or any other State.

Mr. REED. Of course, you do not put it in that harsh way; but the colored man and brother is just given generally to understand that a good place for him on election day is out fishing or any other place except the polls. That is about the truth of the situation, is it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary. The Senator was never more mistaken in his life. For instance, of the comparatively small Republican vote that was cast against me when I was elected, 4,000 negro votes in the city of Memphis alone were cast against me.

Mr. REED. Oh, of course, some of them are allowed to vote as an evidence of good faith, and I am not complaining, but what is there in the argument that the negro woman knows as well how to vote as the negro man, coming from the lips of a Senator from a State where it is generally conceded that the negro population ought not to vote at all? What is there in that argument?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is entirely in error about that. I am not making that argument.

Mr. REED. I do not think I am.

Mr. McKELLAR. The educated negro men in Tennessee vote. All of those who can meet the qualifications fixed by our laws vote. The Senator is misinformed about voting conditions in Tennessee. The educated negro men now vote, and if this amendment passes the educated negro women will vote; but my point is that the white women alone in that State, if this amendment passes, will be greater in number several times over than all of the negro men and all the negro women who will be qualified to vote under our State laws. That is all there is in it.

The result will be that not only in Tennessee but in all the Southern States, even including the two I have mentioned—Mississippi and South Carolina—the white majorities will be increased. Returning to my discussion of the figures, in Tennessee, according to the census of 1910, there were 433,431 white males above 21 years of age and 419,646 white females over 21 years of age. There were 119,142 negro males over 21 years of age and 122,707 negro females over 21 years of age. In other words, if this amendment passes there would be 853,077 white persons eligible to vote and 241,849 negro voters eligible to vote—a majortiy of 611,228 in favor of the white voters. Under our tax, our registration, and other restrictions the white vote would be enormously increased, while the negro vote would be only slightly increased.

With these figures staring us in the face, could anyone say that the passage of this amendment would interfere with white supremacy in Tennessee or in any other State? The truth is that it would add very largely to the white voting majorities in all of the States, even not excluding the two mentioned—Mississippi and South Carolina. Any person who really wants white supremacy in the South can not better guarantee it than by the enactment of this equal-suffrage resolution.

That brings me to leave my notes for a moment to discuss the proposition that was laid down by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. He warns his southern colleagues against the day when the negro soldiers shall return to the South from this war. If he means what he says—and I know he does—it seems to me his logic would lead him to the conclusion that the best way the people of the South can guard against such trouble as that is to grant suffrage to our women, and thereby increase the white majorities in every State in the South. On the face of it, certainly every State except two will have an increased white majority under restrictions that now exist; and when you consider the laws that have been enacted on this subject in the State of Mississippi and in the State of South Carolina you are inevitably driven to the conclusion that the passage of this joint resolution will add an overwhelming majority to the white race in the 11 Southern States.

So much for that. Ah, but the Senator says it is because of his great love for the Constitution that he takes the position he does in opposition to this amendment. Well, I may be mistaken about the Constitution, but, if I remember correctly, the original document gave to the Federal Government some control over elections. The Senator speaks as if the first control over elections ever given by the Constitution was contained in the fifteenth amendment. The Senator is mistaken. The original Constitution, as ratified by the States, has this to say about elections:

SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives—

It is true that the President was left out, but the same rules apply to him—shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

And we have changed that by amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me refer the Senator to the second section of Article I of the Constitution, which is the section which relates to the qualifications of electors, and also to the seventeenth amendment. That has nothing whatever to do with the qualifications of electors, but——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator thought it had nothing to do with it; but the Constitution says on its face, in so many words, that it has to do with the election of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator read the second section of Article I?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am familiar with that section; but the section I quoted is in the Federal Constitution, and, at least in a sense, it modifies the other section.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, not at all. The courts have never held that, and nobody has ever contended that to be so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Do I understand the Senator to contend that Congress can under the Constitution now grant the suffrage to women?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then what is the point of the Senator's argument now?

Mr. McKELLAR. What it does is that, if Congress sees fit, it can add to those who are entitled to the suffrage; but if it is desired by Congress to change the rules and regulations as provided here, it has the right to do it. My point is that the framers of our Constitution intended that the Congress should have some jurisdiction over elections, and the people of this country have already agreed to one amendment on exactly the same line as the one proposed, and it is nothing out of the ordinary that they should want to amend on the subject of suffrage, because the original convention made an attempt to control voting.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just wanted to interrupt the Senator to say that the Constitution of the United States in two places—section 2 of Article I and the seventeenth amendment, relating to the election of United States Senators—says expressly that the qualifications of electors for Senators and Representatives in Congress shall be the same as those for the most numerous branch of the State legislature in each State. Furthermore, nobody on this earth has ever contended before to-day, if the Senator intends to contend it, that the section he has just read about the time, place, and manner of holding elections has any relation whatever to the qualifications of electors.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstands me. I have not discussed qualifications of voters at all. I am perfectly familiar with the requirement of the Constitution that they shall have the same qualifications as those who vote for members of State legislatures, and I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this amendment does not affect in the slightest that provision of the Constitution. The only thing it does is to add to the classes of voters that are now allowed to vote.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will let me finish my question, there is only one precedent on earth for this proposition, and that is the fifteenth amendment; and if the Senator enjoys that as a precedent, he is perfectly welcome to stand on that ground.

Mr. McKELLAR. I never would have voted for the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I know the Senator would not.

Mr. McKELLAR. But I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that while I would not have voted for the fifteenth amendment, the Congress of the United States and the people of the United States have already adopted that amendment, and it has been in our Constitution now for more than 40 years; and I say that if we could do that, if we could give the ignorant negro men of this country the right to vote, surely we ought to give to the splendid, well-educated white women of the land the right to vote. We ought not to treat negro men better than we do our white women.

Mr. HARDWICK. The fifteenth amendment did not give the negro men the right to vote, of course. The Senator is not accurate about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, we are under that common misbelief down in our country. If it did not give them the right to vote, somebody has been very wrong in the last few years down in the Senator's State. I have been of that opinion and I think nearly everyone else has the opinion that the negroes obtained the right to vote by virtue of the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. You have been wrong all your lives. The fifteenth amendment merely prohibits discrimination against any citizen of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all we are doing in this amendment. We are inhibiting discrimination against women because they are women.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, if the Senator will kindly let me have about two minutes of his time I will finish what I have to say.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right.

Mr. HARDWICK. It ought to be impossible to muddy the waters on a question of this kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it will be possible.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not see how the Senator could hope to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not trying.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to hear that the Senator is not trying. I do not think he could succeed.

Mr. President, the fact is that the only precedent on earth for action of this sort, which I concede is perfectly within the power of Congress, is the fifteenth amendment. That is the only precedent for it. The Senator will find, I think, if he gives the question that careful consideration which he gives to most questions to which he addresses himself, that when the Constitutional Convention framed the Constitution of the United States, a tremendous effort was made to induce the makers of the Constitution to fix a general standard for electors, and to lodge that power in the Federal Government; but that proposition was beaten decisively on the floor of the Constitutional Convention, on the assumption that it was best to let each locality lay down those qualifications; and that is what we have always done in this country, with the single, solitary exception of the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator from Georgia whether or not he voted for the recent act giving the National Government the right to supervise not only national regular elections but also primary elections for national officers?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; "the Senator from Georgia" did not vote for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator did not vote for it, but this Congress has just passed such laws; and it did so under the authority of the original Constitution, and not any amendment to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator wants to bring that in, it was confined entirely to Members of Congress, which is a different proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a distinction without a difference when it comes to fixing the qualifications of voters in this country, whether they are permitted to vote just for Members of Congress or the Senate, or to vote for the President of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know; I do not mean that; but what about local elections, where county sheriffs, and so on, are to be elected?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the same qualifications ought to be prescribed for all voters, white, black, male, and female, and in all classes of elections.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield. I did not intend to take all of this time. I am very sorry to have detained the Senate this long. I would not have done so but for these interruptions, to which, of course, I am glad to accede.

Mr. REED. I shall be very brief; but the question now being discussed is one that I think we might settle if we get back to it. Do I understand the Senator to contend that aside from the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution the Federal Government has defined citizenship or the qualifications of electors in any respect?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; but I do contend that this language was in the Constitution, found in section 4 of Article I, which is very plain, as it seems to me:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Mr. REED. "The times, places, and manner of holding elections"——

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; which might have a very serious effect on the question of the manner of voting.

Mr. REED. But not the qualifications of voters. Now, will the Senator pardon me while I read a clause from the somewhat celebrated case of United States against Susan B. Anthony, a case that is somewhat in point to-day, since Susan still speaks to us in spirit and from the galleries?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. REED (reading)—

> The fourteenth amendment creates and defines citizenship of the United States. It had long been contended, and had been held by many learned authorities, and had never been judicially decided to the contrary, that there was no such thing as a citizen of the United States, except as that condition arose from citizenship of some State. No mode existed, it was said, of obtaining a citizenship of the United States, except by first becoming a citizen of some State. This question is now at rest. The fourteenth amendment defines and declares who shall be citizens of the United States, to wit, "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof." The latter qualification was intended to exclude the children of foreign representatives and the like. With this qualification every person born in the United States or naturalized is declared to be a citizen of the United States and of the State wherein he resides.
>
> After thus creating and defining citizenship of the United States, the fourteenth amendment provides that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." This clause is intended to be a protection, not to all our rights but to our rights as citizens of the United States only; that is, to rights existing or belonging to that condition or capacity.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> The right of voting, or the privilege of voting, is a right or privilege arising under the constitution of the State and not under the Constitution of the United States.

It seems to me that that answers the Senator's contention that Congress had a jurisdiction from the first with reference to the qualifications of voters. That is a right which grew out of the several amendments adopted as a result of the Civil War; but even those amendments did not undertake to go further than to provide that there should be no discrimination on account of race. So I think that authority ought to settle that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that shows that in off-hand manner of speaking one is sometimes misunderstood or sometimes unfortunately uses language that does not express his intent very clearly. I said nothing in the world about the qualification of voters, but the Senator from Georgia had argued the question as if the question of voting was some inherent right intended by the framers of our Federal Constitution to be left entirely and wholly in the States, and my assertion was that in this he was mistaken, for the original Constitution had a provision giving the Federal Government a supervisory jurisdiction over the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives and Senators.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment, if the Senator will let me state the case, so that there can not be any room for misrepresentation. My reply to that was that he was incorrect about it, because the original Constitution did give to Congress certain rights over elections. It did not leave that all to the States. It certainly gave Congress the right of supervision over the times, the places, and the manner of choosing——

Mr. HARDWICK. Members of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Members of Congress and Senators.

Mr. HARDWICK. We are Members of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course we are; but the Constitution says Representatives and Senators. I stated at the very outset that it did not include the President of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator raises the question as to the accuracy of my position. If the Senator will go back to the convention that framed the Constitution, he will find that the words were expressly voted down, presented by those who contended for the power of Congress to prescribe the qualifications of electors.

Mr. McKELLAR. I never made that statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought you said the Senator from Georgia was in error when he contended that that was to be left to the States.

Mr. McKELLAR. I said the Senator from Georgia was in error when he said that power over elections was in the beginning in the States and had remained there up until the fifteenth amendment; and those amendments were adopted, that it had remained there, and that only the States had anything to do with the elections.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator wishes to stand on that statement, then, and challenge the accuracy of the position of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right; we will leave it there.

DOES SUFFRAGE MAKE WOMEN UNWOMANLY?

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, Mr. President, I next come to another feature that I want to discuss very briefly. The next stock argument of those that are opposed to woman suffrage is that suffrage would make women unwomanly. I have often wondered if anyone seriously believed such a proposition as the casting of a ballot made a woman unwomanly. Why should it make a woman unwomanly to cast a ballot for candidates of her choice? Yet you constantly hear the statement that if they are given the ballot it will destroy the home, it will make bad mothers, it will do away with family ties. If I for a moment dreamed that suffrage would bring about any one of these direful consequences, of course I would not vote for it, but my judgment is that these contentions are pure figments of the imagination. I doubt if there is a single Senator in this body, if the fact were inquired into, but what it would be found that his mother was either a well-educated woman or a brainy woman, otherwise the chances are he would not be here. I believe it to be a natural law that in the matter of brains a man gets them more from his mother than from his father. If this be true, then why not give the mothers of men in our country every opportunity to fit not only themselves but their sons for all the duties of citizenship.

Ordinarily in our home life in the United States the mother is the principal teacher. It is absolutely necessary that she should be well informed and well educated. If she takes an interest in politics and is allowed to take part in public affairs, it will but increase her knowledge and education. It will but better fit her to rear and educate her boys, as well as her girls—knowing that the future of the State depends upon her efforts in a larger degree than ever before.

For my part I would a thousand times rather see a woman take an interest in politics and vote, and even stand around the polling places and electioneer for the candidate of her choice, rather than to see her at a fashionable club drinking highballs and gossiping about her neighbors, or in other circles of life at a corner grocery drinking beer. I think it is a thousand times more unwomanly to do any of these things than it is to perform the very high order of public service in casting a ballot in an election.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that we have had experience in Colorado for 25 years, and when the suffrage amendment was up here in 1914 I wrote some letters to each of the district judges of the State of Colorado relative to the influence if any politics had in making disputes or quarrels over candidates or issues in the family. I should like to call attention right here, because it is very apt to some of the letters. I have 19 letters here. This letter was addressed from Washington, D. C., by me February 17, 1914:

> WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1914.
>
> Judge GEORGE W. ALLEN,
> Courthouse, Denver, Colo.
>
> DEAR JUDGE: There is pending in the Senate a joint resolution for a constitutional amendment granting equal suffrage to women. There has been some contention among those who are opposed to woman suffrage that the passage of such a constitutional amendment would have a tendency to produce quarrels among husbands and wives.
>
> I would thank you very much if you would let me know whether in any divorce case which you have tried it was claimed upon either side that the cause of any dissension or disagreement among the parties to the suit originated from or was caused by differences as to politics or candidates. If there have been any such, I would thank you very much if you would indicate the proportion where such disagreements and difficulties arose as contrasted with the number of divorce cases which you have tried
>
> By giving me this information you will greatly oblige,
> Yours, truly,
>
> JOHN F. SHAFROTH.

Here is the answer of Judge Allen:

> CHAMBERS DISTRICT COURT,
> Denver, Colo., February 24, 1914.
>
> Hon. JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
> Washington, D. C.
>
> DEAR SENATOR: I take pleasure in answering your inquiry of the 17th instant.
>
> During my experience on the bench, which has covered a period of approximately 20 years, I have never known of a divorce case among the many as such wherein it was claimed or suggested that political differences in any manner had been the cause of troubles between husband and wife. I know of no divorce case brought in the court wherein it was claimed or alleged upon either side that political differences had caused any dissensions to disturb the marital relations between husband and wife.
>
> Universal suffrage has existed by law in our State since 1893.
>
> Sincerely, yours,
>
> GEO. W. ALLEN.
> Judge, District Court.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for his contribution to my argument.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just pardon me half a moment. I am nearly through, and I have been detained a great deal longer than I expected. I must be wearying the Senate.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator a simple question, whether a difference of politics in the family is one of the statutory causes for divorce in Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; it is not, but it is the contention and has been the contention that it would produce that very condition. When we contrast what has been the case in Colorado with the cases in other States we find as a matter of fact that the number of dissensions or cruelties occurring as a cause for divorce has not been greater in Colorado than in the other States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his elucidation of this matter.

Of course, this fallacious argument is conclusively refuted by the women of those States where they have suffrage and have long had it. The women I know from the suffrage States, as well as those I know who believe in the principle from the nonsuffrage States, are just as womanly, just as devoted to the home and family, and make just as good wives and mothers as those who do not have or believe in suffrage. And as far as pure politics is concerned, the suffragists are not any worse, so far as I can see, than the antisuffragists. They are all getting to be good politicians.

STATE RIGHTS.

It is claimed that to submit this amendment to the States is a violation of the doctrine of State rights. I believe in the rights of the State. I have been brought up, politically speaking, on that doctrine all my life. I think it is a good doctrine. I think we ought to uphold it; but that does not mean that we should never enact another amendment to our Constitution.

The Constitution gives the United States jurisdiction over certain questions of suffrage. Already it has exercised that jurisdiction under an amendment by permitting negroes to vote. Surely there is no invasion of the State rights doctrine, per se, by passing a resolution which simply adds to the jurisdiction originally intrusted to the Federal Government under the Constitution. If the doctrine of State rights were carried to this far-fetched conclusion, we could never have an amendment to our Federal Constitution, and the best answer to the proposition is the present unequal, disordered, and diverse conditions of woman suffrage in the various States of the Union. In some of the States they have equal suffrage; in other States they have partial woman suffrage; in other States they have limited woman suffrage; in other States they have woman suffrage only in party primaries. This kind of a condition is intolerable and calls for the exercise of the power of our Federal Constitution, and it is no invasion whatsoever of the doctrine of State rights to amend the Constitution to get rid of these conditions. The States will have the right to fix all the qualifications of suffrage. They can put a property qualification, an educational qualification, a registration qualification, a tax qualification, or any other qualification that will equally apply to all classes of voters. With such vast rights in the State to regulate the vote, it can not be said that an enlargement of the class of voters merely is an invasion of the jurisdiction of the States over this question.

But, above all this, if the amendment invades the principle of State rights and the people of the several States are opposed to this invasion, they are at perfect liberty to vote it down. Thirty-six of them have to vote for it before it becomes the law. This resolution only submits the question to the States. Surely it is not a violation of State rights just to submit to it a law for its approval or its disapproval.

For my part, Mr. President, I do not believe it is the invasion of State rights in any sense. We do not take away any of the rights of the States to fix the qualifications of the voters. We do not interfere with it in the least. It is absurd to say that we do interfere with the qualifications of the voters when we merely enlarge the classes of voters.

ARE WOMEN AT PRESENT REPRESENTED?

The next stock argument is that women are already represented in our Government; that they are represented by the votes of their husbands and fathers and brothers and sons. Such a contention is manifestly unsound. It would be just as reasonable, under this form of argument, to exclude all red-headed men from voting on the grounds that every red-headed man has some relative who is not red-headed who could do his voting for him. It would be just as reasonable to say that the junior Senator from each State should not be allowed to cast a vote in this body because the senior Senator represents him and can vote for him.

How would any junior Senator in this body like that kind of a doctrine to be applied to him, namely, that there is no use for any junior Senator to vote, that the senior Senator represents all the State and therefore represents the junior Senator and can vote for him. Why not restrict it only to the senior Senator? There are a number of junior Senators who would object very seriously to that, and I do not blame these ladies for objecting when a rule of that kind is applied to them.

But admitting that there is a real argument in the matter, what are you going to do about the hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of women who have no husbands, who have no brothers and who have no fathers, and who have no sons to do their voting for them?

Are you going to exclude them because of their misfortune? These surely should have the right to vote directly, and if they did have the right to vote directly there are many evil conditions in every State in the Union that would be remedied. [A pause.] The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], always timely, says in an aside to me, a mistake has been made. He tells me that some one laughed when I spoke of women who had no fathers. Ah, Senators, I was never speaking more accurately, for after this war is over there will be thousands, and it may be millions, of young women in this country who will be without fathers to represent them anywhere. I thank the Senator from Illinois for his kindly mention of the matter, so that I might make my meaning clear to all.

In many of the States they have an eight-hour law for men and no eight-hour law for women. Until a year or two ago, when an eight-hour law was passed for women in the District, there was an eight-hour law for men, and yet you could work women as many hours as they could stand up under, and the men merchants of Washington sent petitions yards long into Congress, urging Congress not to make an eight-hour law for women. There is but one way that women can have representation in this Government, and that is by giving them the right to vote for the officers of the Government.

WOMEN AND WAR.

It used to be contended that they should not have the right to vote because they could not fight for their country. Such a contention could hardly be made in the light of modern warfare and the position of women in respect to it. It is true that there are few women in the ranks of any of the armies. In some few of them I believe they take part. Those who actually fight in any army are inconsequential. In our own Army none of them are made soldiers; but while this is so, look at the wonderful work they are doing in the Ambulance Corps, in the Motor Truck Corps, in the Nurse Corps of the United States Army at home and abroad. They are saving thousands of lives of our boys in France. Look at the army of women war workers here in Washington.

It may be that some Senators will refuse to vote for this just measure, but, Senators, you can rest assured that our boys in France, when they come back, realizing as I know they realize the splendid services of these women who have been sent to our battle fields to minister to them there, to nurse them, to bind up their wounds, to assuage their suffering there—those women who have been angels of mercy to so many of them—you may rest assured that when these boys come back, if we have not already given women the right to vote, that these boys will see to it that the women of America will have the right to take part in this Government.

The women have justly earned the passage of this resolution. They have been weighed in the balance of their country's distress and they have not been found wanting. More and more they are being used to take the place of the men, and if they can not fight at the front, still back at home they are aiding in the great work of producing subsistence and clothing for those who are actually doing the fighting, and at the front they are doing their full part toward rehabilitating and reclaiming and relieving the sick and the wounded.

CONCLUSION.

The President of the United States has declared this to be a war measure. He has earnestly invoked the aid of Democrats and Republicans in passing it. On numerous other questions many Senators who are now opposing this measure have urged all Senators to stand by the President. That argument was good then and it is good now, and I want to urge all Senators to stand by that reasoning. The President has proved himself a great leader. He has definitely committed himself to this cause. He has urged many who have heretofore opposed it to vote for it.

You who have unflinchingly stood by him in the past, I want to urge you not to hesitate now, but to stand by him and his administration on this question in the same loyal way that you have heretofore stood by him.

Some of you believe in suffrage, but you say that the States ought to enact it. Surely, during a crisis like this it seems to me that a mere difference of views as to method should not preclude one from taking that method that will accomplish the result in the quickest way and most effective way.

Mr. President, the women of the United States are capable of voting. They are desirous of voting. They are worthy of voting, and I sincerely trust that the Senate of the United States will give these women, after the manner declared in our Constitution, the right to have their claims for suffrage submitted to the States.

Just recently England has enfranchised more than 6,000,000 of her women citizens. Canada has also enacted an equal-suffrage law. Twelve States of our Union have enfranchised their women. Five more States allow them to vote for President, and in two more women have the right to vote in primaries. In many others they have lesser voting privileges. We are engaged, with our allies, in the splendid task of making the world safe for democracy. Let us also join England and Canada in making our English-speaking countries safe for our women.

Mr. President, women are the equal means, with men, in the continuation of the race; they are the equal partners in the family relation; they are the equal participants in the benefits of good government and they are equal sharers in the unhappiness of bad government. They breathe, they see, they think, they feel equally as the men do all these things. They share with the men equally all their joys and all their sorrows. The men share with them their homes, their children, their religion, their God, their fear of the devil, and their hope of eternal reward; and yet when it comes to sharing votes with their equal partners in all other things on earth below and in heaven above, some men balk and will not do it. And yet some of us say men are consistent and women are inconsistent.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope the Senate will pass this resolution.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, one of the Senators opposing woman suffrage called attention to the Democratic platform of 1916 and insisted that that was a pledge on the part of the Democratic Party against congressional action in favor of the Anthony amendment. The language of that platform is—

> We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

The recommendation to the States to act and the belief upon the part of the leaders of the Democratic Party that the States ought to act and ought to grant these rights is no denial of action by Congress. It lays a just premise if the States shall not have acted that Congress should act, but, after all, the action of Congress would be merely referring the question to the States, except that if the Federal Constitution shall be amended by the vote of three-fourths of the States one-fourth of the States which may not agree will be required to agree by the overwhelming majority of the States that do approve this system.

Mr. President, I think the argument has been exhausted in favor of woman suffrage. It has been discussed in this country for years and years, and everybody knows both sides of the question perfectly. The country has come to a point where innumerable evidences of public approval have been given to the proposal that women shall be treated as human beings and given the right to participate in the election of those who write the law and execute the law.

Among others, the Democratic national convention in 1916, the Republican national convention of 1916, the Democratic national committee of February 12, 1918, the Republican national committee of February, 1918, the Democratic congressional committee of June 24, 1918, indorsed woman suffrage. Indorsements of the Federal amendment have been made in Arizona by the legislature. Women were enfranchised there in 1912.

In Arkansas, by constitutional convention, the Democratic State central committee and the Democratic convention; women were given primary suffrage in 1917, and 40,000 women voted in 1918.

In California it was indorsed by the legislature and the women were enfranchised in 1911.

In Colorado the Anthony amendment was indorsed by the legislature, by the Democratic convention, the Republican convention, and women were enfranchised in 1893. The legislature recommended woman suffrage to other States in 1899 and again in 1915.

In Connecticut the Democratic convention and the Democratic State central committee indorsed woman suffrage. The Republicans indorsed suffrage only in Connecticut.

In Florida it was indorsed by the Democratic executive committee of Dade County.

In Idaho, by the legislature of the State and the Republican convention, and women were enfranchised in 1896.

In Indiana, by the Democratic convention, the Republican convention, the Democratic State central committee, and the Republican State central committee.

In Iowa, by the Republican convention and the Democratic convention.

In Kansas, by the legislature, the Republican convention, and the Democratic convention, and the women were enfranchised in 1912.

In Michigan, by the Democratic State central committee, many Democratic and Republican county conventions, and women were given a vote for President in 1917.

In Minnesota, by the Democratic State central committee, the Hennepin County Republican committee, and the Hennepin County Democratic committee.

In Missouri, by the Democratic convention and Republican convention.

In Montana, by the legislature. Women were enfranchised there in 1914.

In Nebraska, by the Democratic convention and Republican convention, and women were granted the vote for President in 1917.

In Nevada women were enfranchised in 1914.

In New York, by the legislature, Republican convention, Democratic convention, and most of the county conventions. Women were enfranchised by over 100,000 majority of the male vote of New York State in 1917.

In North Carolina, indorsed by Republican convention.

In North Dakota, by the legislature, and women were given the vote for President in 1917.

In Ohio, indorsed by the Republican convention.

In Oklahoma, indorsed by the Republican convention; by the Democratic State committee; by the Democratic convention suffrage only was indorsed.

In Oregon, by the legislature. Women were enfranchised in Oregon in 1912.

In Rhode Island, indorsed by the legislature; Democratic convention, September 24, 1918; Republican convention, September 25, 1918; women given the vote for President in 1917.

In South Dakota, by the Democratic convention and Republican convention.

In Texas, by the legislature and the Democratic convention. Women were granted primary suffrage in 1918, and 386,000 women voted in Texas in July, 1918.

Utah, by its legislature, enfranchised women in 1896.

Washington, by its legislature, enfranchised women in 1910.

Wyoming, by its legislature, has commended woman suffrage to other States several times, and was the first State in the world to enfranchise women in 1869.

The King of England signed the bill granting suffrage to wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters of Canadian soldiers as a temporary measure in November, 1917. The King of England signed a bill granting equal suffrage with men to British women, 30 years of age, in February, 1918, and a bill granting equal suffrage to all Canadian women on the same terms as to men in May, 1918.

I ask permission to put into the RECORD quotations from President Wilson, from the Democratic National Committee, and from various other authorities on this question, without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEMOCRATIC PARTY SPEAKS.

1. President Woodrow Wilson:

"The services of women during this supreme crisis of the world's history have been of the most signal usefulness and distinction. The war could not have been fought without them or its sacrifices endured. It is high time that some part of our debt of gratitude to them should be acknowledged and paid, and the only acknowledgment they ask is their admission to the suffrage. Can we justly refuse it? As for America, it is my earnest hope that the Senate of the United States will give an unmistakable answer to this question by passing the suffrage amendment to our Federal Constitution before the end of this session." (Letter to French Union for Woman Suffrage.)

2. Democratic national committee:

"Resolved, That the executive committee of the Democratic national committee, after a referendum vote of the members of the national committee representing the 48 States, and in pursuance thereof does hereby indorse the Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for woman suffrage and urges favorable action thereon by the United States Senate." (Feb. 12, 1918.)

3. Democratic congressional committee:

"Resolved, That the national Democratic congressional committee hereby place itself on record as being in favor of submitting the Federal woman suffrage amendment for ratification and hopes that the Senate will vote to submit it at the present session." (June 24, 1918.)

4. New York State Democratic platform (State of largest electoral vote):

"Resolved, That we welcome women voters to the electorate, and we confidently invite them to join the Democratic Party upon its record. We believe in equal suffrage, without any regard to sex, and we recognize that the present influence, when our Nation is engaged in a great war, for equal rights and individual freedom, is a time peculiarly appropriate for its adoption by the people of the United States.

"We therefore urge the immediate adoption by the United States Senate of the concurrent resolution amending the Constitution so as to confer the right of suffrage upon woman. We demand that the United States Senators from New York represent their constituents by voting for the proposed amendment.

5. Illinois Democratic platform (third largest electoral vote):

"Resolved, That the Democratic Party of Illinois demands the immediate enactment of the constitutional amendment now before the United States Senate, and it pledges itself to throw its organized strength behind the adoption of that amendment when it is submitted for ratification to the various States."

6. Wisconsin Democratic platform:

"Resolved, To give recognition to the wonderful sacrifice and service of the women of America, we approve President Wilson's recommendations for woman suffrage by Federal amendment through ratification by the States."

7. West Virginia Democratic platform:

"Whereas the result of the coming election must not be one that can be construed by the Nation's enemies as a repudiation of the President and his war policies. Such a result might cost the lives of thousands of American soldiers: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we indorse the policies of President Wilson on woman suffrage and upon all matters pertaining to labor, and our candidates pledge themselves to support these policies both during and after the war and to the ratification of the pending amendment on national prohibition. Pending the adoption of the suffrage amendment, we favor extending to the women of West Virginia the right to participate in primaries and conventions. With full recognition of the loyalty and patriotism of men of every political party, we appeal to the whole people of West Virginia to join us in the election of a Senate and Congress that the world will know we are in active sympathy with the President and the war."

8. Nebraska Democratic platform (not included in above lists):

"Resolved, That we place patriotism above politics.

"Resolved, That we favor equal suffrage for all citizens, regardless of sex.

"Resolved, That it is the supreme task of the civilized world to crush the insolent attempt of German autocracy to substitute a military dictatorship for self-government and the right of independent thought."

REPUBLICAN PARTY SPEAKS.

1. Theodore Roosevelt, ex-President:

"I very earnestly hope that Congress will pass the suffrage amendment at once. Justice demands this action, and no possible good can come from further delay."

2. Mr. Will H. Hays, chairman national committee:

"I believe that when the world is fighting for democracy—'the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government'—the time has come to take steps insuring political freedom to the women of the entire United States, and I therefore ask the Sixty-fifth Congress to submit the Federal suffrage amendment to be ratified by the legislatures of the several States."

3. SIMON D. FESS, chairman Republican congressional committee:

"I will not, simply because I have the power, withhold from woman a right she can claim with equal force, that I may monopolize it. I will not deny her a privilege which I demand for myself. I will not refuse her entrance to a field of duty in which her abilities peculiarly qualify her to exert an ever-widening influence against prevalent evils and on behalf of the good of humanity. I shall, so far as in me lies, remove every barrier against her right and privilege, and shall open wide the door of opportunity to her performance of public duty by placing in her hands America's most effective weapon, the ballot, democracy's instrument of command."

4. New York State Republican platform:

"Resolved, That the Federal suffrage amendment has passed the House of Representatives by a tremendous Republican vote. Practically every Republican county committee in the State has urged its approval. The decisive plurality for suffrage in this great Republican State has so clearly shown the sentiment of the people, that we emphatically call upon the United States Senators from New York to vote for the submission of this amendment to the States." (July 18, 1918.)

5. Ohio Republican platform:

"We favor woman suffrage and the immediate submission by Congress for the action of the several States of the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution granting them such right." (Aug. 28, 1918.)

6. Indiana Republican platform:

"The Republican Party of Indiana reaffirms its declaration for equal suffrage. It urges the immediate passage of the Federal amendment by the United States Senate and its ratification by the State, and commends our Senators and Representatives in Congress for their support of this measure." (May 29, 1918.)

7. Iowa Republican platform:

"The Republican Party of Iowa reaffirms its declaration for equal suffrage. It urges the immediate passage of the Federal amendment by the United States Senate and its ratification by the State, and commends our Senators and Representatives in Congress for their support of the amendment." (July 10, 1918.)

8. Colorado Republican platform:

"We stanchly support the cause of national woman suffrage now."

9. Wisconsin Republican platform:

"The splendid spirit of the helpfulness and efficient service of the women of the Nation in every activity have been thrown into bolder relief by the war emergencies. They have demonstrated anew their entire fitness for and right to equal opportunity in the conduct of the Government, and we therefore favor the extension of the elective franchise to women."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the argument practically has been presented so fully that it is unnecessary for any man to say anything further about it. Everybody very well knows what the reasons are which justify the passage of this joint resolution. Those reasons are increasing day by day as the war goes on.

Women own half the property in the United States now, and if the war goes on much longer they will own it all by the natural laws of inheritance; but the right of women to vote is not based upon property, it is based upon what is infinitely superior to property. Women bring men into the world, and when they do so they suffer an anguish which is not surpassed by any soldier on the field of battle. No thinking man and no feeling man ought to ever forget the sacrifices that women make for men. The happiness of men is promoted and cared for by women. Women give men their language; they teach it to them as children. They teach them their manners and their morals and their religion. They are fully equal to men in every sense, and are deserving of every tribute of respect which men can pay to women. Moreover, no nation ever rises higher than the level of its women. That of itself justifies men in giving women their right to participate in the conduct of government.

Mr. WILFLEY. Mr. President, I do not desire to attempt to make an argument on this question. I quite agree with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] that it has been thoroughly discussed, but since I am paired on the question I desire to submit a few observations in reference to the subject.

The question of woman's suffrage is now being given world-wide consideration, and I believe the time has come when the franchise should be given to the women of the United States. As an abstract proposition, woman is as much entitled to vote as man, and this right and privilege should not be longer denied her, unless there is clear and unmistakable reason for it. To say that woman will exercise this right and privilege in a manner detrimental to public good is a reflection upon her intelligence and interest in the welfare of society. I can not believe that woman will exercise the franchise for harmful or evil purposes, for it would be radically inconsistent with the influence she now exerts on all public questions. I believe that she is as much interested in the good of humanity as man. To say that a certain class of women will exercise the franchise for evil purposes, and that those who would exercise it for good purposes will remain indifferent does not appeal to me as consistent with experience. Woman's influence and activity in all public matters, in which she is allowed to participate, do not justify the assumption that there is danger in conferring upon her this important right and privilege. She has demonstrated that she can meet responsibility and perform important duties requiring wisdom, discretion, and courage with as much intelligence and foresight as man. I have no doubt that there are many good women who are indifferent to this question, but I believe that when suffrage is conferred upon them they will respond to its duties and obligations with genuine interest and sincerity. It seems to me that this is a fitting time to give recognition to the wonderful sacrifice and service of the women of America by submitting to the people of the States an opportunity to extend to her the right to vote. If the requisite number of States ratify this amendment, I believe the women of the United States will exercise the franchise with intelligence and interest that will result in benefit and improvement to the public welfare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the merits or demerits of the pending resolution. I only desire to very briefly state the reasons for the vote I intend to cast.

There are two ways to get woman suffrage, one by an amendment to the Federal Constitution, the other by an amendment to the constitutions of the several States. If the people of each State did not have the power to get woman suffrage within their own States, there might be more reason for urging an amendment to the Federal Constitution. I submit, however, that as fast as the voters of any State become ready and willing to accept woman suffrage, it will be conferred; and as quickly as the women of any State signify a desire for it, my belief is it will be given to them by the men of the State. In my judgment this is a matter which should be decided by the States severally, and not by the Nation as a whole. The country is so large and the views of the people so varied that, in my judgment, the right course is to let each State settle this question for itself.

I say this as one who believes in the principle of woman suffrage, and who upon three several occasions within six years voted for it in my own State. When the question comes up in my own State again in the form of an amendment to our Ohio constitution I shall vote for it. Entertaining the views I do, I am not willing that any other State in the Union shall compel Ohio to have woman suffrage if the State does not want it; and I am not willing that any other State shall deny us this privilege if Ohio wants it.

In 1912 a woman-suffrage amendment to the Ohio constitution was offered, and with a total vote thereon of 586,295 out of a total voting population of probably 1,250,000, the vote was yeas 249,420, nays 336,875, a majority against the amendment of 87,455.

In 1914 a similar amendment was presented to our people, and a total vote cast thereon of 853,685, of which 335,390 voted yea and 518,295 voted nay, making a majority against the amendment of 182,905.

On February 21, 1917, the general assembly of the State of Ohio passed a law conferring upon women the right to vote for presidential electors. Under our constitution this act, upon petition, was submitted to a referendum vote. The total vote thereon was 990,644, of which 422,262 voted for it and 568,382 voted against it, defeating the statute by 146,120 votes. This is the last pronouncement in Ohio on the subject.

Waiving for the sake of the argument my own personal convictions as to how woman suffrage should be secured, ought I, as a Senator representing a sovereign State, to ignore the sentiment of the people of the State as evidenced by these three several votes within a period of six years? Can mind conceive of any other subject upon which I would be justified in ignoring the voice of the voters at the polls? Would not the very men and women who are now insisting that I defy the voters of my State condemn me if I ignored that vote on any other issue?

My political philosophy teaches me that it is my duty on behalf of the majority voters in Ohio to say to the people of those States who have settled this question for themselves, and who want to impose their views upon our State, "Let us decide this question for ourselves as you decided it for yourselves," and, on the other hand, I owe it to the minority voters in Ohio who want woman suffrage to say to those States who do not want it, "You ought to have no hand in refusing us this right if we do want it. We will settle this question for ourselves, as you wish to settle it in your own State."

After the electors of Ohio have on three successive times in six years defeated woman suffrage, ought I to vote for a joint resolution which will enable the other States to impose woman suffrage upon Ohio whether her people want it or not?

To support the pending resolution means that the legislature of the State of Nevada, with a population according to the last Federal census of 81,875, shall have the same voice in determining this question as the legislature of the State of Ohio, with a population according to the same census—that of 1910—of 4,767,121; and the 13 States of Nevada, Wyoming, Delaware, Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, Utah, Montana, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Oregon, with a population according to the Federal census of 1910 of 23,415 less than the State of Ohio, shall have 13 times the voice in determining this question as the State of Ohio, notwithstanding the fact that her vote has been so decidedly against it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield in just a moment.

I speak only for myself. For the reasons very briefly stated I can not, and I will not defy what I construe to be the wish of Ohio as expressed by her people at the polls, and I shall, therefore, vote against the pending resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio now yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I merely desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if what he states would not be the situation of affairs with reference to any amendment of the Constitution?

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly so, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Then, I also inquire of the Senator, whether his criticism is not a criticism of the Constitution?

Mr. POMERENE. It is not, because the States have a right to settle this question each for itself. Many other questions might not be able to be settled in that way.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator from Ohio recognize that there are various obstructions in the constitutions of many of the States of the Union that practically prevent and oppose the submission of constitutional amendments to their own constitutions; and are not such obstructions of such a nature that all of the States can not have submitted constitutional amendments to their own constitutions?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have understood that there is one such State constitution. If the people of that State are not satisfied with their own State constitution, they will change it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Just one moment. But that is no reason why I should be called upon to ignore what my own State has done on the subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio seems to think that there is only one such State. The State of Vermont can not submit a constitutional amendment to its people except through a convention once in 10 years. New Hampshire is another State where there can be a constitutional amendment submitted only through a convention once every seven years. There are a number of States that provide that a resolution to submit a constitutional amendment must be passed at one session of the legislature and then again at the next succeeding session of the legislature before it may be submitted to the people.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I quite understand the position of the Senator from Colorado. He insists that the voters of other States shall have their will, but at the same time he says to me that the voters of Ohio shall not be permitted to express their will. I primarily represent the State of Ohio, and, so long as I shall represent the State of Ohio, I shall not ignore the vote of the people of that State on this or on any other question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that there could be no amendment submitted to the Constitution of the United States if his logic were to prevail? Can it not be seen that if the Federal Government wanted to enlarge its constitutional powers and an objection of that kind on the part of one State were considered sufficient, it would prevent any amendment of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Colorado belongs to that eminent school of thinkers who believe in having their own way and condemning everybody else who wants to exercise the same privilege.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, Mr. President; I do not believe in that; but I believe that no one State should block an amendment to the Federal Constitution. The Constitution has provided the method for its amendment and affords a safeguard against improper amendments by requiring a three-fourths majority of States to act favorably in order to adopt a proposed amendment. Consequently, I am not one of the persons who want to have another State controlled by his State; I want to say that the provisions of the Federal Constitution must at times be amended, for we have got to have progress, and if we can not, one State practically would be permitted to stand in the way of the Constitution being amended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Colorado takes his seat I will ask him to reply to an inquiry which I do not mean to be impertinent. The afternoon is fast slipping away. It has been the idea of a good many Senators that a vote should be taken to-day, but during the last hour or so the rumor seems to be to the effect that there will be no vote this afternoon. In view of that rumor, if it be true, I want to ask the Senator from Colorado or the Senator from New Mexico what is the plan of the Senators who are managing the joint resolution?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I see no objection to going ahead with the discussion of this question, and I should like very much to see the amendments to the joint resolution disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it the intention of the Senator from New Mexico to move that the Senate adjourn or recess until to-morrow?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That will be governed quite largely by the disposition which may be manifested here by Senators. I should like to have the consideration of this measure proceed in regular order, at least until the usual hour for adjournment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York is not aware that there is any usual hour for adjournment. My interest in this matter is to know——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think it is generally understood that at about 5 o'clock we adjourn.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Until when?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That matter is not under my dictation; but I should like very much to proceed with the discussion of this matter and, if possible, dispose of the amendments this afternoon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in hearty agreement, Mr. President, with the Senator's desire to dispose of the amendments this afternoon; and I will go further and agree to dispose of the whole matter as soon as possible; but there has been a very distinct rumor going about the Senate Chamber that the managers of the joint resolution at least had under consideration a proposal to adjourn over until Saturday, and that there shall be no vote until Saturday. I think, in all frankness to the Senate, to Senators who have come many, many miles to be here to-day to vote upon this matter, as they have come upon at least two or three other occasions, it should be understood what the program is.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will inform those of us who are ignorant upon the subject as to the number of Senators who will probably make speeches upon this measure, that might influence the action which we would suggest to the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Even if the Senator from New York knew how many were to speak upon the subject and could give an accurate answer to that suggestion, it would have no bearing upon his question as to whether or not the Senate is to meet to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, Mr. President, I might inquire of the Senator from New York the purpose of his inquiry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. So that Senators may know approximately when a vote is to be taken, and upon what day.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is manifestly impossible for any Senator——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Senators had been given to understand that upon Thursday, September 26, this matter was to be pushed to a vote, if possible; but if the Senate adjourns or recesses over Friday and makes no attempt to vote upon Friday it is apparent that there is some change in the program, and I wanted to know whether there was any change contemplated.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, would the Senator from New York like to fix a day certain to vote, which would allow possibly 10 or 12 speeches to be made?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not representing the Senators who are opposed to the joint resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thought the Senator was.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in favor of a vote upon this matter just as soon as possible.

Mr. PITTMAN. I naturally assumed the Senator was representing some phase of this question; but if he is not, very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is there any objection to having a vote upon the joint resolution to-morrow?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not see any objection, possibly, except that there are several very able speakers who I have heard express a desire to discuss this question, and I would suggest that we vote as soon as those speakers have an opportunity to express themselves. It might be well if we entered into a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on some day certain, and then the speakers could arrange their time to suit themselves. Would the Senator favor agreeing on some day certain to vote?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I certainly would, and at the earliest possible moment; but if, as the Senator indicates, there are 10 or 12 able speeches yet to be made upon this topic, then I ask why the suggestion that we adjourn over to-morrow?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have not heard that suggestion, except from the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. ASHURST. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi raises a question of very grave magnitude. It is evident that there would be differences of opinion upon that amendment. It involves a question of policy, which, if it were considered that the Senate desired to take it up at this time for the purpose of seriously discussing and disposing of it, would doubtless cause extended debate. If the Senate should deem that it were called upon at this time to pass upon a question of that sort, I have no doubt that there would be almost interminable discussion in this body. But, Mr. President, that would not be a serious matter, for we could afford to discuss these questions, provided, however, that their discussion and action would not jeopardize a question which is of much greater importance.

It is known that the House has passed this proposed constitutional amendment; it is also known that it is practically impossible to get the Members of the House assembled at this session of Congress in adequate numbers to pass another amendment to the Constitution, especially an amendment involving the question of the right of woman suffrage; and to put upon this proposed constitutional amendment any other amendment would be virtually saying that the woman-suffrage amendment should not be passed at this session of Congress. I think it must be apparent to everyone here that the practical effect of putting any amendment upon joint resolution No. 200 would mean the defeat of any action at this session of Congress.

Therefore, Mr. President, without attempting to enter into a discussion of the merits of the pending amendment to the joint resolution, or any other amendment which may be proposed, I want to ask the Senators to vote against putting any amendment upon the proposed woman-suffrage constitutional amendment. I believe it would be unwise to do so at this time. The woman-suffrage amendment has been pending for years; the time is approaching when it should be adopted; the time is at least approaching when upon this single question the Senate of the United States should record itself; and I therefore request in all earnestness that no one seriously consider adding any amendment to the joint resolution which is now under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the request of the Senator from New Mexico that nobody should "seriously consider" an amendment which involves the very structure of society and the nature of the civilization of some parts of this country is a rather unprecedented request. I did not intend to take the time of the Senate; I do not admit that the question of woman suffrage itself is any more important—in parts of this country at any rate—than this amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. President, I nurse no delusions upon this question. I hug no fallacies to my soul. I take no part whatsoever in the argument that a constitutional amendment can be unconstitutional. I do not feel called upon to pay any tribute to "woman." Thank God, a great majority of women constitute in themselves a tribute to womanhood. It is not necessary to take up the time of the Senate apologizing for a vote that I am about to cast by praising the womanhood of America.

Mr. President, I do not nurse any delusion to the effect that men are superior to women; nor do I nurse any delusion that women are superior to men. One is superior to the other in certain regards; the other to it in certain other respects. That women are superior to men in taste and in delicacy and in purity of sentiment and of conduct few men would deny. That men are superior to them in some respects I imagine few women would deny if they looked at the matter in an impassionate way. There are differences between them. There is no question of superiority at all. My wife could cast as intelligent a vote as I can. My daughters could vote as intelligently as my sons. I have no opposition to woman suffrage per se if it were confined to a homogeneous electorate. If I were a resident of Oregon or of California or of Iowa, and the question were presented to me as a State issue, I think I should vote for it. Being a resident of the State of Mississippi, if it were presented to me as a State issue I should undoubtedly vote against it. Nor do I grant any moral right in California, Iowa, or Oregon to tell Mississippi who shall vote within her limits; nor do I claim any right for Mississippi to prescribe for them the conditions of voting within their borders.

Mr. President, my proposed amendment to the amendment may strike the Senator from New Mexico as an inconsequential matter; he may think that it makes no difference one way or the other what becomes of Mississippi, or South Carolina, or Louisiana in this Union. He is not the man that I expected to take that position, but he has taken it. I expected it from some others.

The amendment which I have offered is a very simple one. It merely inserts the word white before the word person, and thus gives white women the suffrage, leaving any State that chooses to extend it to negro women or not so to extend it, whichever may be to its best and highest interest. If any of you think I am not in earnest about it you are very much mistaken. If you adopt my amendment I shall then, and then only, vote for the constitutional amendment as amended. If so amended it would secure white supremacy and the supremacy of the white man's civilization and his social institutions for all time to come, because the white women could vote under it and the other women could not unless the people of a given State decreed that they could; nor could Chinese women born in America, nor Japanese women upon the Pacific slope, vote under my amendment either, unless voluntarily vested with the privilege by the people of the States on the slope.

Oh, it is very easy to measure up the interests of a majority of the country, and when you have settled your mind about that—you being in the majority section—to say as to the minority: "Oh, they are inconsequential; they are insignificant; let them go."

I had not intended to address myself to the amendment, because I knew that every man with brains enough to rattle in a mustard shell knew why I had offered it, what the motive was, what the reason was, and that it was useless for me to argue it or to do more than state it. Upon its mere statement every Member of this body would know without any aid or suggestion from me how he wanted to vote.

Every man of you knows, and if I talked a whole day you would not know any better than you do right now. So far from delaying the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment, if my amendment to the amendment be passed it will hurry up the final adoption, and not only secure its passage through these two bodies of the National Legislature, but it will secure its adoption by three-fourths of the States, because the opposition in the States would come from the very section which I represent if you allow the constitutional amendment to go through as at present framed, unamended.

Mr. President, having said that much I want to add just one word upon another subject. I want to beg Senators to let this whole matter come to a vote just as soon as it possibly can come, and let us be through with it and go on with the carrying on of this war. In the words of William Shakespeare:

> If it were done * * * then 'twere well it were done quickly.

As far as I am concerned, I have made it a rule all my life never to hold myself responsible for results. I do my duty as I understand it, and then when I am through with it, if a result comes about against which I have voted or against which I have worked, that, so far as I am concerned, is a thing resting in the laps of the gods. I have nothing to do with it; "man proposes, God disposes." Let this matter come to a vote, and let it be decided one way or the other for this session. Let us go on with the carrying on of this war; and then, after we have done all that we can do with regard to that, let some of us go home. I for one am homesick, and a whole lot of other people are. I am perfectly willing to take up all the time that is necessary for great and important matters. I do not mean that this is not great and important in one sense, but I do say that its importance has been exaggerated by both sides.

Here comes a man on one extreme and tells us that all the home ties are going to be broken up and woman is going to cease to be gentle and sweet and chaste and pure and become unwomanly if she votes. I do not believe a word of that. It has not had that effect where woman suffrage has operated. Here comes somebody on the other side and seems to think that a moral millennium is going to set in provided the women vote. It has not set in in Colorado; it has not set in anywhere else where women vote. The line of moral demarcation between people is not a sex line at all. It is a line that takes in both sexes. If women in a bad community vote, you will have just a little bit worse government than you had before, because your bad majority will be increased; and if women in a good community vote, you will have a little bit better government than you had before, because your good majority will be increased.

Now you want to put this measure upon Mississippi, not by her own free will, but by your force. I am not arguing that it would be unconstitutional to do it. It is folly to say that a constitutional amendment could be unconstitutional, because the moment it is adopted it becomes a part of the Constitution. I am not saying that it is violative of the spirit of the Constitution, because the right to amend the Constitution was written into the Constitution as well as the other provisions that were written into it. But you are trying to force upon us a measure which will make an ignorant, incompetent, unequipped majority in our midst still larger than it is now, and still harder to handle. I do not think you have the ethical right to do that. It is not comity.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] said to-day that the same provisions that would deprive the negro men of the vote in Mississippi would deprive the negro women. There would be that many more to deprive. Mississippi has not violated a word or a syllable or a dot of the Federal Constitution, and the Supreme Court of the United States has said so. We have kept within the line. We have preserved the white man's civilization and the supremacy of his family life under great difficulties. Now you want to make it more difficult, if not almost impossible, to do it; and the Senator from New Mexico tells us that it is inconsequential—substantially, that it makes no difference! Oh, it depends upon whose ox is gored. It may be inconsequential to him. It is not so to me nor to Mrs. Williams nor to my daughters nor to my neighbors.

If you want to get this amendment through, adopt my amendment to the amendment, and two-thirds of the opposition will cease at once, not only here but in the States when they come to the question of adoption. Not only that, but it will be a good thing for the South, because it will fix the white majority forever. I tell you, Mr. President, you can say what you please academically, but a people with an electorate which is not homogeneous is a people sitting upon a volcano. You can not unwrite the handwriting of God, not merely upon the countenances and the colors of men but upon their inward race traits and tendencies, nor can you wipe out the dislike or distrust which they entertain for one another, nor can you wipe out the fear that every man of a race which he thinks is superior entertains for the social equality which almost necessarily follows a condition of political equality, whenever the inferior race is in sufficient numbers to constitute a balance of power. You can safely trust the crawling politicians on both side to nurse it in order that one set of politicians may defeat another.

I had not intended to say so much, Mr. President, and would not have said it save for the remarks of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say with reference to the allusion of the Senator to my State that woman suffrage was adopted in Colorado in 1893, and there never has been even a petition presented to the Legislature of Colorado asking that the question be resubmitted to the people. There never has been a bill introduced in either the senate or the house of representatives of that State for the resubmission of the question to the people of the State. That is the most conclusive evidence that Colorado is entirely satisfied with the laws which it has adopted granting woman suffrage.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, on a former occasion I presented to the Senate a very extended petition to this body to pass this woman-suffrage amendment. That petition was signed by thousands of the representative people of the United States. It has been filed with this body. I have here, furnished by representatives of the Woman's Party, another petition, which has been signed by not less than 50,000 people of this country. Of course, this does not do more than indicate the sentiment of the people of the United States. It simply shows that the people of this country are deeply interested in this subject.

The attention of the Senate has already been called to the action which various States and organizations have taken in regard to this amendment. The political leaders of the country of all parties have declared in favor of the amendment. The political organizations of the country in large majority have declared in favor of the amendment, and I believe the best thought of the people of the country is that the amendment ought to be adopted. At any rate, Mr. President, I feel that there is such a universal opinion regarding the amendment that it at least ought to be submitted to the States for their decision.

I am one of those who believe that the provision in our Constitution providing for its amendment is just as important a part of it as any other. I believe that the people who framed the Constitution contemplated that the right of change was one of its most important and fundamental features, and when it becomes manifest that a very large percentage of the people of this country desire to express themselves upon the question as to whether or not the Constitution should be amended I do not believe it is right to deny them that privilege.

I am not going to discuss the merits of this amendment particularly at this time, but I do mention these things for the purpose of impressing upon the minds of Senators, if I may, that this question is a live one throughout this country, and, in my humble judgment, we have no right to deprive these States of their constitutional right to decide whether or not the Constitution shall be amended.

Mr. President, I ask permission to present to the Senate these petitions, that they may rest in the archives of the Senate along with the other petitions upon this subject which have been presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The petitions will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate adjourn until noon to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before that motion is put, if the Senator will withhold it for a moment, I want to ask for the yeas and nays upon the pending amendment, so that they may be ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, what is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has submitted a motion that the Senate adjourn, but withholds it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator to withhold it for a moment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Does the Senator seek a vote to-night upon the amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I merely seek to order the yeas and nays, so that when we meet to-morrow they will be ordered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have no objection to that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico withholds his motion. The yeas and nays are demanded upon the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. Is the demand sustained? [A pause.] Evidently a sufficient number have seconded the request, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

H. R. 12976. An act providing for the protection of the users of telephone and telegraph service and the properties and funds belonging thereto during Government operation and control; and

H. J. Res. 331. Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. R. 12976. An act providing for the protection of the users of telephone and telegraph service and the properties and funds belonging thereto during Government operation and control was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

H. J. Res. 331. Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New Mexico to modify his request so that we may have an executive session.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand that an executive session is desired. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate September 26 (legislative day of September 24), 1918.

REGISTER OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Thomas Jones, of Oregon, to be register of the land office at Vale, Oreg., his present term expiring October 11, 1918. Reappointment.

NAVAL OFFICER OF CUSTOMS.

Lot W. Reiff, of Reading, Pa., to be naval officer of customs in customs collection district No. 11, with headquarters at Philadelphia, Pa., to fill an existing vacancy.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate September 26 (legislative day of September 24), 1918.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

Hugh R. Robertson to be United States attorney, western district of Texas.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Fred C. Pabst to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 22, with headquarters at Galveston, Tex.

ASSOCIATE JUSTICE, SUPREME COURT, TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

William S. Edings to be associate justice of the supreme court, Territory of Hawaii.

ASSOCIATE JUDGE OF CIRCUIT COURT OF HAWAII.

John T. De Bolt to be second judge, first circuit, Territory of Hawaii.

POSTMASTERS.

ARKANSAS.

Sam R. Carpenter, Arkadelphia.

GEORGIA.

Nellie B. Brimberry, Albany.
James M. Scott, Bainbridge.
William F. Boone, Baxley.
Joseph B. Rountree, Boston.
John L. Callaway, Covington.
Frank S. Murray, Fort Valley.
James L. Teasley, Hartwell.
Aylesbury S. Sparks, sr., La Fayette.
Susie M. Atkinson, Newnan.
Johnnie B. Roddenbery, Thomasville.
Emmett A. Speir, Wadley.

MINNESOTA.

Frank Gillis, Anoka.
Elsie E. Rathbun, Ashby.
Mary E. Stark, Buffalo.
William T. Nicholson, Crookston.
Frank A. Lindbergh, Crosby.
Andrew W. Johnson, Forest Lake.
Edna M. Price, Fulda.
Hope Mouser, Gilbert.
Levi G. Sanders, Mahnomen.
Gustave A. Krueger, Plummer.
Albert M. Evenson, Ruthton.
Frederick Schilplin, St. Cloud.
Jonas W. Howe, Stewartville.

MISSISSIPPI.

Edward W. Walton, Booneville.
Thomas H. Sharp, Columbus.
Milton A. Candler, Corinth.
Corinne Kendall Dampeer, Crystal Springs.
Sibyl Q. Stratton, Liberty.
Henry H. Sikes, Starkville.
Samuel E. Carruth, Summit.
Walter L. Collins, Union.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Americus Enfield, Bedford.
Charles McBride, Blair Station.
William L. McLaren, Cressona.
William R. Speer, Everett.
Emma M. Schrock, Garrett.
Thomas S. Moreland, Jamestown.
Edwin W. Dye, Lawrenceville.
Paul O. Brosius, Lock Haven.
Cornelius P. Reing, Mahanoy City.
Thomas P. Logan, Midland.
Frank Snyder, Minersville.
Philip W. Miller, New Freedom.
Merle D. Salyards, Pitcairn.
Arthur N. Rose, Rouseville.
John T. Kennedy, Sharon.
Karl Smith, Sharpsville.
Robert M. Foster, State College.
Edward M. Hirsh, Tamaqua.
Oscar W. Kaegel, Thompsontown.
William A. McMahan, West Pittsburgh.
Joe C. Harding, Windber.

UTAH.

Isadore Lessing, Beaver.
Parley P. Willey, Bountiful.
William H. Fitzwater, Duchesne.
Jessie M. French, Greenriver.
Oliver C. Larsen, Monroe.
Randall Christensen, Moroni.
Adelbert K. Huish, Payson.
Daniel L. Argyle, Salina.
James Gowans, Tooele.
Abraham Binkele, Tremonton.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 26, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, our refuge and our strength, put forth, we beseech Thee, Thy healing hand and restore our soldiers at home to health and strength, that the preparation in which they are engaged for the strenuous work before them may not be hindered.

Let Thy protecting arm be over our soldiers abroad and their allies, that they may go forward with the work in which they are engaged; that the Huns may be driven back and peace restored to a suffering, sorrowing world; that the kingdom of righteousness may have its sway among the peoples of all the earth; for humanity's sake and in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for not more than 15 minutes.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman before the gentleman from Missouri makes his speech, if he gets leave. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I object for the present.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would ask the gentleman not to do that.

Mr. MEEKER. If I may address——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that; the gentleman has made a point of no quorum.

Mr. MEEKER. If I can address the House for a minute——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman has raised the point of a quorum, and he can not address the House.

Mr. MEEKER. I will withdraw that point if I may have a minute.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection if the gentleman takes 5 minutes; but I do not see the necessity for his taking 15 minutes to put something in the RECORD.

Mr. MEEKER. May I just ask for one minute—I ask that I may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has just asked to address the House for one minute.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will make it five minutes I shall not object.

Mr. MEEKER. I can not get through in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for 10 minutes to address the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair will recognize him to make a speech after the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON], who says he has a question of personal privilege. The gentleman will state it.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Under date of August 28, 1918, there appeared an article in the Sioux Falls Press, a newspaper published in my district. Similar articles appeared in the press of the country. I quote a portion of the article so published:

[By the Associated Press.]

WITH THE AMERICAN FORCES IN FRANCE, August 27.

The British authorities, it has been learned, recently refused their permission for Representative ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, and Representative CHARLES H. DILLON, of South Dakota, to visit the British battle front. They arrived in France late in July on board a British vessel and later visited the American front. It is believed they now are touring Italy.

ALLEGE TALK ON SHIP.

The request that the Congressmen be permitted to pay a visit to the British lines is said to have been made in the usual manner by the American Army authorities. When the declination was received an investigation was begun. This, it is asserted, resulted in the explanation that both men had talked freely aboard ship in such a manner about certain subjects affecting the war that both British and American military and civilian passengers brought the subject of their conversation to the attention of the officers commanding the troops aboard the vessel and also the ship's captain.

MILITARY INVESTIGATES.

The exact tenor of the statements the Congressmen are alleged to have made is not known, but the military authorities are pursuing their investigation of the incident.

The Sioux Falls Press, on July 29, in an editorial said:

Friends of Congressman DILLON—and he has friends who could not vote for him because of his misfortunes in matters of national honor—will feel sure that his unhappy experience with the British Government is a consequence not of an intended wrong on his part but of another blunder of utterance. What he said aboard ship which caused him to be reported to the captain and to military officers in command is not yet revealed. It was duly reported to the British Government, which apparently did not care to have men who talk that way mingling among British soldiers at the front. And for this attitude we do not blame the British Government in the slightest degree.

I brand the statements which I have just read as maliciously false and without foundation in fact. The article further states that I voted against the selective draft. This statement is an unmitigated falsehood, and the RECORD will bear out this fact. Again, it is stated that I opposed the armed-neutrality bill. This statement is likewise untrue, and the RECORD will disclose that I voted for this measure.

The article published in the Sioux Falls Press is more than a false statement of my record. In effect its tendency is to call in question my loyalty to my own country and my sympathy for the cause for which she and our allies are fighting.

This, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, states a question of the highest personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has stated a question of personal privilege.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I can conceive of but one motive for this unwarranted and scandalous attack upon me. It is certain that nothing in my conduct nor in my work would justify the subject matter of the newspaper article to which I have just called the attention of the House.

It is quite possible that I incurred the enmity of some of the ship's officers while crossing the ocean, but if I did so it was because of my earnest efforts to see that the 3,000 American boys on board the vessel and clothed in the uniform of the Republic should be treated as they would be treated if they had been on board an American vessel.

On the boat were 28 soldiers from my own State, many of whom knew me personally. I was a constant visitor among them. I was, of course, unusually interested in these boys, and was exceedingly anxious to see that their quarters should be made comfortable and that they should be given good and wholesome food.

Here are the names and addresses of the South Dakota boys on board the vessel:

Curtis W. Poole, Loyalton; Russel Lewis, Mina; Frank Lewis, Mina; Hiram J. Wakefield, Faulkton; August Changguth, Vital; Elbridge S. Gerry, St. Francis; Victor A. Malmsten, Redfield; Beruth M. Johnson, Conde; B. W. Lynn, Winner; James Crha, Ipswich; John W. Goehring, Peever; Dwight Hemminger, Wilmot; Larin S. Metcalf, Wilmot; Ole M. Stai, Peever; E. H. Niederbaumer, Wecota; Frank Apple, Martin; Peter Romillard, Martin; Donald G. Loobey, Hamill; Fred Schuelson, Bonesteel; Stanley E. Dotson, Sturgis; James Metal, Fairfax; Gideon Williams, Sisseton; Ernest E. Philips, Wilmot; James A. Chastain, Colome; Vern Shirp, Burke; Samuel Tahoroka, Sisseton; R. D. Linamon, Ipswich; and Edward A. Herman, Faulkton.

I would have made a protest on the food served the soldiers on board if there had been no soldiers from South Dakota, but these boys naturally protested to me. The fact that they were from my own State made me the more eager to see that they were given the treatment that every man on this floor would have demanded under similar circumstances.

I could not take the part of those boys without antagonizing those who were in charge of the vessel. I had no desire to antagonize the ship's officers, but I was willing to incur their enmity if it were necessary in order to see that the American soldiers on board were properly fed. [Applause.] That my efforts on behalf of these soldiers did earn the disapproval of the ship's officers is clearly indicated by these false and unwarranted stories that have been called to the attention of the House.

On Sunday, July 14, 1918, I sailed from New York for Liverpool on the the British steamer Adriatic. It has a capacity of 24,500 tons and carries a crew of 450 men. We landed in Liverpool on July 26.

During the voyage I spent a great part of my time visiting with the 3,000 American soldiers on board, quartered in the steerage and on portions of the decks. Most of these soldiers came from Camp Lewis, Wash., which is conceded to be one of the best-managed camps in the United States. About two days out from New York the soldiers commenced grumbling about the food given them. The complaint was practically unanimous that they were not getting sufficient food. I became interested in their appeals and visited freely among them.

I found one soldier who had been operated on at Camp Wadsworth, S. C., on June 4. He was given passage upon the boat, one of his companions carrying his kit. He was assigned to a bunk in the steerage, but was later allowed to lie on deck C. He told me that he was scarcely able to eat anything and had asked for toast, but had been unable to get any. I bought him some oranges and lemons and visited with him on numerous occasions. I was informed that inquiries had been made of him as to what I had said to him.

Many, many of the soldiers informed me that they were not given enough to eat and much of the food given them was not fit to eat. I was told they had been served rabbit in which dung was embedded, soup that contained pieces of bladder, liver that was stale, and bread that was musty. I talked to an American officer who corroborated these statements. Likewise the South Dakota boys confirmed them.

I was invited by one of the South Dakota boys to breakfast with him. I accepted the invitation, and on July 17, at 6.45, I accompanied him. The card inspector was informed that I was taking breakfast with the soldier and he passed me in. The breakfast consisted of a bun, oatmeal, coffee, and stewed liver. I had hardly commenced the breakfast when the ship's steward wanted "to know what I was doing there." I said that I was taking breakfast with one of my South Dakota boys. His reply was that I should get out; that it was against the rules. I replied that I would obey all orders and would retire in a few moments, which I did.

There was a canteen on the Adriatic selling chocolate, cake, and other articles. I counted as many as 60 soldiers standing in line waiting to make purchases. The canteen sold 18 cookies for 20 cents and 12 frosted cookies for 20 cents. They did a thriving business until they were entirely sold out. The soldiers told me they bought eatables because they were hungry.

The servants connected with the cooking department constantly sold roast duck and chicken, charging from $1.50 to $2.50 each. Small boys acting as helpers sometimes sold them as low as 60 cents each. Sandwiches, pie, cake, oranges, and tea were sold by the employees in the cooking department. I was told by a number of soldiers that they could not get an extra bun with their meals, but that they could be purchased from the steward for 10 cents each.

The complaints of the soldiers were brought to the attention of some of the American officers on the boat by me. It was stated that the Adriatic was a ship owned by a British corporation, and that the soldiers were being taken over on a contract basis, and that the American officers had no control over the food supplies.

However, they took the matter up with the ship's officers and better food was promised them. An American officer was appointed to inspect the food for each meal, and I was invited to go with him on an inspection tour. After this I heard less complaint about the food served. I am satisfied the American officers on board the vessel did everything in their power to obtain better conditions for the soldiers.

Here are some of the meals served to the soldiers on board:

JULY 16.

Breakfast: Mush, sausage, biscuit, coffee; no sugar, milk, or butter.
Supper: Apple sauce, cheese, biscuit, pickles, butter, coffee.

JULY 18.

Dinner: Cold corn beef and cabbage, potatoes, pudding, small portions; no coffee, tea, or bread.
Supper: Bread, jam, orange, apple, tea.

JULY 19.

Breakfast: Oatmeal, bun, fish, coffee.
Dinner: Soup, potatoes, beans, canned salmon; no coffee, bread, or butter.
Supper: Bun, jam, slice of headcheese, slice of pickle, tea, butter.

JULY 23.

Breakfast: Sausage, mush, bun, coffee.
Dinner: Soup, beans, rabbit, apple sauce, potatoes, bun.
Supper: Small box sardines, orange, marmalade, bun, coffee, butter.

I talked with the highest ranking American officer on board about these conditions and was informed that he would make a report to the War Department as to conditions on the boat. The inspector before mentioned and some officer of the boat invited me to go through the food department, which I did.

We went through the cold-storage and the supply department and found good wholesome food in large quantities. The officers and passengers on the boat were bountifully supplied with the very best food that could be found on the market.

When we landed at Liverpool I was notified to appear before some officer who had come on board. I presented my passport and letters from Secretaries Lansing, Baker, and Daniels. This officer then asked me, "Did you take notes while crossing?" I replied, "Yes." He then said, "May I see them?" I said, "Yes. The notebook is in my stateroom. I will go and get it." He said, "I will go with you." We went to the stateroom, and I then said, "I do not see why you should be interested in my personal notes." I further said that I might conclude to call the attention of the House of Representatives to his demand to read my private notes. I then offered him the notebook. He then replied that it was not necessary. I later met him on the stairway, and he said they were required to make strict rules, and that some information had been reported to him concerning my conduct on the boat, but he had ascertained that the information was unfounded and expressed the hope that I would have an interesting trip. [Applause.]

I did keep a notebook of the complaints that were made to me regarding the food and information with reference thereto that I had gained. This notebook contained the substance of a conversation had with an American officer on board who spoke of his personal knowledge regarding the unfitness of the food.

These notes were kept because I intended to call it to the attention of the War Department immediately upon my return, and because I did not care to trust it to my memory. I am satisfied in my own mind that the ship's officers knew what was in the notebook and knew my purpose in keeping it.

I am exceedingly reluctant to bring these facts to the attention of the Nation. I had intended to lay them quietly before the Secretary of War. The attack, however, made upon me and my loyalty makes it impossible for me to be obedient to my original intention. In view of these unwarranted attacks I would stultify myself if I remained silent. [Applause.]

Since the declaration of war with Germany I have supported every war measure. There is not a drop of German blood in my veins. My ancestors fought in the Revolutionary War, and I am deeply sensitive of these attacks impugning my loyalty to my country.

The applications for visits to the battle fronts were made to the intelligence department of the American headquarters in Paris. I was treated with the utmost courtesy, and arrangements were made for my visit to the battle fronts. I can not speak too highly of the courtesies shown me by Gen. Pershing and the American, French, and Italian officers.

I visited the intelligence office on numerous occasions, but not one word of doubt of being admitted to the British front was ever expressed. On one occasion it was stated that a drive was on and that the highways were congested. I called at the intelligence office on August 16, just before leaving for Italy, and was informed that I probably could get on the British front on my return from Italy.

When I returned from Italy on August 31 I called at the intelligence office again, and was then informed that probably not until after September 17 would anyone be permitted to visit the British front. I then visited at St. Nazain, Nantes, Tours, Dejon, Is Sur Telle, and other places, and returned to Paris and called again at the intelligence office on September 10 and was informed that conditions had not changed since my return from Italy. At no time did anyone disclose to me that I could not visit the British front. I could not wait until September 17 and sailed from Brest on Thursday, September 12, for New York.

Mr. Speaker, I have given this detailed statement in order to show the motive which inspired this scurrilous attack upon me. No one has made a single statement of words coming from my lips affecting my loyalty to my country or our allies in this great war. I resent upon this floor this beastly and baseless attack and court the fullest investigation of my acts and words.

I made no statements abusing or condemning the war aims of the United States or any of the allies. I could not make such statements, because I never entertained such sentiments. I did protest against the treatment of our boys on this boat, and I protest now in the name of our country that we must not send our soldiers across the sea to fight our battles without providing good and wholesome food for them. [Applause.]

The first intimation that I had that I was denied the privilege of visiting the English front was upon my return home on September 19, when these stories were brought to my attention. There was not the slightest indication in the treatment I received from any source while abroad that any of the allied countries objected to my visiting any of the fronts. The courtesies I received from all of these countries were unusual and left with me a sense of deep obligation for their considerate treatment.

Everywhere I went I encouraged the American soldiers and told them of our war aims. I never saw a finer body of men, fully equipped, with one thought and one idea, that they were crossing the sea to win the war. Their spirit has brought to the French, Italian, and English soldiers a morale that is unequaled in the world. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 10 minutes.

WAR PROHIBITION.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, the other day, on September 23, when we had discussion on the war prohibition measure, I made some remarks here in regard to an organization that is known as the Anti-Saloon League, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER], who a number of times has taken it upon himself when I have made no personal reference to him at all, to get up here, flap his wings and take a little time on me personally. I have sent for such letters and they are here. Two years ago I staid out of the gentleman's district during the campaign at the request of a very wet Democrat who is a very close friend of Mr. DECKER, and I tried in every way I could to refrain from taking up these personal matters that the gentleman seems to delight in discussing. I shall first ask this morning that these letters, which I send to the Clerk's desk, shall be read. Somebody is mistaken; I will not say further than that, but we have the anti-saloon saints on one side and the gentleman from Missouri on the other. I ask that the letters be read first.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Clerk will read the letters.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISSOURI ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE,
St. Louis, Mo., July 13, 1914.

Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER,
1397 South Compton Avenue, City.

MY DEAR SIR: In case you are nominated and elected to Congress would you vote for and support the Sheppard-Hobson national prohibition resolution? Our friends throughout the State are pressing us for information on this great issue and we will be especially pleased to have you frankly give us your position.

This information will not be used to embarrass you if your answer is in the affirmative, and will even be held confidential if you request it.

An early reply will be especially appreciated.

Yours truly,

W. C. SHUPP,
State Superintendent.

—

MISSOURI ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE,
St. Louis, Mo., June 25, 1918.

J. E. MEEKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As you know, we have pending in Congress the matter of the prohibition of the entire liquor traffic for the period of the war—the Jones amendment in the form of a rider to the Agricultural bill and the Barkley bill coming as a separate measure.

Many of your constituents are extremely anxious that the suicidal waste of food, fuel, man power, and financial resources of the Nation by the liquor traffic shall be brought to an immediate end, and they will be pleased to know the attitude of all the candidates for the United States House of Representatives on these questions.

We will be pleased to receive your direct reply to the following questions:

1. Will you give your unqualified support to either the Jones war-time prohibition amendment or the Barkley bill covering the same subject?

2. Will you support either of those measures in case the President does not make any recommendation bearing upon them?

These questions are being sent to each candidate for the United States House of Representatives on both the Democratic and Republican tickets.

Yours very truly,

MISSOURI ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE,
W. C. SHUPP, State Superintendent.
CHRISTIAN BERNET, President.
L. W. MCCREARY, Secretary.

—

JUNE 29, 1918.

Mr. W. C. SHUPP,
State Superintendent Missouri Anti-Saloon League, St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: In reply to yours of June 25, will say in direct reply to your two questions—positively no.

With such men as Messrs. Hurley and Colby, of the Emergency Fleet Corporation; Samuel Gompers, president American Federation of Labor; and others, giving their very lives to speed production and to keep labor satisfied that we might win this war, it seems to me but little short of treason for paid agitators to constantly stir up labor and keep an everlasting hubbub going on amongst these men upon whom we must depend.

I think the conduct of the representatives of the Anti-Saloon League is contemptible. Your paid representatives were before the Senate committee. At one end of the table stood Gompers, Hurley, and Colby pleading that this matter should not be pushed further. At the other end of the table, Dinwiddie and Wheeler, who draw their salaries for making trouble, nagged the committee and hypocritically declared that they, these agitators, these paid "reformers," represented the will of the American people. Shame on such conduct by such men.

Now, I will ask you some questions publicly, and I shall expect a public reply:

First. Congress voted last year to leave this matter in the hands of the President, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Are you willing to abide his judgment in this matter and will the Anti-Saloon League of the United States stand loyally behind him?

Second. Why has the Anti-Saloon League never yet sent a resolution of support to the President since war was declared?

Third. Is it your candid opinion that the people of the United States should follow the judgment of such men as Hoover, Stream, Hurley, Colby, Gompers, or should they be dictated to by paid lobbyists and agitators?

Trusting that I shall receive from you, through the public press, some sort of reply, indicating that in a small degree, at least, the Anti-Saloon League leaders of this country are willing to abide the wishes of the President, I remain, sir, Sincerely, ——— ———.

P. S.—I note in your program, printed in red ink at the bottom of your letter, that you have failed to suggest there any interest whatsoever in the winning of the war. Your whole concern is prohibition agitation—local, State, and National. You are using the war as an excuse for stirring up trouble now. I have never seen a "win-the-war" line from the Anti-Saloon League anywhere at any time. Your organization by such conduct has made itself unworthy the respect of loyal Americans.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, the letters there speak for themselves as to whether those letters were ever sent out. I have received a statement not only from Missouri Congressmen, but from men outside, that they have received them.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; if the gentleman will get me more time.

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman means he refuses to yield unless he can get more time?

Mr. MEEKER. If the gentleman will get me more time. I leave it as between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] and the Anti-Saloon League who is in error, as far as that is concerned. The gentleman talks about a road supervisor not being able to be elected in Kansas if he was not for prohibition. If the gentleman will walk right straight through and look on the right as he goes to the Senate he will see in the Hall of Fame a statue to the first Democrat ever elected in Kansas, who was elected on the antiprohibition platform.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. If the gentleman will get me more time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman stood there and pounded his breast, and said he was known as a leader down in his country on prohibition. I was in four campaigns in 1914—Carthage, Webb City, Carterville, and the county—and he was not there leading, and we carried every one of them and reversed it from prohibition back to regulation territory.

He was not present, and the understanding was that it was because some gentlemen down there who are opposed to prohibition are Democrats and it might be just as well to remain in Washington. The gentleman is in the habit of getting up and beating his breast about these things after it is over. He voted against war, but by the time he gets back to Missouri he will make the people think he is the original war lord.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. If you will get me more time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MEEKER. It was not all the time and during all of this work that has been going on when he bade welcome to the lobbyists who sat in the gallery here last year when protest was made. When a Federal judge was in the gallery sending messages to the floor of this House on a bill, and a protest was made, he once more feels called upon to take it upon himself to talk about lobbyists sitting in the galleries and managing matters on the floor and welcome publicly the gentleman who was there.

I simply put these letters in this RECORD this morning, and I have given you two or three simple statements as to what are facts.

Mr. Bryan is the same kind of a leader as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER]. Mr. Bryan had as his first man to carry the electoral vote from Nebraska to the Electoral College a brewer, of his own selection, and he protested against prohibition being an issue as long as he was a candidate. And everybody knows that to be true. Mr. Hobson demanded whisky for his men when leaving the boat after the sinking of the Merrimac.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. I will finish this in the district down in Joplin, and I do not want more time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules——

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I ask unanimous consent that I have 10 minutes in which to answer the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will announce that after the gentleman has 10 minutes I shall feel constrained to object if nobody else does. But I think the gentleman ought to have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I do not intend to waste my time in any personal controversy with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER]. I never have. I have never said anything unkind about him. I did attempt the other day to answer some of his arguments. He seems to be inclined to take it as a personal matter, for which I am sorry.

In the first place, he says I voted against the war. That is not a new fact, and it does not affect the question as to whether or not whisky is a good thing for the human race. He says I voted against conscription. That is an immaterial fact; but his statement is untrue, and I do not think he stated it so intentionally. I know he did not. He would not yield long enough for me to correct him. I not only voted for conscription, but I spoke in favor of it on the floor of this House. I have voted for every war measure proposed by the administration. I just state those facts for what they are worth.

The people of my district know my record as to Americanism, as to my vote on the war, and everything else that I have done since I have been here. I have held nothing secret. I resented what the gentleman said in his speech the other day. I know his views on this question and I have never quarreled with him because of his views, but the thing which I resented I resent now, and I resent it in behalf of the entire Missouri delegation, is that he was trying to give the Members of this House the impression that we were making secret pledges on prohibition.

I do not wish to be personal, but there sits the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. ALEXANDER, who before I was ever heard of in politics, I think 25 years ago, stood in the Legislature of the State of Missouri and fought for prohibition when it was unpopular and there were few in favor of it. Do you charge him with signing a secret pledge?

There sits Mr. RUCKER, another gentleman from Missouri who was fighting the battle for prohibition before you and I were ever engaged in public life. Do you mean by reading your letters and making your charges here to imply that he signed a secret pledge? There sits my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. HAMLIN, who is known throughout the length and breadth of his district as a man who stands four square to all the world in favor of driving out booze and whisky and beer. Do you mean to insinuate that he has been signing secret pledges on this question in order to get votes? I could go down the whole list. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. RUBEY's, district adjoins mine, and there is not a man, woman, or child in his district that does not know where Mr. RUBEY stands on this great question. Those are the things I resented in the gentleman's speech. He says that last year I defended a lobbyist in the gallery. That so-called "lobbyist" was a Federal judge who, at the request of President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo, helped to write the bill giving insurance and compensation to soldiers and sailors.

I have no brief for the Anti-Saloon League. They need no defense from me. They never paid me a cent to make a speech. It is true that while I was serving my constituents up here in Congress you went down into my district—from patriotic motives, no doubt—with a desire to uplift mankind——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend a moment? There are two evils growing in this House, and they ought to stop. One of them is that the Members have fallen in the habit of saying "you" and "your." It is, besides against the rules. The gentleman who is making this speech is no worse a sinner than a good many others—not half as bad about that. You have got to describe a Member by designating his State. The proper form in this case would be, "the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. MEEKER." Another one is the calling of Members by their names, Tom, Dick, and Harry, Billy, and John, and Joe, Smith, and Jones, and so forth. It all contributes to bad order. I hope the gentleman will quit talking about "you" in making his speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. DECKER. How much more time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. I will not take it out of your time. [Laughter.] You have five minutes remaining.

Mr. DECKER. I meant in my remarks the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. MEEKER. [Laughter.] He is the gentleman to whom I referred as going down into my district. They do say that he makes a very good speech in behalf of the brewers and in behalf of the distillers of this country, and I think in some campaigns he was successful, and the people, I am informed, appreciate his services—I mean the people he represented.

But be that as it may, I have no brief for him. My desire to keep him out of my district is not so great as you might imagine. He is an able gentleman, and I know that his appearance in my district would go far toward contributing to my defeat. Yet at the same time, in the face of the danger of having him come down there and tell the people about my stand on prohibition and other things, which they all know, at the risk of having the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] throwing the great weight of his powerful influence against me in the coming campaign, I did feel called upon the other day to rise here in behalf of my colleagues—not in behalf of the Anti-Saloon League, because I do not represent them—and deny the insinuation that any man among my colleagues signed any secret pledge.

The letter you received in 1914—the letter you received—no; the letter which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] received [laughter] in 1914—said, at the bottom of it, "If you request it, this will not be published." Well, have you [laughter] ever told the people of Webb City—I mean has the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] ever told the people of Webb City, whom he represented? Has he ever told the people of Carthage how much he was paid in that campaign which he waged in my district?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. Has he ever told the people of the country just whom he counted upon to vote with him when they came to Congress or to the State legislature?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman from Missouri [laughter]——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend a moment. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is violating another rule of the House right now by sitting in his seat and interjecting remarks in the remarks of the other gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] may rail against the Anti-Saloon League and he may wrap the mantle of patriotism around himself in behalf of the brewers and distillers; but I have this to say to the gentleman, and this only, that he is out of harmony not only with the people of Missouri, not only with the people of this country, but the gentleman is out of harmony with the great majority of the Members of the House of Representatives, and if he by his speeches means to cast insinuations upon the patriotism of this House and if he means to insinuate that the action which we took on national prohibition, upon war-time prohibition, upon putting prohibition in the District of Columbia, upon putting prohibition around the camps to protect the soldier boys of this country—if he means to have it inferred that that is due to the Anti-Saloon League and to unpatriotic and unworthy efforts on the part of the Anti-Saloon League, then let him make the best of it.

Every man within the hearing of my voice knows that it is a foul slander upon the patriotism of the people of this country and upon the patriotism of the membership of this House. [Applause.] I do not mean to charge as to the men opposed to prohibition that they are unpatriotic and un-American. Men in this House who have voted against prohibition are just as good patriots as I am, or any other Member of this House, including the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER]. But in behalf of my country, in behalf of the voters of my district and of Missouri, in behalf of the Anti-Saloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and other organizations, which for many long years have worked for prohibition, I simply say that now, at this good hour when prohibition is in sight, if the distinguished gentleman from Missouri wishes to come upon the floor of this great legislative body and try to cast insinuations upon their patriotism and upon their Americanism and considers that worthy of his training, worthy of his traditions, and worthy of Missouri, then let him make the best of it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I offer a privileged report.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GARD, indefinitely, on account of death in his family;

To Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma, indefinitely, on account of important business and to assist in liberty-loan drive; and

To Mr. CRISP, for two weeks, on account of important business.

UTILIZATION OF ELECTRICAL POWER (H. REPT. NO. 814).

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution presented by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 433.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12776, entitled "A bill to provide further for the national security and defense and for the more effective prosecution of the war by furnishing means for the better utilization of the existing sources of electrical and mechanical power and for the development of new sources of such power, and for other purposes"; that there shall be not to exceed four hours of general debate. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be 40 minutes of debate—20 minutes to be controlled by myself and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on the rule be limited to 40 minutes; that one half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the other half by himself, and at the end of the 40 minutes the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to use the 20 minutes that I have allotted to me. The resolution provides for the consideration of the bill which has been reported to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, known as the electric supplement emergency power bill, as I understand it.

I have availed myself of this opportunity to say this: That there are several important measures which ought to be considered by the House before there is any gentleman's agreement entered into as to three-day recesses. These measures are emergency measures, rendered necessary by the stupendous preparations that are being made for the final drive to Berlin. For instance, there is urgent necessity for an additional laboratory for the manufacture and testing of pure serum, to be used in treating the boys who are unfortunately wounded.

There are at this time 14,000 tubercular patients, most of them in the incipient stage, for whom adequate preparations have not been made. It is estimated by the Surgeon General of the Army that by the time the American Army is completed, by the time it reaches its maximum, there will be approximately 30,000 of these tubercular patients. Mose of these boys can be cured if they have proper treatment. The Committee on Rules has a resolution which will be presented to the House in the next day or so providing for the erection of the first of these great hospitals, which are to be built in various sections of the country, having regard to the convenience of the population. I mention these two measures, but there may be others.

One thing is certain, the best service we can render the country is to stay on the job and pass all measures that are necessary. [Applause.]

So far as this measure is concerned, it has the approval of the President of the United States, and it has the approval of the Secretary of War. There is a shortage in this electric power which can be partially remedied by the passage of this bill. I do not undertake to say that I am acquainted with all the provisions of the bill, but I do know that those who are charged with the administration of this great question say that the bill is needed and needed now.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. To whom did the President say that he was in favor of this measure? Has the President sent any message to the House?

Mr. POU. I think, I am indeed, sure, that the President has written to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce saying that this measure is one of capital importance.

Mr. SLOAN. Has he sent a message to the House? A letter to a Member is not regarded of the importance as a message to the House.

Mr. POU. Somebody said on one occasion that there was no discussing a matter of taste. It does not seem to me at all necessary that the President should send a message every time there is a measure which has his approval. I am willing to act upon the letter which the gentleman from Tennessee has. Those who ought to know consider the bill necessary to speed up the great program of winning the war. So far as I am concerned that is sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to concur in what the chairman of the Committee on Rules has stated about the importance of certain legislation that has been called to the attention of that committee. While it may be important to many that they should be in their district to look after their campaigns, it is of more importance to the country that all should remain here and pass this important legislation. It is especially important to provide for the production of pure serum, and for hospitals and sanitary facilities for those of our soldiers who are in the incipient stage of tuberculosis. Many soldiers, probably 20,000, at an early day will require treatment for this particular disease. We must make provision for their treatment and cure.

Now, as to the bill provided for by this rule. I have assented to this bill, as has every member of the Committee on Rules. We have done so because the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy has said that it is necessary for the proper conduct of the war.

While I yield to the President I do not concur entirely in his judgment as to the necessity of this measure. For 50 years Germany has commandeered her industries. The Kaiser has used every resource in the Empire. The schools, the churches, the philosophy, the science, the agriculture, the mining, the manufactures, every resource of the Empire has been under the command of the greatest outlaw that the world has ever known, with a view of enabling him to become the conquerer of the world.

He undertook after thorough preparation, after commandeering every resource of his Empire, to conquer the world. The rest of the world permitted initiative on the part of individuals. This initiative developed manhood and womanhood in France, in England, in Belgium, in Italy, and in the United States. The man power developed by individual effort, individual initiative, and the property and accumulated wealth acquired by these countries are used to-day to thwart the purposes of the man who has commandeered all the resources of his Empire. To-day we are driving the Kaiser's armies back to the Rhine, and in a few months the soldiers developed by individual enterprise will accomplish a great work for civilization by defeating the purposes of the man who scrambled Germany for the purpose of conquering the world. [Applause.]

The President, I am sure, has the best intentions; but I fear that in commandeering so many of the enterprises of this country he is leading us into a dense forest out of which we shall have difficulty in finding the way. The manhood and womanhood we have developed by individual effort, the property we have accumulated by individual industry and economy, are terminating the war—are driving the Germans back to Berlin, and will fly the flags of the allies over the Kaiser's capitol. [Applause.]

It is not necessary to scramble all industries and enterprises of the country in order to accomplish the purpose of the allies to save civilization from the autocratic Germans. Agencies of Garfield scrambled the coal interests of the country, and the people for the first time suffered as few people have suffered for the want of fuel last winter. It is now proposed to scramble the power plants of the United States by taking their control from individuals and putting them in charge of men appointed by the President. I do not believe that the agents to be appointed by the President will be more able, more economical, or more patriotic than the individuals who have organized and established these enterprises and are to-day conducting them, and yet in order that we may have no discord I assent to the President's demands and shall support that bill, still reserving the judgment I have here expressed as to the wisdom of doing this thing, and I say this with the utmost respect for gentlemen here or elsewhere who may disagree with the opinion that I have expressed.

I entertain this opinion because of my high esteem of the men and women of the United States who have developed the great manhood and the great womanhood and the enormous properties that are to-day rendering such signal service to civilization and mankind. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time. [Applause.] If the gentleman from North Carolina does not intend to use any more time, I desire to yield time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. POU. I do not think there will be any more time consumed on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 11 minutes left.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am one of the great majority of men in this House who do not need to apologize for the support that he has given the President in all his war-emergency legislation and in providing men, money, and material to successfully carry on this war. I do not intend to be less loyal in the future than I have been in the past, but I believe I have the right to think for myself in regard to the subject matter that comes in here under the much overworked caption of war-emergency legislation. I think that is about the situation in regard to the present bill. We have an order from the Commander in Chief that it must go through; skids are put under it and it will go through and I will vote for it the same as the rest of you do; but in my personal opinion the bill as it is presented to the House at the present time goes much further than there is any necessity for in order to meet or accomplish the desired results. I believe this bill goes further toward committing the policy of this Government to a Federal ownership of all utilities than any other bill that we have passed during the present session of the Congress, and I am not in favor of adopting that policy at the present time. The proponents of the bill say this bill is for the purpose of furnishing power in congested districts of the country where they are short of power for the manufacture of war materials; that is what they maintain is the actual object of the bill.

If that was the only object of the bill and that was all that is contained in the bill, I do not believe there is a Member of this House who would oppose it in any way for a single moment. Certainly a membership voting $8,000,000,000 to raise and equip an army would never stop to consider one or two hundred million dollars for power to furnish materials to supply that army. According to the hearings, it has been shown that the Government engineers have known that this shortage existed from 6 to 10 months. If that is so and this emergency has existed for all of that time, why has it not been presented to the House before this, just at a time when people are thinking of going away; and if it is considered, every man knows it will be considered hastily and not given the consideration and attention that a measure of this kind is entitled to? The Government engineers have made this survey; they know where this shortage exists, and we all admit it does exist. This shortage exists in the Pittsburgh district, the Philadelphia district, the Norfolk district, the New Jersey district, the Charleston district, and some others.

I would like to have some one tell me why they could not prepare a bill and bring it in here and specifically state we need so many millions for this and this and that, and in addition we want $50,000,000 for emergency power purposes which the President can use at his own will as he sees the emergency exists. A bill of that kind, it seems to me, would carry the entire proposition and not be so wide in its scope as the present bill that is presented to us. I can not understand why that can not be done. Heretofore we have clothed the President with most unusual powers—more power than has ever been given to any one man in any civilized country—but this bill goes even further than anything we have passed before. And as proof of that I want to call attention of the Members of the House to some of the provisions of this bill, and then you gentlemen can decide for yourselves. This bill provides for the commandeering of all the hydroelectric and steam power plants in every part of the country, and in the definition of power plants it says that it includes all machinery and appliances therein contained, together with all lines transmitting or distributing power in connection therewith, and all other property the ownership, use, or occupancy of which shall be appropriate to or useful in connection with the maintenance and operation thereof.

This bill gives power to the President to commandeer every public utility within the boundaries of the United States. It does not limit him. It does not specify that those utilities must be in connection or even near the places that have need of power for additional manufacture of war materials, and it gives carte blanche the power to commandeer them all in every part of the United States. Now, they do not want anything more in this bill that what the proponents state; it does not seem to me that it is necessary to confer such broad powers on the President of the United States at this time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Has not the President that power already under section 12 of the food act?

Mr. SNELL. I was coming to that later; but I should say I think the President has the power to commandeer any plant at any time for war purposes, and I understand that he has already taken over some plants under the authority granted under that act.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. They are not big enough; that is the trouble.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me to be going entirely too far as the bill now stands. The bill also carries a provision, or it is intended by the bill, to construct hydroelectric plants. The hearings say that they do not intend to construct any such plants, because the probabilities are that they could not get them done in time for use during the period of the war. If they do not intend to do that, what is the use of conferring authority on them to do such things? Paragraph 4, section 2, grants power to acquire private power plants anywhere within the boundaries of the United States. I see no limitation there.

In paragraph 11 of section 2, I believe it is, it gives the President power to establish corporations to take over plants, build new ones and merge small ones, and many other things that will make it difficult to ever return these plants to the individual owners. All this does not seem to me to be necessary, if we are simply going to increase power for manufacture of war munitions. In paragraph 13 it provides for the making of and fixing compensation for engineers, draftsmen, clerks, and other employees as he may deem necessary. No limit whatever. It provides for the establishment of another board in Washington, which means additional buildings, office space, and housing facilities, and I believe the majority of the Members will agree we have enough of them here at present.

Section 8 of the bill provides that the President may retain any of this property and operate these plants or transmission lines, structures, and so forth, for as long a time as he may deem necessary. I see no limitation here. To me that is directly opposed to the other provision of the bill which says it must be terminated in five years, and should be stricken out of the bill and the other time even shortened. My only contention is that the bill goes much further and does much more than the proponents of the bill would have you understand it does or claim is necessary at this time to do in order to furnish power to manufacture war materials. And I hope in the consideration of the bill that it may be limited in some of these respects, and that we will not go too far toward committing this Government to the policy of Federal ownership of all the public utilities of the country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12776, with Mr. HOUSTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12776) to provide further for the national security and defense and for the more effective prosecution of the war by furnishing means for the better utilization of the existing sources of electrical and mechanical power and for the development of new sources of such power, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to use as little time as I can, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing matters that I otherwise would have to read, but all of it applicable solely to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the matter he has indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I understand you are going to explain the provisions of the bill, however?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly. But there are some authorities I want to quote from that I do not want to stop to read.

Mr. Chairman, the object and purpose of this bill is to provide for an existing power shortage, electric power shortage, and to provide as far as possible against an increasing electric power shortage which will be much larger in 8, 10, or 12 months from now than it will be between now and that time.

Do not get confused about this being a water-power bill. I know the newspapers have referred to it continuously as a water-power bill, and because we have talked water-power matters on the floor of the House so long, many Members who know what the bill means, its object and purpose, have inadvertently called it a water-power bill. But it is not confined to any particular source of electric power. If there is an existing water-power plant, so situated that it can be used for the purpose of manufacturing war material, or other material not directly war material, but necessary and incident to it, which may add to or increase its output to meet these demands, and it can be done within reasonable time—that is, within time that it will appear reasonable that we may need it, why then, under this bill it may be done.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am interested in Pennsylvania. I understand there is a great deficiency of power in certain districts in that State. I notice that at Milton the other day a power plant was authorized by the Government, to cost $375,000, and the Government enters into a contract with the industries there to take these plants off their hands after the emergency has passed. Can the gentleman explain how that is done, and also how the Government is to aid, for instance, in Pittsburgh and Philadelphia and in the other sections of the State, through this bill? Can he specifically state the aid that is to be rendered to the industries in my State?

Mr. SIMS. That will be a part of my attempt in explaining the bill, but I wanted to clear up the water power part of it first.

If an existing plant, as I have just stated, may be aided by the Government under the provisions of this bill in increasing its output, which output can be utilized for war purposes, there is nothing in the bill to prevent it being aided, but, on the other hand, it authorizes it.

But on account of the practicable impossibility of building large water-power dams and manufacturing the machinery and other things necessary, especially dams on navigable rivers, within time to be used, as far as it can be seen now, for the manufacture of necessary war materials, aid to such projects will not be extended, because it would be impracticable to do so. In other words, it would do no good if it took two or three years to build a war power plant, beginning with the construction of the hydraulic part of it; and if it could not be furnished before that time, of course, it would not be undertaken under this bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. If they do not intend to build any hydraulic plants, why is it necessary to give them the power to do so?

Mr. SIMS. I say, in that character of cases it would not be done. But if there is, as I said, a hydraulic plant, where it could be built from the ground up, dam and all, and be done within such time as to make it reasonably certain that it could be utilized for the manufacture of war material, then it can be aided or constructed under this bill, first, by assisting the existing company, if there is one, and second, by the Government itself constructing the plant.

The hearings developed the fact that the Government has had a preliminary survey made of those sections of the country where there is sufficient or insufficient power at the present time—and that survey covers all sections of the country—and a report has been made to the War Department showing where there is a normal supply of power and where there is an excess supply of power and where there is a shortage of power.

Now, it is where a shortage exists that there will be authority under this bill for the Government to do what is provided for in this bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] in his remarks a moment ago on the rule, as I understood him, said that there would be power under this bill to commandeer every power plant in the United States, wherever situated, and further, to build and construct power plants in the United States wherever situated.

Mr. SNELL. That is as I understand the bill. I would like to have the gentleman explain it to me and show the restriction. In the gentleman's bill it is provided "within the boundaries of the United States."

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. That, as defined here, means all lands and waters subject to any purposes subject to the jurisdiction of the United States of America.

Mr. SIMS. When I come to the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule on those points I will be glad to give explanations as contained in the hearings.

The reason I say it will be confined to the sections where there is a shortage of power is that there is no other reason for the proposed legislation. If there was no shortage of power anywhere in the United States, then this bill would not be before the House. Therefore the only purpose of the bill is to decrease shortage or to prevent shortage in sections of the United States where additional power is or may be needed for war purposes.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. I agree with the gentleman that there is a great shortage of electrical power in various sections of the country. However, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has just informed us that the Government is spending between three and four hundred thousand dollars in his State to finance a power company. The Government is doing practically the same thing at Niagara Falls. Now, then, if they have the power to do those things as a war emergency, what is the necessity of passing a bill of this kind?

Mr. SIMS. There is a War Finance Corporation, as the gentleman knows, and it is possible that some plants may be financed by that corporation, as, for instance, a municipal plant in Oregon. But it can not be made practicable in many cases because they can not comply with the provisions of the war finance law.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. My colleague will remember the testimony of Secretary of War Baker, found on page 4 of the hearings, where he went into the question of our advancing money on these plants, especially the plants in the Pittsburgh district, in which he says that is the reason which led to the framing of this bill, because they did not have the power to continue this work or advance the money.

Mr. SIMS. Yes. The gentleman asked about certain places where they were already doing it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I want to make a general statement first. I do not refuse to answer questions where I can. I will try to answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WALDOW. This is considered an emergency power act?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. I fail to find any provision here except that it is permanent law.

Mr. SIMS. It is like every other law—permanent until by the limitation in the law it expires or until it is repealed. It can not last more than five years, even as applying to the sale and disposition of the property in which the United States has an interest.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman state in regard to his views as to the number of projects that are to be developed, as based upon the evidence of the Secretaries who appeared before the committee? And are we to have an assurance that there will be no abuses?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and there is a detailed statement of Lieut. Stanley, who made the surveys. That is in the hearings.

Mr. HAUGEN. And it will not be done unless it is necessary?

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely not.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I appreciate the fact that everyone here acknowledges the necessity of such legislation as this; but to my mind this question has arisen, and I would like to have the gentleman discuss it in his remarks: I notice the bill provides that the Government shall furnish the money and step in and enlarge existing plants.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the gentleman think that he has sufficiently safeguarded the interests of the Government so that the private plants can not force the Government to come in and put in additional machinery at large expense, and then after this law shall cease to be enforced and after the war is over they will be the beneficiaries and keep this additional machinery and equipment and the Government get nothing out of it?

Mr. SIMS. No. We think we have the Government safeguarded and protected in the bill as reported. I am afraid some of our other friends here feel that perhaps we may have overdone it, because one gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], in addressing the House on the rule, said this was the most drastic piece of legislation in the direction of Government ownership that had ever come before the House.

Mr. SNELL. I said it reached that far.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I would like to give an explanation of the purposes of the bill. Let me read to the House and to the Members of the committee who hear me a list of the places where the survey made by the War Department shows that there is an existing power shortage and where it will become greater as time goes on:

DISTRICTS WHERE PRELIMINARY SURVEYS SHOW A POWER SHORTAGE.

Alexandria, Va.; Altoona, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; Bucyrus, Ohio; Charleston, S. C.; Cleveland, Ohio; Columbus, Ohio; Erie, Pa.; Easton, Pa.; Erie County, Pa.; Hammond, Ind.; Harrisburg, Pa.; Huntington, W. Va.; Johnstown, Pa.; Kansas City, Mo.

Lehigh district (Pennsylvania): Allentown, Bethlehem, Hazelton, Milton, Sunbury.

Lima, Ohio; Little Rock, Ark.; Lorain, Ohio.

Lowell, Mass.; Michigan City, Ind.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Minneapolis and St. Paul, Minn.; Newport News, Va.

New Jersey: Bayonne, Bound Brook, Camden, Elizabeth, Hoboken, Jersey City, Montclair, Newark, New Brunswick, Orange, Passaic, Paterson, Perth Amboy, Rahway, Somerville, Trenton.

Niles, Mich.; Philadelphia, Pa.

Pittsburgh district (Pennsylvania): Akron, Alliance, Canton, Massillon, Warren, and Youngstown, Ohio; West Penn system; Wheeling, W. Va.

Portland, Oreg.; Reading, Pa.; Richmond, Ind.; Richmond and Norfolk, Va.

Scranton, Pa.; South Bend, Ind.; Trenton, Mass.; Terre Haute, Ind.

Texas (northeastern): Denison, Fort Worth, Gainesville, Paris, Taylor, Waco.

Three Rivers, Mich.; Watertown, N. Y.; Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Wilmington, Del.; York, Pa.; York Haven, Pa.

Now, while the bill in general terms covers the whole United States, the power conferred under the bill can not be used by the Government in the development of electric power anywhere except where there is a power shortage and where it is shown by the engineers of the War Department that a power shortage exists or where it will soon exist; where it is necessary to have more power for war purposes, if not for ordinary civic utilities.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is there a well-defined policy for relief in each one of these places mapped out by the War Department?

Mr. SIMS. The survey shows in detail in every case just how much it will be necessary to increase the power in these places. The well-defined policy is that the Government will assist in increasing the power up to the point it is necessary, as shown in the survey.

Mr. McFADDEN. Has the War Department made any contract for that purpose?

Mr. SIMS. No; only one contract that I know of, and that is at Pittsburgh, and I am not well acquainted enough with its provisions to explain it.

Now, I want to refer to a proposition for development of a project in Pennsylvania where the company is ready to go ahead and build a water-power plant. It is not on a navigable river and not upon public lands, and therefore the law of the State of Pennsylvania only applies, and the only way the War Department would have anything to do with it would be to minimize the amount of flow into the Allegheny and Ohio, which has been done.

Referring to the map I have before you, here is the Clarion River; one dam can be built at the lower end of project 250 feet high, and another one can be built about 50 miles above at another place 250 feet high. Each one will develop 150,000 horsepower, making a total of 300,000 horsepower. The upper dam will create an immense storage basin, storing a vast amount of water which can be kept and used during the low-water period.

Not only can it be used for power purposes in these places, but it will go into the Ohio River through the Allegheny at such times as to materially aid navigation in both streams, although that is not the immediate purpose of its construction.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman state what is the shortage of horsepower in Pittsburgh?

Mr. SIMS. Over 400,000 horsepower. Now, I am doing this to show you why it might be a sensible thing and a wise thing to develop a water power. The Clarion River in Pennsylvania, 50 miles north of Pittsburgh, has a total development of 300,000 horsepower. At the lower plant 60,000 horsepower can be developed, as I am informed, in 16 months, and with Government assistance the time can be shortened 2 or 3 months. The second plant would develop 150,000 horsepower. The time of construction would be 20 to 24 months, which could also be shortened by Government assistance. A tremendous water power would result from it, and it would be less expensive to complete it than a great dam crossing a wide spread of river and covering much area. This is in a gulch, with mountains on each side. The company is ready and wants it done. By increasing the height of the dam in the first plant at a later date the remaining 90,000 horsepower can be obtained. The total development would save 2,000,000 tons of coal per annum and the labor of 4,000 to 5,000 men producing and handling the same. Also it would free for other uses thousands of railroad cars and hundreds of locomotives.

It also would be of vast assistance to the navigation stage of the Allegheny and Ohio Rivers, and would create a water highway of nearly a hundred miles. It would also be of vast assistance to the flood stage of the Allegheny and Ohio Rivers.

All dam-construction material except cement is available at construction sites; cement plants are located within 25 miles.

There are three great railroads within 1 mile from the dams—Pennsylvania Railroad, New York Central, and Baltimore & Ohio—that serve this district.

There is not a hydraulic-electric plant anywhere in reach of Pittsburgh.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Now, right there, what would be the policy of the gentleman in relation to that?

Mr. SIMS. The practical policy is to enlarge steam powers, but I want to show why the law ought to be broad enough in its provisions to cover a case like the one I have referred to, because it comes within the object and purpose of the law, increasing power, and increasing it quickly where it is needed most. That is why I refer to it. It does look strange for neither Pennsylvania nor the Government to aid in the construction of a plant I have referred to so near Pittsburgh, the greatest manufacturing city in the world.

Mr. BESHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BESHLIN. Was there any testimony before the committee as to the opposition to that project on the Clarion River?

Mr. SIMS. No; no testimony before the committee of any kind as to that particular project.

Mr. BESHLIN. The question of constructing dams on the Clarion River has been before the Water-Supply Commission of Pennsylvania for years and seriously resisted. I wondered if it had been developed before the committee that any of that opposition had been withdrawn or what there would be in the way of condemnation proceedings.

Mr. SIMS. The present company, as I understand, has all they need in the way of flowage rights and everything of that sort. I never heard of the project until this bill was reported.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. I want to say that for two or three years I was a member of the water-supply commission of Pennsylvania, consisting of three members. That whole matter was brought before us and gone over thoroughly by the engineers and some financiers who proposed to finance the proposition. That is to say, if it is the same proposition, the Clarion River of Pennsylvania, three dams, 300 feet high.

Mr. SIMS. No; two dams each to be 250 feet high.

Mr. FOCHT. We favored that proposition but we waited for the sanction of the United States Government, the War Department, and also the assurance of a guaranty that these gentlemen would be able to finance it. There was no objection whatever in my recollection to the construction of the dams, but it was merely a question of the guarantee that it would be completed and not spoil the situation and interfere with the possible development by some one else.

Mr. SIMS. I can not take in all these because——

Mr. BESHLIN. If the gentleman will permit me, does the gentleman recall whether or not some parties from Forest County did not object to the construction of the dam because it would throw the water back on them?

Mr. FOCHT. One place there was to be a bridge and they had a plan by which that could be overcome and full recompense allowed for flooded land. All of that was to be taken into consideration. That was one objection that was made.

Mr. SIMS. Of course, I am glad to hear the facts. I trust that I am not to be considered as promoting the project or boosting it, as I do not know anything about it except from what others have told me.

Mr. FOCHT. It is entirely feasible according to the engineers.

Mr. SIMS. I suggested it as a possible water-power development from the beginning that might be aided under the provisions of the bill. That is the only one I know of in the United States. There are several navigation dams on several of the rivers built at Government expense; several on the Ohio and elsewhere; and these dams were built but no generating machinery has ever been installed. Development at these Government dams in all probability can be made as quickly and as rapidly as a coal or steam plant can be installed at other places. It all depends upon what the facts may be as to each place. This bill will authorize such developments. The great or chief practicable effect of this bill will be the increase of carboelectric power, electric power created through the use of coal, because in the great majority of the power plants that are located in these shortage districts power is produced by the consumption of coal. Therefore it may be said that in its application it is a bill to assist in the increasing of steam-produced electric power. It is electric power, not hydraulic power, because electric power is frequently absolutely essential to the manufacturing of much of the war munitions, as the gentleman knows, and in shipbuilding, in the great gun factories, and in almost every character of manufacture electric power has become essential and absolutely necessary. It is absolutely necessary in the mining of coal.

I introduce the Pittsburgh project simply as an illustration of where a water-power plant might be wholly constructed from the foundation in time to meet the necessities of the situation, but I do not know whether it can be done or not. No member of the Government has ever said a word to me about it.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. McFADDEN. The point that looks important to me is in the Pittsburgh district there is a shortage of 400,000 tons at the present time of coal, and I am afraid to-day throughout the whole country this winter there might be some shortage of coal. Does not a proposition like this tend to remedy that?

Mr. SIMS. I think it will be a great aid. I do not believe a 300,000 horsepower project can be developed within time to help win this war. I hope not, because it would take 24 months to develop the power; but when done it would be of the greatest aid in reducing the demand upon the coal supply of that region, and in order to have available the required coal supply it is necessary to pass this bill. Why? Because coal is mined by electric power.

Here is a chart which shows it, which Dr. Garfield presented as a part of his hearing but on account of having to be printed immediately I could not have it printed, but it is illustrative of the coal-saving proposition of having a central electric-power plant to serve a number of mines instead of having scattered mines each having a plant of its own. Here is the chart [illustrating].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Inasmuch as this is an emergency bill it would not be possible to attempt the construction of dams to generate and develop by water power, would it?

Mr. SIMS. Not unless the dam can be constructed as quickly as a steam-power plant at the same place. I only referred to this project to show at least one place in the United States where it can be done, and if it can be done it is where it is needed and needed badly. This is a chart showing the per annum use of coal in scattered plants and the great saving of coal by having one power plant serve all the mines instead of having scattered power plants serve each mine.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In line with the question the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked, that was exactly the situation, it seems to me, that confronted the Government with regard to the dam at Muscle Shoals, which was to develop hydroelectric energy.

Mr. SIMS. That they could not possibly obtain the power within a reasonable time?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The Government, I think, caused it to be discontinued on the ground it was nonessential, because it would not be finished within a reasonable time.

Mr. SIMS. That is as I understand it, but Mr. Baruch explains the matter in the hearings.

Mr. McFADDEN. On the general proposition I know nothing except that the Pennsylvania proposition of 60,000 horsepower can be developed within a reasonable time.

Mr. SIMS. As soon as the same amount of power can be developed by steam power, that is, power developed by the use of steam?

Mr. BANKHEAD. With reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], which was frequently reiterated by him on the floor with reference to the construction of the dam at Muscle Shoals, the power proposition was not conceived and not encouraged since the declaration of war. It was a permanent policy, adopted prior to the declaration of war, for the development of nitrates especially for fertilizer purposes. I think the gentleman from Ohio is familiar with those facts.

Mr. SIMS. They cease to develop, because they could not have it finished for war purposes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say that $20,000,000 was diverted from the nitrate fund of $40,000,000, and it was done with the object, and it was so stated, of developing the water power for war purposes, and that it was a war measure.

Mr. SIMS. I want to refer to Mr. Baruch's testimony in the hearings. You can see what he says as to the stopping of the work on it.

I do not want to be led off into these collateral matters. But I do understand that we stopped developing the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals because the material and labor needed to carry it out were needed elsewhere for war purposes, and its development could not be finished in time to meet the war emergency.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not a fact that this $20,000,000 appropriation for a nitrate plant or fertilizer plant was made long before the declaration of war?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let us get down to facts. They are not as stated by the gentleman exactly. That plant was started for the purpose of developing nitrogen for war purposes and nothing else. It was not stated that it was for anything else.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will refer to the debates in the House and in the Senate, I think he will find differently.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am conversant with the debates on the subject.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman has a map here and has been saying a lot about this business. Will he state what relationship is contemplated with the Government under the provisions of his bill?

Mr. SIMS. Under the provisions of my bill power will be given to the President to assist in the development by making priority orders, and things of that sort, in order to provide material for the war.

Mr. SNELL. Could he not give priority orders now?

Mr. SIMS. He could do it.

Mr. SNELL. Then why do we need to give additional power?

Mr. SIMS. I have read here what was stated by the president of a company, that assistance from the Government was needed. It is where speedy development seemed to be reasonably possible and probable. In other cases water powers would have to be a going concern and would have to increase their capacity, which the Government could do by giving sufficient aid.

Mr. FOCHT. Would the Government meet that objection that we raised as to whether we could finance it or not? Would the Government meet that?

Mr. SIMS. This bill gives the power.

Mr. FOCHT. That is it exactly.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask the chairman to call me down after five minutes.

I will not undertake to go into this matter in detail, as I am allowed to extend my remarks. But the object and purpose of this bill, succinctly stated, is to get the earliest and greatest amount of increase in hydroelectric power, carboelectric power, or any other kind of electric power that can be produced and that is needed for war purposes, and only where it is needed for war purposes. And it is to terminate within six months after the end of the war, and the President is only allowed five years, if he needs that length of time, to dispose of the Government's interest in these power plants so aided. The bill is very plain.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield right there at that point?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. SNELL. If that is the situation, what does section 8 of the bill mean, if he is only allowed five years?

Mr. SIMS. He is only allowed five years to disposed of the property.

Mr. SNELL. What does this mean:

That the President may retain any property and operate any plants, transmission lines, structures, facilities, or appliances constructed or acquired under the provisions of this act for such time as he may deem necessary or advisable for the purpose of selling or otherwise disposing thereof.

Mr. SIMS. That explains it all. It does not need any further explanation. He is to keep it for such time as is necessary to enable him to dispose of it.

Mr. SNELL. You say he must do it in five years.

Mr. SIMS. The object of giving him that much time is to dispose of it. You would not want the Government to lose anything if it could not profitably dispose of it in 4 years 11 months and 29 days. The gentleman is making a mountain out of a mole hill. It ought to be in there. For our country's sake, give the people a little benefit of a doubt, instead of giving it all to those investing capital.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Does the gentleman mean by that word "disposing" the absolute disposal, or selling, or the leasing?

Mr. SIMS. Selling or otherwise disposing of.

Mr. SINNOTT. That would permit the Government to lease the property?

Mr. SIMS. If it seemed to be in the public interest at the time.

I would like to use more time, but other gentlemen, members of the committee and gentlemen who are not members of the committee, desire time, and I wish to yield the rest of my time to them.

Mr. SNELL. Would the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. SIMS. I can not. I will do it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. Chairman, before yielding the floor I wish to have read in my time an extract from a bulletin that has just been issued by the Smithsonian Institution, United States National Museum, entitled "Power: Its Significance and Needs," by Chester G. Gilbert and Joseph E. Ponge, beginning on page 38 and concluded on page 50 of the bulletin.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NATIONALIZATION OF INDUSTRIAL OPPORTUNITY.

Power and raw materials constitute the foundations of industry. Capital, labor, markets, and other elements enter into the structure, but they do not lie at the base. Neither power resources nor raw materials are uniformly available; both tend to be provincial in occurrence; but since industrial power is dominantly drawn from coal, while raw materials are derived from a thousand sources of organic and mineral origin, the aggregate availability is far more restricted in the case of coal. In other words, any given section of the country is almost invariably provided with raw material of some kind, while under the present régime only those sections contiguous to rich coal fields are amply provided with power. The geographical and political consequences of the localized occurrence of coal and of concentrated types of raw materials are obvious and well known. The inequalities of opportunity conditioned by these matters have always been bones of contention, from the aboriginal strife over deposits of salt and flint down to the action which resulted in the conquest of an iron-bearing province and contributed prominently to the epoch-making conflict now raging.

Discord from this source is as old as human history and nations have evolved with the placement of their boundaries strongly influenced by concentrations of resource opportunity. The North American Continent, however, provides a notable exception to the rule. Its vast area was explored and appropriated before its resource potentialities were recognized, and hence its various sections came to be unified into a few nationalities on the strength of social bonds, which, with one or two exceptions, have nowhere been dissevered by subsequent economic influences. Thus the United States is a Nation of many parts bound together by social unity, but separated by a divergence of economic interests. The development of natural resources has given rise to a marked differentiation in the quality of opportunity opening up to the different sections, while the boundaries of the economic provinces set up in this wise are further emphasized by a general conformity to topographic features disfavoring intercommunication. Thus this country is displaying a steady drift toward economic variation and specialization among its members.

But national well-being is dependent upon economic unity no less than upon social unity. The Civil War, in the last analysis, had its origin in discordant economic sectionalism. A military expression of domestic discord is outgrown, but civil strife is not the sole misfortune that may arise from cross interests. Without economic unity a definite economic policy is nationally unattainable. And with no formulated economic policy, one of the two prime functions of government is reduced to the rank of partisanship, and industry is left to the paralyzing influence of uncertainty as regards the future of prospective operations. Thus far the divergent economic interests of the various sections of the country have not permitted the establishment of a constructive economic policy satisfactory to the Nation as a whole.

Elements too numerous to specify enter into this sectionalism of interest, but the most conspicuous contributor to the outcome is the presence or absence of resources productive of mechanical energy. Given a region endowed with an ample supply of coal, for example, and all the other elements of industrial activity gather in the manner of an accretionary growth. Even the crudest raw materials tend to be drawn to the sources of energy in greater measure than is found true of the reverse relation. Other attractions, to be sure, such as labor supply, markets, and transportation facilities register strong claims tending to diffuse and spread the focus of development, but industrial concentration never migrates beyond the convenient reach of power, which therefore sets the outside bounds to industrial range. Thus certain naturally favored sections of the country have come to have a predominant interest in manufacture, while other sections in the rôle of producers and consumers for the manufacturing areas are led to react to motives and economic interests foreign and even antagonistic to those of manufacture. Where such a situation is permitted to develop in accentuated form, an economic policy satisfactory to the two extremes would appear to involve a type of concord foreign to human nature.

The influence of energy resources in an unfavorable and favorable direction may be illustrated by two examples—one drawn from conditions obtaining in New England and the other taken from recent industrial developments in the South Atlantic States.

In New England the foundations of industrialism were laid during the régime of water power. With the advent of steam power the abundance of coal available to the Middle Atlantic States set up a strong counter attraction which entailed a steady migration of industry away from the New England section, since this area contains no coal, and is marked by physiographic conditions which provide inadequate gateways for rail transportation and necessitate a roundabout rail-to-water-to-rail service exposed to all manner of exigency. Still, with the advantages of its early start, New England maintained a powerful asset in the form of skilled labor, and the weight of this factor has overbalanced the lack of an adequate power supply in those special forms of industry involving specialized workmanship. These, therefore, still prevail and reflect the peculiar color of the situation. But in the newer industrial sections elsewhere skill of workmanship is in process of development and is steadily lessening the attraction of an advantage which transiently favors New England. In time this factor will be practically neutralized, and with continued inequality of power supply New England will see its industrial life narrowing under the cumulative weight of a growing handicap. This is an example, then, of how a natural power supply may create a development in one part of the country at the expense of another section, a circumstance not making for unity of interest.

The South Atlantic area resembles New England in respect to power resources; coal must be hauled in from a distance and water power is fairly abundant. But whereas the industrialism of New England is the oldest in the country that of the South is among the youngest. Here, indeed, the growth of industry has been largely a matter of the past 15 or 20 years, subsequent, therefore, to the introduction of electricity as a motive force. In consequence much of the upgrowth is built upon the use of hydroelectric power, and tends to be distributive—that is to say, natural—instead of a forced growth in proximity to localized coal belts. Coming into action late the industrialism of the South, unhampered by tradition and unencumbered by obsolescent power establishments, took over the practice best suited to its needs. Thus, while the Northeastern States form an illustration of centralized industry, establishing itself first in New England and migrating later to the Central Atlantic States and thence westward, the South displays a regional development of industry nowhere intersely focused, but spread, on the contrary, in diluted form over a large area. The contrast is suggestive; for permanence, for national well-being, for the common good, it would appear that a balanced economic life in which each section manufactures, in large measure, its own products is preferable to a highly intensified manufacture setting up its own interests in opposition to the more extensive producing areas. The South presents an example of power supply disposed to create a normal development from within, with minimum detraction from the opportunities peculiar to other sections.

These are but two illustrations of fields in which power supply is a strong economic force. Each section of the country, in point of fact, has its own peculiar reflex to this matter. The Pacific coast, for instance, has a specialized and acute power problem to meet; there the rich oil fields of California launched a period of industrialism which this source of power can not much longer sustain. The industrial life of this whole section is threatened by the impending decline of its oil fields. Similarly with the Southwest. The power influence, then, is country-wide—here throttling established industry; there leading to overbalanced growth; elsewhere retarding needed developments; rarely promoting well-rounded economic growth; on the whole, making for divergence of economic interest.

This situation, undesirable as it stands, is bound to grow worse if matters are left to untrammeled evolution. Human labor is mobile; it is becoming standardized, even nationalized; cheap labor locally restricted is disappearing. Thus the factor of labor supply is losing its distributive effect upon industry. In consequence, the presence of mechanical labor (power) will become an even greater centralizing force than heretofore; manufacturing districts will tend to be more strikingly developed than ever. The natural tendency, in short, will be toward the building up of centralized industry enjoying monopolistic advantages of power supply, a condition in itself constituting a restraint in respect to the adequate unfoldment of other industries beyond the reach of the favored source.

Such an interplay of economic forces is complex and proclivities can not be expected to travel far undeflected by new conditions, but whatever the uncertainties of the matter, the power situation merits attention in respect to its present untoward bearing on economic policy. If a constructive economic policy is desirable for this country, and if the conclusion is valid that the power supply represents a force now working against the unification of economic purpose into a national policy, but capable of direction toward such an outcome, the whole matter becomes a fundamental issue which may not be ignored. In short, a coordinated and balanced development of the coal and water-power resources of the country, which will follow from the establishment of an adequate common-carrier system of transmission lines, will serve to equalize industrial opportunity and therefore to unify the economic interests of the country so that a constructive economic policy agreeable to all sections may win country-wide support.

But in addition to its bearing upon national policy, a distribution of power advantages will make for an indirect but very significant gain in the matter of transportation; for industry may then strike a more perfect balance between the location of raw-material sources and markets. As the matter now stands, the adjustment is a compromise between three main factors, of which the position of the fuel source is dominant, and the industrial centralization resulting is in considerable measure responsible for the "bottle-neck" restrictions in the transportation layout of this country—a pattern that has become a conspicuous source of transportation weakness during the past year. The nationalization of industrial opportunity through equalized power supply will permit the upgrowth of new industrial activities in positions which will impose a lessened relative burden upon the railways and diffuse the intensification of responsibility that is now bearing with growing force upon the neck-like restrictions in the neighborhood of present industrial centers.

ENLARGEMENT OF INDUSTRIAL OPPORTUNITY.

We have seen that power supply constitutes a strong attractive force, leading under natural conditions to marked industrial concentrations in certain parts of the country. The unfavorable bearing of this circumstance upon the attainment of a national economic policy is noteworthy and constitutes an argument for directing the sectionalizing force of power supply into more distributive channels than it seeks of its own accord. The most effective means toward a better balanced industrial growth in this respect is afforded by electricity, which lends itself to generation at fixed points in coal regions and at water-power sites, and to transmission thence to adjacent areas in such manner that, if the growth as a whole be properly shaped, a much larger portion of the country may be served with power on terms of equality than is now the case. Thus can power be turned away, in considerable measure, from its present dangerous facility in accentuating diversity of economic interest and made to contribute to the nationalization of industrial opportunity.

But just as coal contains valuable commodities as well as stored-up energy, so electricity is not merely a convenient form of power, but is a new and profoundly important chemical agent as well. In this sense electricity represents a fresh industrial factor which is just beginning to come into play and bids fair to make for itself a master range of activity. Electricity, then, is not only capable of distributing industrial opportunity; it is competent at the same time of infinitely enlarging the scope of industrialism. The opportunity in this direction is so significant and has so recently become apparent that the field merits a close view in connection with the whole matter of power supply.

This field of special electrical service, in contradistinction to the application of electric energy as a motive force, is covered by the term "electrochemistry," which is the art of applying electrical energy to the furtherance of chemical operations. The aptness of electricity for this purpose has proved so great that in scarcely more than a decade there has developed a large number of electrochemical industries, in addition to a growing range of superior adaptions in established industries and in the realm of metallurgy, with the setting up of a new branch of the latter, known as electrometallurgy. Thus electrochemistry has not only facilitated ordinary industrial activities in many directions; it has opened an unbounded territory never before traversed by industry.

The facility of electricity in this new realm is due to its capacity for generating heat under conditions open to exact control, over high temperatures not attainable by fuel combustion, and in absence of gases, together with the exertion of a chemical force of decomposition independently or in conjunction with the heating effect. Thus electrochemistry operates through its dissociating effect upon solutions and melts, a process technically called "electrolysis"; through discharges in gases; and by means of electric furnaces. Upon these operations depend the manufacture of alkalis, chlorine, atmospheric nitrogen, graphite, artificial abrasives, and calcium carbide; the production of aluminum and many of the steel-hardening metals; and the refining of gold, silver, and copper—to mention merely the most conspicuous attainments of the electrochemical art.

The achievements of electrochemistry to date are to be credited mainly to the region around Niagara Falls and to foreign countries, especially the latter. Elsewhere in the United States there are relatively few electrochemical activities. Such as have been established are in the vicinity of choice water-power sites or, as in the case of recent atmospheric nitrogen fixation plants, subsidized by the Government. But, by and large, electrochemical industries are grossly undeveloped in this country, relative both to their intrinsic importance and to their upgrowth abroad; and while a considerable expansion has resulted under the stimulus of war prices, the course of progress is under the handicap of power costs running far in excess of what is offered in Canada and abroad. Since power is a large item of expense in most electrochemical activities, its high cost in the United States is not only preventing development, except along specialized lines of high-value small-bulk products, but is causing an emigration and settlement of such industries in other countries offering a more genial atmosphere of power costs. Not only this, but the tide of emigration is actually affecting the industries already established at Niagara Falls. On the whole, then, counting off war-time exuberance, our electrochemical industries, while growing in an absolute sense, are relatively stationary, if not actually retrograding. That is to say, our electrochemical needs are growing faster than our electrochemical industries, which means that an increasing dependence upon foreign developments is under way.

If the high cost of electric power in the United States is blocking adequate electrochemical developments, we should take time to examine the scope of the fields that are being retarded by this circumstance. Such a retardation, of course, is difficult to visualize, for its most important area consists of what has not been accomplished; or, rather, of the margin between current and possible attainments, so far as determined by conditions of power supply. Yet the prospect can be swept, even though we may turn aside before coming up with it.

In the realm of metallurgy electricity opens to use a number of metals not commercially extractable from their ores on any other terms. The most conspicuous example is aluminum, which was a chemical curiosity until thus made available; but such metals and elements as magnesium, calcium, sodium, potassium, cerium, and silicon are also coming into prominence, although the applications of these newer additions are still in their infancy. It is not unworthy of note, although the bearing of the fact may not become conspicuous for many years, that electrometallurgy offers a means for turning the more common and leaner mineral materials to account when the exhaustion of the rather limited and rich concentrations heretofore exploited shall have been accomplished. For the manufacture of a great number of metallic alloys, such as ferromanganese, ferrochromium, ferrotungsten, and others needed to give to steel the various special properties demanded by its many applications, electric power is essential, while for the production of iron and steel the use of electricity is finding a growing application. Indeed, many "metallurgists in active practice in the United States are convinced that the time is rapidly approaching when all steel made will be passed through the electric furnace to receive its final refining and its finishing touches. We may safely look forward to the establishment of not only hundreds but possibly thousands of electric steel furnaces." In the metallurgy of copper, zinc, and tin electricity is coming into play, while in the refining of metals it is affording the means for recovering many constituents formerly going to waste, in addition to producing products of such purity as to open up new uses not previously enjoyed. The United States is the greatest producer of metals in the world, and proper electrical-power development will give a great impetus to the advancement of the mineral industries.

No problem is more fundamental to any country than the matter of food supply, and electrochemistry has a very direct bearing in this respect through its promise of lending assistance in producing fertilizers. Of the three important fertilizing materials—nitrogen, phosphorus, and potassium—nitrogen may be drawn from the atmosphere by the expenditure of electrical energy; cheap electrical power offers an immediate means for doing away with the cumbersome method of converting phosphate rock into acid phosphate, with its consequent burden upon transportation and upon sulphuric-acid manufacture; while the locked-up stores of potash held in unlimited amount in widespread areas of silicate rocks must eventually be drawn upon and presumably with the help of the electric current. It is scarcely too much to say that the fertilizer industry in the course of a decade or so will undergo a radical change, in which importations of Chilean nitrate, German potash, and Spanish pyrite will be a thing of the past. But the course of progress will depend very much upon the conditions surrounding the supply of electrical power in this country; this matter will determine the speed of advancement and reflect in some measure in this respect upon the cost of living.

In the field of manufacturing, electrochemistry occupies a unique place. It has already created a number of products of fundamental usefulness, while the latent opportunities for the future are very great. The development of artificial abrasives, especially carborundum, superior to natural abrasives, has greatly facilitated many processes of mechanical manufacture, such as the making of automobiles, ordnance, and other materials; the production of calcium carbide has made the acetylene lamp possible, with inestimable benefit to thousands of mines the world over, which have thus been freed from smoky oil lamps and flickering candles; and the manufacture of artificial graphite is rendering a useful service as a lubricant in conserving energy. These products, which are of much greater significance than may be measured by the pecuniary value of the output, have all been developed at Niagara Falls as result of the abundant electric power earlier available there and are made from raw materials of the commonest and cheapest kinds, such as sand, lime, coke, and others. Further products, too numerous to specify, are being commercially launched or are in the experimental stage in the works and laboratories of that electrochemical center. An important industry has also developed in the electrolytic manufacture of sodium and chlorine, and their numerous compounds, used in large quantities in a wide variety of other industries, which are made from common salt—a widespread and cheap material. It would appear that one striking characteristic of electrochemistry is its ability to convert into useful products the commonest and cheapest of everyday materials. It holds forth in this sense the prospect of the highest type of constructive economic service.

On the whole, then, electrochemical industries and applications have developed in the United States to some extent in spite of high electric-power rates, but the lines of development have been those in which the advantages to be gained were conspicuous, and the operations have been largely confined to Niagara Falls. In the vaster range of possibilities, in which the opportunities were not so outstanding, high rates and lack of available power have been sufficient to head off an incalculable range of prospective enterprises, to the country's serious economic loss. Indeed, if electric power were made available in quantity at rates half the prevailing tariff, the upgrowth of electrochemical industries would overwhelm the previous attainments along this line.

The whole field of electrochemical development in the United States is dependent in the last analysis upon the quantity and price of electric power. And in both respects the power situation as it now stands is inadequate. Unless we are prepared to see the electrochemical industries which we now have emigrate in part to foreign countries, and unless we are also willing to face a stagnant condition in respect to a wide range of important industrial developments, the whole matter of our power supply must come up for attention. This matter does not concern one section or one class; the field is country wide; the outcome concerns both industry and the public interest. And labor, in particular, will find a concern in this affair, for only by cheapened mechanical power can a generous rate of human compensation be sustained in the face of cheaper labor, both human and mechanical, on the European market.

SUMMARY.

Modern society is dependent upon industrialism, the material framework of civilization.

American industrialism differs from the industrialism of other nations in two respects—it places unusual emphasis upon the employment of power and it couples an advanced industrial development, which means a high standard of living, with a vast expanse of territory.

Each of these conditions imposes a special demand upon transportation, and the two combined have given rise to transportation difficulties that are threatening to throttle the economic life of the country.

If unrelieved, the situation will entail a deterioration in the standard of living. The effects of a lowered living scale so caused will not fall evenly the country over, but may be expected to be selective to the disadvantage of unfavored sections, with the setting up of economic discord and sectional dissension in the place of national unity.

The issue can not be adequately met by furthering the development of the railways alone, for already this type of carrier has been pushed to such a point of overdevelopment as to constitute a critical weakness in the economic structure of the country. The source of the disqualification lies not merely in the sheer magnitude of the responsibility which the railways support, but also in their notably inferior elasticity in respect to industrial expansion as compared with the processes of manufacture. The power supply is the chief single contributor to both conditions of default. It not only comprises, mainly in the form of coal, more than one-third of the total freight of the country, but the dependence upon freight-hauled fuel on the part of an expanding industrial activity places an overweight of burden upon transportation by virtue of the fact that coal, raw materials, and finished products represent three additional units of haulage to be reckoned with for every added unit of production. Hence, the logical way to correct the transportation unfitness of this country is to attack the matter through improvement in power usage.

Three principles of transportation underlie industrial growth, and industrial activities in general conform to their prescriptions as a matter of course. These factors are represented in (1) the employment of suitable facilities for the task of transportation, (2) the advance elimination of superfluous weight, and (3) the full utilization of the material transported. These conditions are seen to be the merest common sense; illustrations of conformity with them are on every hand; in the matter of power alone they have been utterly disregarded. In the working out of these principles national experience has shown (1) that a transportation system of country-wide scope serving a community interest must be of a common-carrier order subject to public oversight—such has been the lesson of the railways; (2) that in the realm of production, which has to do with the advance elimination of superfluous weight, competition is desirable and should be as unhampered as possible; and (3) that in the field of manufacture and consumption the attainment of full utilization stands in need of constructive help—that here competition unaided is incapable of employing to full effect the principle of multiple production. Applying these conceptions to power, we find that the situation is at fault, because (1) there is no common-carrier system for the transmission of energy, although the development of electricity permits the power materials to be freed of weight at the source and enables the energy of water power to be utilized; (2) the presence of the railways, in the absence of special facilities for electric transmission, has prevented competition from becoming effective in the direction of the advance elimination of weight; and (3) the failure of this country to recognize the principle of multiple production and vitalize its latent force has held private initiative impotent to use fully the energy materials provided.

The righting of the power situation requires (1) the establishment of a comprehensive system of electric transmission lines to be administered as a common-carrier system like the railways. (2) The provision of such a system will necessitate the coordinated growth of central power stations in coal fields and at water-power sites, and in doing so will open to business enterprise a tremendous field of opportunity hitherto closed off from entry, and thus lead to the balanced development of the two major energy resources. (3) The principle of multiple production, recognized and incorporated in national policy, will supplement the additional service gained through the organized employment of the electrical principle; applied to the production of coal-generated electricity, and, through the medium of municipal public utility plants, to the distributive employment of coal, this principle will effectively correlate the recovery of the commodity and energy values, so as ultimately to effect a full saving of the former and an increased gain of the latter, thus permitting a further relative diminution of the amount of fuel calling for transportation in bulky form. The first two points reduce themselves to a single issue, which is purely a business proposition to be handled by a business organization; the third item is more intangible and it is matter of policy, which, therefore, can not be delegated or otherwise handled in objective fashion.

The provision of a common-carrier system of transmission lines, in brief, is the key to the whole problem. Its establishment will remove the retarding influence of high interest rates and antagonistic misunderstanding that has blocked water-power development, and will afford the point of departure from precedent in favor of coal-field generation of electricity. Owing to the magnitude of the issue and the manifold lines of progress directly at stake, the development will provide a nuclear point for the establishment of a constructive economic policy, needed not merely for the full development of this field but as well for the proper unfoldment of the industrial possibilities of the country in general. As such a policy has not developed in the past because of economic sectionalism growing chiefly out of an unequalized development of the energy resources, the nationalization of industrial opportunity attainable through a balanced development of power supply will clear the path of the main obstruction to unified action.

Thus specific action in respect to establishing a common-carrier system adapted to the power needs of the country will not only go far toward solving the problem of transportation, but it will improve the fuel supply, correct the economic fallacy of drawing upon capital resources while neglectful of income, contribute to the recovery of the values now lost in the consumption of raw coal, lead to an adequate development of electrochemical activities, cut off a needless annual expenditure running well beyond the billion dollar mark, and constitute a potent contribution in the direction of stimulating the upgrowth of a constructive economic policy of national scope attuned to the needs of modern industrial development.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, since the war began it has been the duty of every Member of Congress to resolve every real doubt he had in regard to pending legislation in favor of the view expressed by those administrative officers who are in position of responsibility for the conduct and prosecution of the war. We should have, and we all do have, opinions in regard to these matters, and frequently very decided opinions; but unless we are very certain that our view and judgment is the wise and proper one, it is our duty to meet the views of officers of the administration charged with responsibility along the lines that they mark out. It is with that view of the matter, and that view alone, that I shall support this measure, for I am very frank to say that my judgment does not commend it as being necessary or essential.

True, it is necessary to do what the bill proposes shall be done, to wit, increase the power facilities of the country to such extent as shall be necessary for the prosecution of the war. No one will deny that.

It is just as necessary to do that as it was to increase the housing facilities, to increase the shipbuilding facilities, as it was to increase the munition facilities of the country. But we have numerous departments, and have organized first one bureau and agency and then another, having jurisdiction in these matters, until we have covered, it occurs to me, the entire field. While a part, at least, of what is proposed to be done under this bill should be done, there are already a number of governmental agencies that could accomplish these results and that ought to have accomplished them long before this.

It may be some of these agencies need more funds, though that is doubtful, but if they do they should receive them.

The appropriation of one hundred and seventy-five million for the use of this new agency does not appeal to me as the best practice.

Why has the administration come before Congress at this late date, saying that there is a shortage of power in connection with war activities, when the authority and funds have been for months in the hands of various bureaus and agencies of the Government for enlarging, increasing, and extending the power plants and resources of the country?

The Council of National Defense, the War Trade Board, the War Industries Board, the War Finance Corporation, the Capital Issues Committee, the Shipping Board, the War and Navy Departments—all of these agencies are armed with authority, each in its own field, and most of them have ample funds to extend aid and assistance in the development and enlargement and extension of power facilities in connection with war work. This authority they have had for months. I have no doubt that to some extent they have exercised their authority and afforded aid. I have no doubt that to a very large extent they have assisted in one way or another these power plants and aided in their enlargement and extension, as they have authority to do. Nevertheless we are asked to enact legislation that is likely to create an altogether new agency and clothe it with enormous power, and thus, instead of helping to concentrate and coordinate the activities of the Government and bring them under one control, we are asked to still further divide and duplicate. In my opinion it is not wise.

I shall support this bill only because men in positions of responsibility insist the legislation is necessary. The bill does not commend itself to my judgment. I believe what is proposed to be done could be done better through other agencies more cheaply, more quickly, more promptly, more efficiently. However, if those responsible say that they can not accomplish all that is needed under present legislation and appropriations, I must accept their view. So much for that.

This bill deals with the development of power. That includes both steam and hydroelectric power. I assume that little will be done in the way of developing hydroelectric power under the bill. Very little such development could be secured in time to be of service in the war. I suppose it will be mostly the development of steam power, a development that can be quickly made.

GASOLINE IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF POWER.

While we are on the subject of power we are reminded that one of the most important products in the United States for the production of power is oil. I think it may be truthfully said that there is no one product, except the great product of iron and steel, that is more essential to the winning of the war than mineral oil and its by-products—gasoline, naphtha, lubricating oil. It is necessary to have gasoline to run the airplanes, upon which we must largely depend for our victory over yonder. We must have gasoline or oil to run the tanks, which are now so important a factor in all the advances along the western front, and which tend so greatly to reduce the casualties of the attacking forces. We must have oil or gasoline to run the transports, the ambulances, the motor cars, and trucks to provide food and ammunition for and bear the wounded from the battle line. Gasoline is needed at home for multiplied purposes.

Recently there has been a very alarming and unfortunate reduction in oil and gasoline production, compared to the demand. The Senate of the United States, on the 8th day of September, passed a resolution calling upon the Director of the Fuel Administration for a report on the production and consumption of gasoline.

That report was made on September 11 and was published as Senate Document No. 277. I hold it in my hand. From that report it appears that there has been a steady reduction in the stocks of gasoline and naphtha for months past, that the reduction of the stocks of gasoline and naphtha during the month of July was approximately 1,367,000 barrels, or 44,000 barrels a day, and for August 2,000,000 barrels. It appears further that we will soon reach a point where we are likely to have not more than a month's supply of gasoline and naphtha on hand. In this alarming condition of affairs one would think that those interested in and officially responsible for the winning of the war, in maintaining conditions under which we may win the war, would use every effort to increase the production of gasoline.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So far as the production of gasoline is concerned, that is, the development of the oil fields, wildcat operations, has there been any let down in that? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. MONDELL. There has been a very considerable let down, growing out of a variety of causes. Some operators have been discouraged somewhat by reason of the very high taxation in the revenue bill. I have heretofore explained how the high excess and war profits taxes are particularly burdensome on a business of great hazard like the oil business. The larger factor, where production comes from public lands, is due to the unsatisfactory provisions of the oil-leasing bill and the hostile attitude of certain departments of the Government toward such development. It is in regard to certain phases of the official attitude toward oil production on lands that have been located and claimed under the oil-placer act that I particularly invite the attention of the House at this time.

About four years ago—or, to be entirely accurate, on August 25, 1914—Congress passed an act providing that where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered for certain classes of oil or gas lands included in an order of withdrawal the Secretary of the Interior may make temporary arrangements whereby, by impounding a portion of the product, the operations may be continued.

While that bill was under discussion in the House and during the consideration of the conference report there was some discussion of the intent and purpose of the legislation. I opened that discussion, and it was participated in by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, which reported the bill, and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], a member of the Committee on the Public Lands. We expressed our opinions as to the intent and purpose of Congress in the passage of that act, but I shall not refer to what was said at this time because I intend to present a letter of the Secretary of the Interior in which our statements are referred to. Some time after the passage of the act I have referred to the Secretary of the Interior entered into agreements with certain claimants and operators in California and Wyoming under which they were allowed to operate and produce oil from the contested lands by impounding to the credit of the Government a sum equal to one-eighth of the value of the oil obtained, this being the usual commercial royalty. Those agreements and arrangements were entered into from time to time with claimants in California and in what is known as the Salt Creek field in Wyoming. With a few exceptions, where there were controversies among private claimants, they were all identical as to the amount that was to be impounded. The theory was that if patents were denied and the lands reverted to the Government, the Government would have in its possession what amounted to a fair royalty on the oil extracted.

That appealed to almost everyone as a fair and reasonable arrangement; it enabled the claimants to continue to develop their property and add to the oil production of the country at a time when oil and gasoline were greatly needed. The arrangement was in harmony with the view expressed in Congress as to the intent and purpose of the law. That the Government was amply protected is evidenced by the fact that there was impounded up to June 30, 1918, under the 28 Salt Creek agreements the sum of $699,239. The Government was thus assured nearly $700,000, in case patents were denied, from a few hundred acres of lands that for years had been subject to oil entry at $2.50 per acre, and were not worth even that nominal sum until after years of effort and the expenditure of large sums of money by the claimants oil was discovered upon them. These arrangements in Wyoming related to wells that produce an exceedingly high-grade oil containing a large percentage of gasoline. It is the kind of oil now very badly needed.

Operations continued under these agreements for a considerable length of time. Finally, June 2, 1917, the Attorney General addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior calling attention to the character of these agreements, urging that the agreements did not sufficiently protect the interests of the Government, and expressing the opinion that instead of following the plan provided by Congress it would be preferable to operate these wells under receiverships, impounding the entire product. This letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I desire to direct your attention to a serious situation which has resulted from the character of the operating agreements entered into by you with applicants for patents to withdrawn oil lands under the act of August 25, 1914 (38 Stat., 708), and from the delay in your department with respect to the disposition of such applications in cases where charges of fraud or unlawful entry have been made against the applicants.

The act of 1914 provides:

"That where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered for any oil or gas land included in an order of withdrawal upon which oil or gas has heretofore been discovered, or is being produced, or upon which drilling operations were in actual progress on October 3, 1910, and oil or gas is thereafter discovered thereon, and where there has been no final determination by the Secretary of the Interior upon such applications for patent, said Secretary, in his discretion, may enter into agreements, under such conditions as he may prescribe with such applicants for patents in possession of such land or any portions thereof, relative to the disposition of the oil or gas produced therefrom or the proceeds thereof, pending final determination of the title thereto by the Secretary of the Interior, or such other disposition of the same as may be authorized by law."

The manifest purpose of this statute was to provide a method for conserving the properties embraced in applications for patents until it could be decided whether they belonged to the applicants or to the Government, without the necessity of resorting to receivership proceedings. The method provided is in all essential respects like a voluntary receivership, under which the applicant may properly be permitted to continue necessary operations under supervision, and the Secretary acts as a trustee to conserve the property pending his own decision between the applicant and the Government, just as a court receiver acts to conserve the subject of litigation pending a decision of the court.

The analogy between an operating agreement under the act of 1914 and a court receivership is perfect in cases where the applicant is charged by the Government agents with fraud or violation of the law in the initiation or prosecution of his claim, and a hearing is necessary to determine the truth of the charge. In such a case there is an adversary proceeding in the Land Department between the Government and the applicant as to the ownership of the property. I have before me data from the records of the General Land Office which show that agreements under the act of 1914 have been entered into in 36 cases of this kind, 18 in California and 18 in Wyoming. Excepting 3 of the Wyoming cases, all of these agreements contain substantially uniform provisions. They apparently permit the drilling of additional wells without limit, require the sale of the total production, and provide for the payment of seven-eighths of the proceeds to the claimants and the deposit of the remaining one-eighth in escrow to abide your decision on the applications for patents. The result is that, upon a denial of the patent in any such case, the Government can not possibly receive more than the value of one-eighth of the prior production.

If these properties were handled by a receiver, as they presumably would be were it not for these agreements, the entire production less the cost of conservative operation would be impounded, to the end that the Government could recover the full value of the property in the event of a final decision against the claimant. This is the rule adopted by the courts in a number of similar cases in which a receiver has been appointed to conserve the property. It is also in principle the rule adopted by your department in the three exceptional cases in Wyoming. In those cases the agreements require a deposit of the proceeds of the entire production, less 6 cents per barrel of oil to cover operating expenses. This exception was made in these three cases in order to protect the asserted rights of rival claimants. I can not find any justification for confining the Government to a lesser measure of protection than that which is accorded to adverse claimants. Indeed, I am unable to regard the position of the Government in these cases in any other light than that of an adverse claimant.

In my letter to you of July 14, 1915, I called your attention to the fact that the Department of Justice was being subjected to harsh criticism for insisting upon the deposit of the entire net proceeds in the receivership cases while your department, by agreements in similar cases, was requiring deposits of but one-eighth of the gross production. I attempted to impress you with the injustice of this, and, by way of securing a modicum of relief, I suggested the propriety of allowing the applicants "only a sufficient proportion of the production to cover actual operating expenses, with a reasonable profit." To this suggestion you agreed in your letter to me of July 19, 1915; but you stated, referring to the then market price of oil, that "at 37½ cents a barrel a man can not pump and run his plant and give himself a profit upon his investment on much less than seven-eighths." In this connection you observed that the agreement in every case provides "that it can be changed on 30 days' notice, and the amount of the royalty increased." I am informed that no such change has been made in any agreement and that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has lately invited, and is now entertaining, applications for additional agreements upon the same terms, although the market price of oil has practically doubled since 1915.

In some exceptional cases it is possible that the cost of operation may equal or even exceed seven-eighths of the production. But in a majority of the cases it appears that the cost of operation should not exceed one-tenth of the production at the present market price of oil. This is shown by the operation of similar properties in the same locality under the supervision of a court receiver. With the market price of oil at 72 cents per barrel, the three exceptional agreements before referred to will result in impounding eleven-twelfths of the production for the protection of private adverse claimants in those cases. It is therefore evident that the indiscriminate deposit of one-eighth of the gross production in all cases where the Government alone is contesting the claim is not calculated to protect the interests of the Government.

Very few, if any, of these claimants are entitled to special consideration. In most of the cases there can be no reasonable ground to believe that patents will ever be granted. In 15 of the 18 California cases special agents of the General Land Office have charged the claimants with fraudulent locations, the other 3 being charged with violating the withdrawal order. In all but 1 of these 18 cases hearings have been directed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in that 1 the charge is that the entry was illegal and also that the claimant was guilty of fraud. In the 18 Wyoming cases few hearings have been directed, although adverse reports have been made by the special agents. In most of the Wyoming cases delay in departmental action has been caused by collusive suits instituted in the State courts by pretended rival claimants.

I understand that hearings are directed in cases where it has been determined prima facie, upon the application papers and the special agent's report, that the claimant is not entitled to a patent. Of such a claimant it is not unfair to say that he is prima facie a trespasser on the lands of the United States, and, in case of fraud, a willful trespasser. It certainly was not the intention of the law to reward trespass and fraud; yet, I am constrained to say, the operating agreements which give to such claimants seven-eighths of the gross production are adapted to accomplish that result.

The most serious feature of this situation is its continuity, due to the inaction of the General Land Office in deciding cases.

Following the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Midwest Oil Co. (236 U. S., 459), on February 23, 1915, sustaining the validity of the withdrawal order of September 27, 1909, it became apparent that a close cooperation between our departments was essential to the protection of the interests of the Government in the withdrawn lands as against illegal and fraudulent claims. This was agreed to between us at a conference in my office on June 5, 1915. It was there agreed, as stated in my letter to you of June 7, 1915, that the effectiveness of our efforts would depend, among other things, "upon the speed with which all applications for patent shall be examined and disposed of by your department," and that therefore "the applications for patents now pending in the General Land Office, and all others that may be filed hereafter, will be disposed of as soon as possible." In answer to my letter you stated, by letter of June 17, 1915, that your department would "endeavor, through the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to promptly carry out the scheme of cooperation which was discussed and adopted at the conference." My information is that a hearing has been held in but one of the adversely reported cases in which operating agreements have been entered into, and that no further hearings are contemplated in any such cases unless desired by the applicants.

The pendency of these cases in your department would seem to deprive the courts of jurisdiction to determine the merits of the claims, and the existence of the operating agreements precludes receivership proceedings for the conservation of the properties.

The character of the operating agreements entered into under the act of 1914, coupled with the failure of the General Land Office to dispose of the applications for patents to the lands which are the subject of those agreements, is a source of constant embarrassment to this department. Many tracts of land in the same localities, the title to which depends upon the same or similar questions of law and fact, are not covered by operating agreements either because the lands lie within a naval reserve or were involved in Government suits prior to applications for patent. For the protection of the interests of the Government in these lands a receiver is necessary in most cases. In a majority of the cases a receiver has been appointed and operations are being conducted under his supervision; in others the application for a receiver is pending, and in still others such application is contemplated. As before stated, the rule adopted by the courts for the protection of the Government, pending a final decision, is to impound the entire production less the cost of conservative operation. This is the only rule for which we can contend consistently with our sense of public duty and the practice of courts of equity. But the far more liberal rule of the operating agreements entered into by your department in similar cases is constantly being used as an argument to neutralize our efforts to protect the Government interests and as a basis for harsh and unjust criticism of this department.

Our embarrassment in this respect has been much enhanced by a circular letter dated January 8, 1917, sent by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to all operators in the California oil fields on withdrawn lands not in a naval reserve or in suit and with whom operating agreements had not been made, inviting them to make applications for operating agreements on the usual terms of seven-eighths of the gross production to them and one-eighth to be deposited. In that letter the commissioner stated that under similar existing agreements "whatever interests the Government may have have been protected without the necessity of resorting to a receivership." That is to say, in the opinion of the commissioner thus publicly announced, the rule of equity invoked by this department and applied by the courts in the receivership cases for the protection of the Government against trespassers is wrong and oppressive, and the Government is entitled to receive only one-eighth of the gross production in the event the claims are held to be fraudulent or illegal. In other words, it is announced in a circular letter of your department that you are authorized by the act of 1914 to turn over to trespassers on the oil and gas lands of the United States seven-eighths of the gross production of such lands, regardless of the cost of operation or the value of the product. Most of the operators under existing agreements are shown by the records of the General Land Office to be prima facie trespassers, and each agreement contains a provision (par. 11) that upon a final denial of the application for patent—that is, upon a final decision that the applicant is a trespasser—the one-eighth deposit will be accepted in full and complete satisfaction of "all claims of the United States for trespass" by such applicant on the premises during the period of the agreement.

A matter of immediate and special concern is this: On April 16, 1917, while suits were in preparation (pursuant to an agreement between Special Assistant Justice and Commissioner Tallman) against E. E. Jones and the Standard Oil Co., involving lands within naval petroleum reserve No. 2, the commissioner inquired of Mr. Justice by telegram whether he had any objections to the execution of operating agreements with these same parties covering adjacent lands in the same township outside the naval reserve. Mr. Justice answered the same day objecting to the proposed agreements on the ground that the lands both inside and outside the naval reserve were claimed by the same parties as one group, and that the right to all the lands was subject to the same charges of unlawful entry. He therefore advised that all the tracts be placed in suit. On April 19, 1917, the commissioner sent to Mr. Justice the following telegram:

"Your wire 16th. Jones and Standard Oil contract applications filed. Result, general letter sent by me to all operators California fields on lands not in naval reserves or in suit suggesting advisability of contract. Believe interest Government can be conserved properly by granting contracts and not disposed to recommend denial same after requesting them."

It is pertinent here to observe that this department has protested to the commissioner against the making of every one of the 36 agreements before mentioned, but without avail.

At the last session of Congress the commissioner recommended the enactment of a measure which provided in substance that all trespassers (whether chargeable with fraud or not) on withdrawn oil lands outside the naval reserves who have producing wells should be given leases, at a one-eighth royalty, of the lands claimed by them and on which such wells are located. The commissioner appears now to proceed on the assumption that his recommendation is certain to be enacted into law, and therefore that the only Government interest which need be conserved in any case is a one-eighth royalty interest. He apparently forgets that his recommendation met with overwhelming opposition in Congress and was disapproved both by you and the President. In your letter to me of February 28, 1917, discussing the feasibility of another measure for leasing withdrawn lands outside the naval reserves to claimants thereon, you said, "But, of course, no claimant who was attempting to secure the lands by fraud would be allowed to have a lease to any portion." Nevertheless, the system of operating agreements, continued indefinitely and extended industriously, is composed largely of the very leases, in substance and effect, which you condemned. Indeed, the agreements are more objectionable than the proposed leases in that they do not give the Government one-eighth as an absolute royalty but only the right to litigate for that amount.

The magnitude of the operations under the 36 agreements before mentioned is impressive. The records show a total production to February 28, 1917, of $5,545,880, of which $4,851,046 has been paid over beyond recall to the claimants, and only $694,834 has been placed in escrow for the protection of the ultimate rights of the Government. If the equitable rule adopted by the court in the receivership cases had been followed, it is believed that not less than $3,000,000, instead of $694,834, would have been impounded. Receivership operations of similar properties in the California field during about the same period have resulted in a total production of $4,381,795, of which $3,785,247 has been impounded. The cost of these operations covering 71 wells ranges from 3 cents to 31 cents per barrel of oil, the average cost being 8 cents per barrel. The price for the lowest grade of crude oil at the wells posted by the Standard Oil Co. May 11, 1917, was 78 cents per barrel.

The rising price of oil tends to induce the drilling of new wells, and the additional operating agreements lately made or under negotiation are calculated to extend this field of operations. The corresponding loss to the Government through the continuance of the agreement system in its present form is therefore likely to be much greater in the future than it has been in the past. In this connection it may not be amiss to suggest that the needs of the present critical period of our national life call for increased vigilance on our part to protect the public interests and to conserve as well as utilize every element of the national resources.

I think the facts recited above demonstrate that the system of operating agreements under the act of 1914, as now conducted, is not fair to the Government and interferes with our working agreement of June 5, 1915, in its most important features. I believe you will readily conclude, as I do, that the need of an adequate remedy is imperative and urgent. In my opinion, there is but one proper remedy, and that is to place all these agreements on an equal footing with the receivership operations by requiring the entire proceeds of production beyond what is actually necessary for conservative operation to be impounded, and to dispose of the applications for patents with all possible dispatch. In the interest of effective cooperation between your department and mine for the protection of the rights of the Government in the withdrawn oil lands, I have to request that you take that course.

I beg of you, my dear Mr. Secretary, that you give to this matter prompt and personal attention.

Very sincerely, yours,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.

To that letter the Secretary of the Interior made reply on June 20, 1917, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 20, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I have your letter of June 2, relative to the agreements we have made under the act of August 25, 1914, with the California oil operators on lands outside of naval reserves embraced in mineral applications for patent, and have carefully noted its contents.

Your position is that inasmuch as the courts, on your petition, have caused to be impounded all of the proceeds of oil production less cost of operation, pending litigation, we should follow a like course in these contracts. You also intimate that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has delayed bringing to a prompt conclusion the hearings ordered by him in oil-land cases.

In the first place, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the facts, permit me to say that so far as I am aware every effort has been made to comply fully and in the best of faith with the cooperative understanding outlined in your letter of June 7, 1915, and the court cases being handled by Mr. Justice have been given precedence over the work of the Land Office, notwithstanding the resulting delay in the latter. Moreover, at the request of the Secretary of of the Navy and yourself, we have refrained from making any contracts or from interposing objections to bringing of suit on lands in naval reserves, though this was not included in the understanding above mentioned. The commissioner advises me that in no cases where hearings have been ordered has he advised or intimated the propriety of delay in holding hearings except in some 20 cases, which are also involved in pending suits in court, in which cases he was of the opinion that a double trial would doubtless be a useless duplication of work; on the contrary, the commissioner has at all times directed that the hearings proceed, as soon as the investigations were completed, as rapidly as possible, with due regard to the assistance necessary to be rendered in court cases. I find also that, becoming dissatisfied with the progress of the hearings in these cases, the commissioner under date of May 12 again gave very positive instructions to his chief of field division at San Francisco that these hearings must be pushed to conclusion, regardless of the detriment to other work, and the chief of field service proceeded to San Francisco to give the matter his personal attention.

As to the letter sent out by the commissioner suggesting to certain operators the desirability of their applying for and operating under agreements under the act of August 25, 1914, I will say that this was done at my direction, as a result of a report of the commissioner to the effect that there were a number of cases in which operations were being conducted on lands which had been reported adversely where there was neither an agreement nor a receiver. It was my thought that for the proper protection of the interest of the Government these people should be required to enter into agreements, or suits should be recommended.

As to the matter of drilling new wells on lands embraced in contracts, I know of none that have been put down without the consent of this department, and to remove any doubt on this point, special provision to that effect has been inserted in contracts recently made.

As to the three contracts referred to which were made on the basis of impounding the total proceeds less operating cost, suffice it to say that this department refuses to make any agreement unless all parties having or claiming any interest shall join in or waive objection to the contract; in these cases the adverse claimant refused to waive on any other condition, and it was the applicant's own proposition that the contracts be executed on this basis in preference to none at all.

As to the legislation recommended by the commissioner, I authorized Commissioner Tallman to give all help possible to the Senate Committee on Public Lands and representatives of your department and the Department of the Navy then in conference, with a view of reaching some adjustment which would permit of the development of our oil lands. The draft of amendment was not submitted to and approved by me, but I was and am desirous of seeing some reasonable and fair legislation enacted which will result in the development of our withdrawn and unused oil deposits and which will give equitable relief to oil claimants who in good faith and without fraud have expended large sums in the development of oil wells. As I have repeatedly stated, I have not assumed and do not now assume to say what policy should be followed as to the naval reserves. The Senate committee, after receiving Mr. Tallman's suggestion, adopted and recommended the same with a slight modification, but so far as I am advised this feature of the bill never came to a vote in either House

Now, as to the matter of the basis on which these agreements have been made, in the first place, Congress has been very fully informed as to everything we have done, and I have yet to hear any criticism from that source, except for the fact that in deference to yourself and the Secretary of the Navy I have refused to make contracts for lands in naval reserves, for which I have been severely criticised.

My views as to the general principle which should control in making these agreements have been repeatedly stated to you in previous correspondence and conferences. Your view, I take it, is that these operators should all be considered as willful trespassers, even before trial, and treated accordingly. I have not seen it that way. While it is true that the courts, on your application, have impounded the entire net proceeds in the hands of receivers pending litigation, in no case so far as I am aware has final judgment been rendered on the basis of a willful trespass. On the contrary, in the six consolidated cases (Civil 47; A–3 Equity; A–13 Equity; A–30 Equity; A–31 Equity, 232 Fed., 619) Judge Bean, in his opinion rendered May 1, 1916, held:

"* * * They thereupon, acting as prudent and careful men, consulted counsel learned in the law and were advised * * * the withdrawal order was invalid. * * * Acting on this advice, honestly and in good faith, without any intention of wronging the Government, they developed the properties, expending large sums of money in so doing, the aggregate in the six cases in question amounting to more than a million dollars. By their labor and expenditures they have demonstrated the mineral character of the lands and increased their market value from two or three dollars an acre to two thousand or twenty-five hundred dollars an acre. What was before a barren, arid waste is now demonstrated valuable mining properties with numerous oil-producing wells thereon, and that through the efforts and expenditures of the defendants. * * * The defendants were not willful looters of the public domain nor reckless trespassers thereon."

Also, in the McCutchen case, reported in 238 Fed. Rep., 575, it was held by Judge Bledsoe in his opinion of July 29, 1916:

"* * * There can be no valid claim, in my judgment, that the defendants herein were in any sense willful trespassers. Assuredly there is nothing in the facts developed to warrant that conclusion, and I know of no rule of law which could or should appeal to this court in equity which would have the effect of so adjudging them."

Also, in the Devils Den and Lost Hills cases, reported in 236 Fed. Rep., 973 (although the question of measure of damages was not there involved), Judge Bean in his opinion of October 4, 1916, said of the acts of the defendants:

"* * * The defendants, however, acting under the advice, no doubt, of learned counsel, have in good faith—at least with no apparent intention of defrauding the Government—expended large sums of money in improving and developing the property."

Moreover, as a practical matter in making these agreements, it is apparent that the measure of damages must be determined in advance; only the question of title and consequent damage or no damage is left to litigation, and there is little, if any, reason why one operator against whom proceedings have been directed should be treated differently from another on mere ex parte information. I think you will agree with me that it would be entirely impracticable to attempt to make a contract to impound all the proceeds subject to a provision that later on, after the hearing is held, this department should then presume to render a judgment on the measure and the amount of damage which the defendant should be required to pay in case the title is held to be in the Government. I have sought, therefore, to get for the Government under these contracts the same recompense for the use of these lands, in case title should be determined to be in the Government, that the Government would have received as the owner, in effect recompense on the basis of an innocent trespass. One-eighth is the ordinary commercial royalty. Bills passed by both Senate and House have been on that basis. The Government has received under these contracts the proportionate advantage arising from the increased price of oil; in some cases, notwithstanding the operator was under a long-time contract to sell his oil at a price which proved to be much lower than the market, we have nevertheless insisted on one-eighth of the market for the Government's portion. In this connection it should be clearly borne in mind that in the oil business more than in most any other, the cost of operation, after wells are down, and the cost of production, are two widely different factors.

As to the protests against these contracts by Mr. Justice, for the most part he has objected to any agreement at all, on the ground that an adverse report had been submitted by a special agent, wherefore a receiver should be appointed instead of making a contract. It is clear that the law was passed for the express purpose of authorizing me to make contracts in cases occupying exactly this status, and as I have indicated in a previous letter, a contrary course would be, upon my part, an attempt to repeal or disregard the act of August 25, 1914.

Aside from the matters above considered, I would think this an especially unfortunate time to cancel these agreements or impose a royalty on them upon the basis of all the yield excepting cost of operation, when the production in California is so much less than the consumption and the reserves are being drawn upon to the extent of so many thousand barrels per day. Such a policy would undoubtedly lead to a restriction of output.

So far as I am personally concerned, I should be glad to do anything possible to obviate criticism of the policy followed by your department, but after most thoughtful consideration I am so thoroughly convinced that the course we are following in this matter is right, and the public interest concerned is so large, that I am unable to see my way clear to comply with your request as to the general policy that should be followed. It may be that with respect to particular contracts we should increase the proportion set aside to satisfy the Government's claim but that will depend upon the facts in each specific case, to which we will give close attention.

Cordially, yours. FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The honorable the ATTORNEY GENERAL.

That letter was responded to by a letter from the Department of Justice, under date of July 14, 1917, taking up in some detail and answering the contentions made in the Secretary's letter, as follows:

JULY 14, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have received and carefully considered your letter of June 20, in answer to my letter to you of June 2, 1917, with reference to the operating agreements entered into by you with applicants for patents to withdraw oil lands in California and Wyoming under the act of August 25, 1914, in cases where charges of fraud or unlawful entry have been made against the applicants by special agents of the General Land Office.

I premised my observations with the opinion that the manifest purpose of the statute was to provide for operating agreements which would serve the purpose of receiverships for the protection of the properties pending your determination of title as between the applicants and the Government. You do not explicitly disagree with this proposition, though your refusal to place these agreements on an equal footing with receivership operations in similar cases necessarily implies such disagreement. I regard the act as not susceptible of any other construction than that which I have stated. No other construction has ever before been suggested by anyone to my knowledge. Even Senator PITTMAN a conspicuous exponent of the policy of liberality toward oil operators and who introduced this law, confirms my opinion. At a recent hearing on S. 45 before the Senate Committee on Public Lands, held June 16, 1917, he said (p. 107):

"I introduced the law, and I introduced it for the sole purpose not of benefiting the patentee in the matter at all but for the purpose of continuing the production of oil pending the litigation instead of having it tied up or worked under a receiver. * * * I think, as a temporary expedient, that it serves exactly the purpose of a receiver, that pending the determination of title as to whether the Government owns it or the claimant owns it, that it shall be operated as it would be under a receiver."

In my letter to you I attempted to show that the rule adopted by the courts in receivership cases of similar character in the same localities required the deposit of the entire proceeds of production less the cost of operation, and I contrasted this with the rule uniformly adopted by you requiring the deposit of but one-eighth of the gross production, regardless of the cost of operation and the value of the product. Referring to the figures showing the operation under both systems, I pointed out that your operating agreements, tested by the rule of the courts of equity, have already resulted in a possible loss to the Government of over $2,000,000, and that the rising price of oil, coupled with the indefinite continuance and extension of the present agreement system, may result in still greater losses in the future. I do not understand that you deny the correctness of my figures or controvert my conclusion.

In your letter you say:

"Your view, I take it, is that these operators should all be considered as willful trespassers, even before trial, and treated accordingly."

I have not expressed or held such a view. My position is that the rights of these operators against whom your special agents have made charges of fraud and unlawful entry should not be considered superior to the rights of the Government pending determination of the truth of the charges made against them. In my letter to you I said: "Very few, if any, of these claimants are entitled to special consideration. In most of the cases there can be no reasonable ground to believe that patents will ever be granted. In 15 of the 18 California cases special agents of the General Land Office have charged the claimants with fraudulent locations, the other 3 being charged with violating the withdrawal order. In all but 1 of these 18 cases hearings have been directed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in that 1 the charge is that the entry was illegal and also that the claimant was guilty of fraud. In the 18 Wyoming cases few hearings have been directed, although adverse reports have been made by the special agents. In most of the Wyoming cases delay in departmental action has been caused by collusive suits instituted in the State courts by pretended rival claimants. I understand that hearings are directed in cases where it has been determined prima facie, upon the application papers and the special agent's report, that the claimant is not entitled to a patent. Of such a claimant it is not unfair to say that he is prima facie a trespasser on the lands of the United States, and, in case of fraud, a willful trespasser. It certainly was not the intention of the law to reward trespass and fraud; yet I am constrained to say, the operating agreements which give to such claimants seven-eighths of the gross production are adapted to accomplish that result."

And again:

"Most of the operators under existing agreements are shown by the records of the General Land Office to be prima facie trespassers, and each agreement contains a provision (sec. 11) that upon a final denial of the application for patent—that is, upon a final decision that the applicant is a trespasser—the one-eighth deposit will be accepted in full and complete satisfaction of 'all claims for the United States for trespass' by such applicant on the premises during the period of the agreement."

My position is not that any of these applicants should be considered and treated as trespassers before trial, but that it is unjust to the Government to agree before trial that they shall have seven-eighths of the production in any event, and that the Government will accept one-eighth in full satisfaction of all claims for trespass in the event they are finally found to be trespassers.

You think it would be impracticable to apply the equitable rule to these agreements upon the assumption that this would require you "to render a judgment on the measure and amount of damages which the defendant should be required to pay in case the title is held to be in the Government." I see no necessity for the rendition by you of any judgment in any case other than that the title is in the claimant or in the Government. Having impounded the net proceeds pending the determination, the title thereto would vest on final judgment either in the claimant or in the Government.

You regard these operating agreements as giving to the Government, in case title should be determined to be in the Government, all that it would have received as the owner. In support of this you say that "one-eighth is the ordinary commercial royalty," and that "bills passed by both Senate and House have been on that basis." I understand that one-eighth is the ordinary commercial royalty in prospect leases on unproven territory where the lessee risks his money and labor in a purely speculative venture, and that leases on proven territory usually carry a much larger royalty or a bonus. The bills to which you refer illustrate this. They provide for prospecting permits, and, upon discovery, for a lease on one-fourth only of the area covered by the permit at one-eighth royalty, the other three-fourth to be leases by competitive bidding or other similar method.

You dispose of the protests made to these agreements by Mr. Justice on behalf of this department by stating that "for the most part he has objected to any agreement at all." I think I can safely say that no objection would have to be made by any representative of this department to any agreement if the agreement had been to operate the property, in the language of Senator PITTMAN, "as it would be under a receiver." My position is founded upon what seems to me to be a plain requirement of the law, and I am forced to assume the position I do with respect to these agreements because of the embarrassment which I encounter in the performance of my duty in the receivership cases by reason of your apparent departure from that requirement.

I note your statement that there has been no intentional delay in your department in disposing of these cases. The fact remains, however, that they are undisposed of. Some of them have been pending for more than three years. Judging the future by the past, many years may elapse before final decisions will be reached in all cases. Many of the claimants will doubtless use every endeavor to delay the proceedings in order to prolong an arrangement which operates so favorably to them. Meanwhile the Government will likely suffer a continuing and constantly increasing loss.

The increasing demand for oil is now inducing applications by these operators for permission to drill additional wells. The drilling of new wells on withdrawn lands outside of and not contiguous to the naval reserves might well be granted if the rights of the Government were properly safeguarded, but I should regard such new operations under the existing agreements as but an extension of a system likely to result in turning over to trespassers on lands of the United States a large portion of the fruits of their trespasses.

You regard the present as an especially unfortunate time to readjust these agreements upon the basis of receivership operations, because such a policy would lead to a restriction of output. I am unable to share this apprehension. If any claimant charged with fraud or unlawful entry should decline to operate upon a basis which is just and fair to both parties, the operations may be continued, and extended if necessary, by a receiver. In that event there would be impounded for the protection of the Government in most cases far more than the one-eighth now impounded under the terms of the agreements you are entering into with the claimants.

I hope that you will reconsider your determination not to comply with the request which I made of you in my letter of June 2, 1917.

Very sincerely, yours,

_____, Attorney General.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The Secretary answered this communication on July 25, 1917, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 25, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I am in receipt of your further communication of the 14th instant relative to the oil-land operating agreements entered into by this department under the act of August 25, 1914. I fail to find anything in this last letter not heretofore fully considered. It is evident that the only question in this matter is whether these oil operators, for the purpose of these contracts, shall be viewed and treated as innocent trespassers or willful trespassers. I stated in my former letter that I understood that it was your view that they should be treated as willful trespassers. You now disclaim any such view, but at the same time you want me to insist on an agreement whereby the operator, if he shall fail to gain title to the land, will not ony lose that with all the improvements and development he has put on it, but all the oil taken therefrom less the cost of operation after the wells are down and producing. To my mind that comes very near inflicting the penalty of a willful trespass. As indicated in my former letter, the courts have thus far taken an entirely different view of this situation.

You say that you see no necessity of my rendering any judgment other than that the title is in the claimant or in the Government. That would be very true under the kind of a contract which would be in accord with your views, for the reason that the damage would be arbitrarily fixed in advance as the entire production less operating costs, but if the damage is to be any less amount certainly that amount or measure must be fixed in the contract or the contract must provide for some other proceeding wherein the measure of damage will be fixed.

In handling this entire oil situation, which is an unfortunate one at the best, I have endeavored to take such action as would fairly protect and preserve the interests of the Government and at the same time deal fairly with the operators, and not dislocate and disturb more than absolutely necessary the conduct of a great industry of vital importance to the country as a whole.

In formulating the regulations and contract under the act of August 25, 1914, careful consideration was given to the question of the basis on which the deposits should be made for the protection of the interest of the Government, whether on the theory of a strictly willful trespass or that of an innocent trespasser or somewhere in between. It was apparent that with respect to the matter of knowledge and intent as involved in the question of liability for damages for trespass an entirely different situation is presented from that with respect to title, and different considerations may very properly be taken into account. We carefully considered the purpose of the legislation and the debates and reports in Congress. It appeared that the reason the act was passed was because the operators found they could not dispose of their product in the face of probable claims by the Government for damages without putting up security for the entire value of the product, which practice was evidently ruinous to the operators; manifestly the act would be of little advantage to anybody if the full amount of the proceeds had to be impounded, for the operator could do that without any legislation.

Reference to the reports and debates in Congress showed very clearly what the understanding was when the act was passed. While the bill was passed by the Senate without debate or amendment, it was the subject of a lengthy report by the House Committee on the Public Lands, in which it was stated:

"The actual method of working is thought to be that the Secretary will retain a sufficient portion of the proceeds of the oil to indemnify the Government in the event the title will finally be held to be adverse to the claimants, so that untold hardships may not follow. Some of the men developing in the California region have almost been driven to bankruptcy."

In the debate on the floor of the House, August 3, 1914 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 13201, 13202), the question as to whether the bill contemplated the impounding of all proceeds from these claims over the cost of operation or only of such a proportion as would equal a good royalty was squarely raised and discussed, as indicated by the following:

"Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not offer an amendment, and I shall not oppose the committee amendment, and yet I regret the bill is not in a somewhat different form. I have no very clear idea, and I doubt if the members of the committee, all of them, have a very clear notion, what the Secretary of the Interior would do under the bill in the matter of impounding the product of wells or the receipts from such products. What seems to me he ought to do is to impound such a proportion of the receipts from these wells as would equal a good royalty and retain that in event final decision as to title is against the claimant. What I fear is that the Secretary of the Interior might feel that, under the language of the bill, he was authorized and that it was his duty to impound the entire receipts.

"Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

"Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. And in case of an adverse decision, to retain the entire receipts, which in the case of extensive wells would mean bankruptcy to the claimant. Now, I hope the Secretary does not write that kind of an interpretation into the legislation, and I would like to have the view of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RAKER] on that point.

"Mr. RAKER. Why, the matter was thrashed out thoroughly before the committee. The officers of the Secretary of the Interior were present, and from the statement of the gentlemen from California, who were here when the legislation was under consideration, it was understood that the condition was such that these men could not now sell their oil because——

"Mr. MONDELL. I understand those conditions.

"Mr. RAKER. But on that very proposition, and that the Secretary of the Interior, under this bill, would retain what would be a fair royalty in proportion to the amount of money that had been expended, and holding that until a final determination was made. Then, if the Government wins, it takes that proportion of the oil, and it goes into that fund, and if it it is not in these two reserves goes into the fund provided for by law.

"Mr. MONDELL. This is an important matter, and I will say to my friends from California that two different people have written me in regard to it, asking me the same question—as to what portion of the receipts the Secretary is to impound. So the doubt does arise in the mind of one reading the bill, whether it was anticipated under any circumstances that the Secretary could impound the entire receipts of a well and hold them, providing the case was against the entryman. That would be a gross injustice.

"Mr. RAKER. It was intended that he could not do it.

"Mr. FERRIS. I think there is no question he has the power to do it, and I think there is no question but that he ought to have the power to do it, but I do not think he has any intention of doing it.

"Mr. MONDELL. Then you think he could retain the entire surplus?

"Mr. FERRIS. I do not think there is any question about it; and, even so, it would be better than it is now. The gentleman was the chairman of the committee, and knows about these things, and I think the judgment of the commissioner ought to be considered sufficient, and it read to me as if it were sufficient. But the Land Department does not so hold. These gentlemen have courageously spent their money in the oil wells of the West. They are tied up, and they will be ruined unless you do something for them. This bill makes a working arrangement where the Secretary of the Interior can preserve the rights of the Federal Government and permit them to go forward.

"Mr. MONDELL. I am in accord with the gentleman. I simply wanted it to be understood that the interpretation of the committee was that there was to be impounded an amount that would be equivalent to a fair royalty in these cases. I only wish I could prevail on the House to accept an amendment that would make it clear that only a fair royalty could be retained."

The bill was passed by the House with this understanding. The Senate accepted all amendments proposed by the House, and when the conference report was adopted by the House Mr. MONDELL stated, page 14047, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 20, 1914:

"One thing more. The bill as it passed the House is unfortunate, it seems to me, in that it leaves entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior whether he shall impound all of the product of the wells on the lands which may be brought within the provisions of the bill, or whether he shall impound a portion of those proceeds, such portion as would be a reasonable royalty. The gentlemen on the committee say that they understood that the Secretary will impound such proportion of the proceeds as would constitute a reasonable royalty. That would be the logical and reasonable and proper thing to do. That is what we hope the Secretary will do, but the Secretary has much broader power than that, and I fear that in some cases he will be importuned to take action which will not afford these people much relief. I trust that in carrying out the provisions of the law he will proceed upon the assumption that these people, having applied for title, while the matter is under consideration, may be allowed to operate freely and receive and keep all the oil or gas taken from the land except such portion of it as would make a fair and reasonable royalty if the application for title shall finally be denied. The fact is, however, that most of the people who can come under the provisions of the bill in its amended form are so clearly entitled to a patent that it should be granted without delay."

As early as January 7, 1915, the Senate Committee on Public Lands was advised of the procedure we were following under these contracts, as regards the proportion required to be deposited. (Hearings, H. R. 16136, p. 17.) Congress was again fully advised at the time of the joint conference of the Committees on Public Lands with representatives of the departments on H. R. 406 (see report, pp. 133–140), and official reports have stated just what has been done.

Even had there been no direct expression of opinion in Congress as to the basis upon which these contracts should be made, it is my judgment that the amount to be retained and impounded by the Government should be essentially on a royalty basis, but, as shown by the foregoing, it was clearly the intention and understanding of Congress that this interpretation should be placed upon the law that was enacted. Convinced as I am that my interpretation and administration of this act is in strict accord with its letter and spirit and with the intention and desire of Congress, I must repeat that while I am ready and willing to reconsider any specific case with the view to determining whether or not we are impounding the equivalent of a fair royalty, I can not see my way clear arbitrarily to require that all these contracts be changed so as to provide for the impoundment of the entire proceeds less operating expenses, in effect a cancellation of the contracts and a denial of the benefits contemplated by the act.

However, in view of your contention that my administration of this act may deprive the Government of large amounts of money, I am perfectly willing to join you in submitting the entire matter to the Senate and House Committees on Public Lands for such action as they may see fit to take.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.

In these letters these officials clearly expressed their respective views of the matter. The Secretary of the Interior adhering to his view that he was following the intent and the spirit of the law in making these agreements, and the Attorney General insisting that the agreements were too favorable to the operators and did not properly secure the interest of the Government in the land and its products.

I am not prepared to say that the Secretary of the Interior has changed his mind in the matter. I have not talked with the Secretary in regard to it, however. My personal opinion—if I may properly express an opinion in regard to a matter upon which I have no definite information—is that the Secretary has not changed his mind, but still adheres to the view he formerly held, and, in my opinion, that view was sound, reasonable, in harmony with the spirit of the law, and in the interest of the Government and the people. It gave the country oil when we needed it.

Quite recently, a month or more ago, the Secretary of the Interior informed the holders of these agreements that after a certain date the existing agreements would be canceled, and agreements made under which all the proceeds would be impounded except a sum sufficient to pay the expense of operating the wells. That was a month or more ago. I understand all but four of the operators in the Salt Creek field have notified the Secretary of the Interior that they can not enter into that kind of arrangement and operate the wells, that it would mean bankruptcy to them. The four who are able to operate are, I understand, people who are interested in the refining end of the oil business and able to secure a profit from the refining of the oil, or who are so situated financially that they can enter into these agreements and continue to do business on other sources of income.

It must be apparent to all that that sort of an arrangement favors the great refining interests. I am not disposed to question anyone's motives, but the effect of the action taken is to favor the refining interests, so far as they may be interested in these holdings, and to prevent the ordinary producer of oil from operating.

The average daily production of the wells in the Salt Creek field which were operating under these agreements was something over 5,000 barrels of oil a day. This oil will produce nearly 50 per cent of gasoline. So that the cancellation of these agreements has increased by 20 per cent the daily deficit in gasoline.

More than that, the men with whom these agreements were made had proposed to the Interior Department some months ago to drill 40 wells and have them drilled before cold weather set in. They were willing to agree to pay an increased royalty on that additional production. The production of these 40 wells would have gone far toward wiping out the daily deficit in gasoline. These gentlemen were willing to impound a larger royalty on the new production, but they could not afford to turn over to the Government all of their production on wells that cost from $20,000 to $40,000 to sink, equip, and connect. There is no capital to be had for that kind of venture. So the only reason why we are not getting from five to ten thousand barrels more oil per day from the Salt Creek fields in Wyoming is because the operators are told that they can not operate unless they stand all the expense, take all the chances, and impound the entire product of their wells. In this bill we are considering authority is given to spend $175,000,000 of the public money to develop power, but out yonder men are not allowed to produce a power product at their own expense.

At a time when our people are responding to the request to lay up all automobiles every Sabbath day, when we are compelled to shorten the use of gasoline everywhere, through the action of a department of the Government, thousands of barrels a day are kept from the market.

I shall not refer to the wholly unpardonable and unwarranted assault made on the Secretary of the Interior by a subordinate employee of the Attorney General's office in the hearings before the Public Lands Committee some months ago, further than to say that if he reflected the attitude of the Attorney General in the matter, then it is very clear who is responsible for this condition of affairs. I have no disposition to blame or criticize the Secretary of the Interior in the matter, though the action complained of is taken by his department.

It looks as though it was not the official charged with the administration of these affairs, but an official of the Government who has nothing to do with the issuance of patents or the execution of the act of August 25, 1914, who has determined the policy in these matters. Let us take the Attorney General's view of it and assume for the sake of argument that as a result of action by the Interior Department or suits brought by the Government these claims were eventually denied and the title to these lands were to remain in the Federal Government. Has anyone any notion that the Federal Government would by that reversion secure the benefit of the entire product of these wells? Why, the bills that have been passed by both the House and Senate and are now in conference provide for leases under which the Federal Government would secure as a royalty approximately the sums that were impounded under these agreements. No matter what happens, therefore, the Government is abundantly protected by the agreements which were made by the Secretary of the Interior, agreements which, in my opinion, the Secretary of the Interior would have continued in force if he had had his way about it. The Nation is losing the benefit of these wells, and in some cases, quite likely, water is running in on the sands, destroying oil values forever. At a time when the Nation stands in urgent need of oil to help carry on the war these influences are standing in the way and shortening and preventing perfectly legitimate production, needful and necessary to the winning of the war.

The Attorney General suggests to the Secretary of the Interior the advisability of operating, where titles are contested, under receiverships rather than under the agreements provided for in the act of August 25, 1914. I assume that the judicial department of the Government would not recommend that the Secretary ignore the action of Congress in this regard, though that would be the effect if this suggestion were followed. The Attorney General further expresses the opinion that the continuation of the agreements entered into by the Secretary tend to delay the final settlement and adjustment of the situation either through final decision as to the merits of the claims or the passage of pending legislation and adjustments thereunder. In my opinion there is nothing in the situation to justify such an opinion.

Not only are those affected by these agreements desirous of having the intolerable conditions of uncertainty ended, but all other claimants and operators on the public lands are like minded. The long delay in the settlement of the questions of title and in the enactment of legislation governing future operations has been an unmixed evil and has resulted in a very serious discouragement and curtailment of development at a time when an increased production of oil is one of the crying needs of the country.

The history of the Honolulu oil case in California would seem to indicate that responsibility for delay in final decisions in oil cases by the Interior Department does not rest with the Secretary of the Interior. If I am correctly informed after very thorough and exhaustive inquiry, investigation, and examination the Secretary was prepared to render final decision in that case, but the department of justice demurred. It was then agreed, so I am reliably informed, that the matter should be referred to the Hon. John W. Davis, who was recently appointed as our ambassador to Great Britain, and his opinion was to be accepted as final. That opinion was rendered, upholding the view and opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, but has not been accepted or acted upon.

Oil receiverships, which the Attorney General approved, have proven to be very costly, and it is perhaps not to be wondered at that the gentlemen receiving compensation as high as $10,000 a year in connection with those receiverships should be entirely content to continue to draw their salaries indefinitely. Final decisions and permanent settlements and adjustments naturally do not appeal to gentlemen so comfortably situated.

It is quite natural perhaps that officials and employees of the Attorney General's Office should acquire the proverbial viewpoint and habit of prosecutors and become more interested in winning their cases than in adjusting matters on the basis of an equitable consideration of the questions involved. It is perhaps natural that in their desire to make a record trifling irregularities in procedure, errors of judgment, or action in good faith and in accordance with the generally accepted interpretation of the law, against which some hair-splitting fine-spun legal question may be raised, should be magnified into willful, intentional fraud.

But the prosecution of land cases, oil or otherwise, on that theory can only be justified on the ground that it is the duty of the executive departments of the Government to nullify the purpose and intent of the land laws and to make them instruments of injustice and oppression rather than statutes for the development of the public lands and the transfer of title on the basis of equity and justice.

Meanwhile the country needs oil. It is as essential to the winning of the war as any single product I can think of. Energetic, resourceful, and enthusiastic men have taken desperate chances, are willing to continue to take these chances to increase oil development. Unlike many others who have been and are obtaining large and secure profits from Government supported and aided activities and industries they ask nothing but the opportunity to proceed in accordance with the spirit and intent of the law. They ask nothing except that the law shall not be construed against their operations in good faith, that they shall not be trapped, tricked, and ensnared by every hair-splitting interpretation that the ingenuity of well-paid prosecutors can devise. They ask the speedy settlement of and adjustment of their claims and an opportunity to produce oil for the good of the country in the meantime. They hope for permanent legislation, but they realize that if it is to be of any value in promoting development it must be fair and equitable and take the hazard of the enterprises into consideration. If these considerations can prevail, oil production so tremendously important to the country will continue. The policy now being pursued is not only imperiling private interests and injuriously affecting the prosperity of important communities but it is jeopardizing the winning of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, we have all listened with much profit to the interchange of views given here at this session and other sessions with regard to the gathering of the Nation's strength and power in the shape of water energy so that it might be utilized for the profit and the benefit of the industries of the country. That is one thought. Allied and associated with that is the thought of conservation at this particular time, and as a subdivision of that second thought comes the question of the equality of the division of the conservation, so that in conserving as in taxing there may be justice, and as something enlightening, illuminating, and refreshing, I submit, not the word of some Member but a message from a layman—something which will, I think, carry to us all a suggestion of an adjustment of the distribution of gasoline so that there may be content, harmony, and unity of purpose, and that will maintain the present good spirit among all classes of people. Therefore I ask the Clerk in my time please to read this article from a Detroit newspaper.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the article in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

IT'S ALL WRONG, MATES; IT'S ALL WRONG.

EDITOR THE DETROIT JOURNAL:

I am a small farmer. I own a little Ford, purchased second hand, and yet it means about all the joy wife and the kiddies and I get out of life. We like to drive over to see wife's folks after church and Sunday school or call on some friends we couldn't get to see otherwise. Sometimes we go to a lake and let the kiddies paddle in the water.

Now, here's the idea. We don't burn 4 gallons a week, Sundays and all. During the hot weather we could not enjoy being out, so we stayed at home. Then just as the cool days come and we plan on taking a little wrinkle out of our lives before the cold weather shuts us in, they put it up to our patriotism.

I say this is a rank injustice to the poor man. Tuesday while I was working all day in my bean field I counted nine big autos, any one of which might have cost more than I will ever spend during my life, and would burn more gas in one day than mine 'ole Ford would in a month, sailing by filled with joy riders.

Same way with the sugar. We get 2 pounds per person per month. That means no pastry; apples lying on ground going to waste. Only way we can have apple sauce is to can it, then open it, or use corn sirup. But when we go to town the bakery windows are filled with sweets. The candy stores were never so full—no limit. Soft drinks aplenty. But my poor wife can rack her brain using dope of all kinds.

Now, look here. You can't make a sweet-toned harp out of a wire fence, nor you can't make a patriot out of a greedy profiteer. But you can kill the purest love by injustice, and that's what these fool things are doing. I'll do without any sugar if the boys over there need it, and our allies. But don't give it to those who can afford to buy from bakeries and candy shops. I'll lock up my "Henry" until the Kaiser is cured if the rest will, but I'm sick and done with the sham stuff. We have a guy here near us who has done "big things," patriotically speaking; his wife spent her hours necessary to earn a cross for cap and apron in the Red Cross surgical dressing rooms—that is, I say, she spent her time there. I didn't say she worked—mostly gossiped or questioned other people's patriotism—but when their son was called for examination for the draft there was an awful wail and somehow, God only knows, he was put in for limited service. Yet they are called patriots. Rot!

Let's everyone stick to the real thing. Give the democracy stunt the limelight here at home and the poor man a chance. How many say "aye"?

E. R. BOSTWICK,
Vernon Township, Shiawassee County, September 11.

Mr. FOCHT. Now, Mr. Chairman, there you have the intelligent thought of an American citizen who will give all he has for his country, but who wants the burdens as well as the conveniences and pleasures of life equalized. As a tentative suggestion I would propose that during the gasoline shortage a card system be adopted that will have due regard for necessity and pleasure and that will treat rich and poor alike.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to make some observations on the so-called volunteer officers' retirement bill, the apparent object of which is to place men who retired to civil life at the end of the Civil War on the same basis as men who remained in the Regular Army. I do not mean men; I mean officers.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman has an honorable record as an enlisted man in the Spanish-American War. Can the gentleman see any reason why we should place volunteer commissioned officers on the retired list and discriminate against enlisted men who have just as good a record?

Mr. JAMES. I do not; and my friend, also a private in ninety-eight, will agree with me, I am sure.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If we are to have a volunteer officers' retired list, why should we not have a volunteer men's retired list?

Mr. JAMES. If the gentlemen who are advocating this bill are sincere in their contention, whenever they advocate a bill for the retirement of volunteer officers they should also provide the same way for the retirement of privates. The same section that they quote (sec. 5) takes care of them both, if they are right in their contention, but they evidently do not wish or intend to take care of private soldiers or noncommissioned officers.

I have received a good deal of literature the last few years from the press agent of a self-appointed committee to advocate this bill.

Without flattering the gentleman at all, I might say that he is an adept at omitting, twisting, and concealing the truth.

To further the bill he states that the resolve of the Continental Congress of 1780 is an argument, or rather precedent, in favor of the bill he advocates.

The truth of the matter is, as I will show later, that this resolve was to take care of, to use their own language, "by the foregoing arrangement, many deserving officers who must become supernumerary, and it is proper that regard be had for them."

He also claims that Webster made a great speech in favor of a similar bill. The truth of the matter is that he garbled the speech of Daniel Webster. If he had printed it all it would have shown that Webster was making a speech for the exact opposite kind of a bill.

To use part of Webster's own words—which the press agent wisely omitted—"It is objected that the militia have a claim upon us; that they fought at the side of the Regular soldiers and ought to share in the country's remembrances. It is known it is impossible to carry the measure to such an extent as to embrace the militia, and it is plain, too, that the cases are different."

He quotes part of Senate bill approved July 22, 1861, using only part of section 5 to back his claim. He claims that this wording is a sacred promise of Lincoln and Congress to take care of Volunteer officers the same as members of the Regular Army.

He uses these words: "That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth, shall in all respects be placed on the same footing as to pay and allowances of similar corps of the Regular Army."

He gives the impression that this is all of the language of section 5. If he had quoted it all it would have destroyed his case, as it would have shown that most of the article was about "forage," "horse and horse equipments," "subsistence," and so forth.

He further states that the act passed on July 25, 1861, was passed to take care of their case. He states this was for the purpose of curing some omissions in the act of July 22.

If one reads both acts he will find the reason for the amendment was that the first act provided that the President could ask for volunteers for "not exceeding three years and not less than six months."

The amended act reads, and "shall be mustered into the service for 'during the war.'"

The Senate evidently believed that this press agent had used all of the language, as the report shows that they follow his literature very closely—even to omitting essential parts of sections of this war legislation of 1861.

The best evidence that there was no "sacred promise" made in 1861 that was not fulfilled is the fact that a volunteer officer, Senator James Wilson was the chairman of the Military Committee in 1861, and was also chairman of the Military Affairs Committee when the war was over.

Another piece of evidence is that Hon. F. P. Blair, jr., also a volunteer officer, was chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House in 1861. He came back to the Senate after the war.

Other Members of the House and Senate in '61 were volunteer officers and came back to the House and the Senate after the war.

In addition, many of the Members of both Senate and House after the war were volunteer officers, and none of these gentlemen introduced any bill for the retiring of volunteer officers who had gone back to civil life.

The first piece of legislation along this line was nearly 40 years after the war, and then was not introduced by a volunteer officer or private.

Even then the bill was introduced "by request." This very modest bill only provided for retirement of officers who had lost an arm and a leg, or two arms or two legs, and so forth, and was never reported out of committee.

The next bill provided for the retirement of major generals and brigadier generals.

Then these gentlemen evidently believed that it was necessary to get more backing, so the bill was made liberal enough to take in captains, lieutenants, and so forth.

They lay great stress that the retirement bill of 1861 was intended to provide for them as well as the Regular Army officers.

If they read the debates, they will find that it was passed because some officers of the Artillery were, by age, gout, and other causes, unable to lead their men into battle.

And this bill was introduced by Senator James Wilson, chairman of the Military Committee, afterwards a volunteer officer and chairman of the Military Affairs Committee when the war was over.

Another section of the bill that they lay great stress on, when you examine the debate, only provided that upon occasions of ceremony volunteer officers were allowed to wear the uniform of the same rank they had in the Army. You will note that it was distinctly understood that it did not carry any other emolument.

The debate shows that an amendment was offered, so that privates who had seen several years' service should be allowed the same privilege, and was objected to on the grounds that in a few years there would be 50 or 60 privates wearing the uniform of a captain.

I am glad to know that the House Committee on Military Affairs has not seen fit to report out the bill. If one reads all the debate, and more especially the part of Webster's speech and the part of sections that the author of the literature has omitted, one will agree that this bill never should become a law.

RESOLVE OF 1780 TOOK CARE OF "SUPERNUMERARY" OFFICERS OF CONTINENTAL ARMY.

Some of the proponents of this piece of legislation seem to convey the impression that the Continental Congress of 1780 passed a similar bill.

The truth of the matter is that on account of a rearrangement of the Continental Army (or Regular Army) many "deserving officers" had become "supernumerary," and that it was "proper that regard be had to them."

The following from the debate in the Continental Congress at that time speaks for itself:

Congress took into consideration the report of the committee on the letters from Gen. Washington, and thereupon came to the following resolutions:

That the Regular Army of the United States, from and after the 1st day of January next, consist of 4 regiments of Cavalry, or light dragoons; 4 regiments of Artillery; 49 regiments of Infantry, exclusive of Col. Hazen's regiment, hereafter mentioned; 1 regiment of artificers.

Then it goes on to state how each regiment should be formed.

REFERRED TO GEN. WASHINGTON FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Then, after stating that clothing should be furnished, and so forth, we read the following:

And whereas by the foregoing arrangement many deserving officers must become supernumerary, and it is proper that regard be had to them:

Resolved, That from the time the reform of the Army takes place they be entitled to half pay for seven years in specie, or other current money equivalent, and also to grants of land at the close of the war, agreeably to the resolution of the 16th of September, 1776.

Ordered, That a copy of the foregoing arrangement of the Army be sent forward to the Commander in Chief for his opinion thereon; and that if there shall appear no material objection, the same be carried into immediate effect.

This shows very clearly that it applies not to volunteer officers, but to regular officers who had lost their commands by a rearrangement of the Regular (Continental Army) Army.

A little later the report was amended so as to provide, among other things—

That the regiments of Artillery be augmented to 10 companies each.

That, instead of four regiments of Cavalry, there be four legionary corps, consisting of four troops of mounted dragoons and two of dismounted dragoons, each consisting of 60 privates, with the same number of commissioned and noncommissioned officers to each troop as at present.

Then a little later we find the following:

(That the officers who shall continue in the service to the end of the war, shall also be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the time of their reduction.)

It will be observed that this also applies only to the Regular Army and does not refer to Volunteers or Volunteer officers in any way.

WHAT THEY CLAIM DANIEL WEBSTER SAID.

A bill to carry out the provisions of the report adopted by the Continental Congress of 1780 was introduced in Congress in 1828.

The proponents of this legislation quote the following from the speech of Daniel Webster on April 25, 1828:

This bill is intended for those who, being in the Army in October, 1780, then received a solemn promise of half pay for life, on condition that they would continue to serve through the war. Their ground of merit in that whensoever they joined the Army, being thus solicited by their country to remain in it, they at once went for the whole war; they fastened their fortunes to the standards which they bore, and resolved to continue their military service until it should terminate either in their country's success or in their own death. This is their merit and the ground of their claim.

The militia who fought at Concord, Lexington, at Bunker Hill, have been alluded to in the course of this debate in terms of well-deserved praise. Be assured, sir, there could with difficulty be found a man who drew his sword or carried his musket at Concord or Lexington or Bunker Hill who would wish you to reject this bill. They might ask you to do more, but never to refrain from doing this. Would to God they were assembled here and had the fate of the bill in their own hands. Would to God the question of its passage were to be put to them. They would affirm it with a unity of acclamation that would rend the roof of the Capitol!

The objects, then, sir, of the proposed bounty are most worthy and deserving objects. The services which they rendered were in the highest degree useful and important. The country to which they rendered them is great and prosperous. They have lived to see it glorious; let them not live to see it unkind. For me, I can give them but my vote and my prayers, and I give them both with my whole heart.

WHAT HE REALLY SAID WAS THAT IT WAS "IMPOSSIBLE TO EMBRACE THE MILITIA."

If the entire second paragraph had been given, we would have found out that Daniel Webster stated that bill applied only to those "regular soldiers" and did not embrace, as he said, "the militia," and as he also said, "It is plain, too, that the cases are different."

The paragraph as really given, and not garbled to suit a case for which it was not intended, reads as follows:

But then, again, it is objected that the militia have a claim upon us; that they fought at the side of the regular soldiers, and ought to share in the country's remembrances. It is known to be impossible to carry the measure to such an extent as to embrace the militia; and it is plain, too, that the cases are different. This bill, as I have already said, confines itself to those who served, not occasionally, not temporarily, but permanently; who allowed themselves to be counted on as men who were to see the contest through, last as long as it might, and who have made the phrase of "listing during the war," a proverbial expression, signifying unalterable devotion to our cause, through good fortune and ill fortune, till it reaches its close. This is a plain distinction; and although, perhaps, I might wish to do more, I see good ground to stop here, for the present, if we must anywhere. The militia who fought at Concord, at Lexington, and at Bunker Hill, have been alluded to, in the course of this debate, in terms of well-deserved praise. Be assured, sir, there could with difficulty be found a man who drew his sword, or carried his musket, at Concord, at Lexington, or Bunker Hill, who would wish to reject this bill. They might ask you to do more, but never to refrain from doing this. Would to God they were assembled here and had the fate of this bill in their own hands! Would to God the question of its passage was to be put to them! They would affirm it with a unity of acclamation that would rend the roof of the Capitol.

ANOTHER IMPORTANT PART OF WEBSTER'S SPEECH WHICH THEY OMITTED TO GIVE.

The proponents—or the authors of the propaganda—for this bill also omits another very important section of his speech, in which he shows that speech was in behalf of not only officers but all members of the Regular Army.

The part omitted reads as follows:

I would not and do not underrate the services or sufferings of others. I know well that in the Revolutionary contest all made sacrifices and all endured sufferings, as well as those who paid for services as those who performed it. I know that in the records of all the little municipalities of New England abundant proof exists of the zeal with which the cause was espoused and the sacrifices with which it was cheerfully maintained. I have often there read with absolute astonishment the taxes, the contributions, the heavy subscriptions, often provided for by disposing of the absolute necessaries of life, by which enlistments were procured and food and clothing furnished. It would be, sir, to these same municipalities, to these same little patriotic councils in Revolutionary times, that I should now look with most assured confidence for a hearty support of what this bill proposes. There the scale of Revolutionary merit stands high. There are still those living who speak of the 19th of April and the 17th of June, without thinking it necessary to add the years. These men, one and all, would rejoice to find that those who stood by the country bravely through the doubtful and perilous struggle which conducted it to independence and glory had not been forgotten in the decline and close of life.

Mr. Webster then closes his speech immediately with these words:

The objects, then, sir, of the proposed bounty are most worthy and deserving objects. The services which they rendered were in the highest degree useful and important. The country to which they rendered them is great and prosperous. They have lived to see it glorious. Let them not live to see it unkind. For me, I can give them but my vote and my prayers, and I give them both with my whole heart.

It is self-evident that Webster's entire speech was a bill for the Regular Army men—officers and privates as well—and not one for Volunteer officers.

LAW PROVIDED ONLY FOR REGULAR ARMY OFFICERS.

The law itself provides for only Regular Army men, and makes no distinction between privates and officers.

This bill became an act on May 15, 1828, and the part referring to "surviving officers of the Army of the Revolution in the Continental line" reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That each of the surviving officers of the Army of the Revolution in the Continental line who was entitled to half pay by the resolve of October 21, 1780, be authorized to receive, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of his full pay in said line according to his rank in the line, to begin on the 3d day of March, 1826, and to continue during his natural life: Provided, That under this act no officer shall be entitled to receive a larger sum than the full pay of a captain in said line.

It takes a long stretch of imagination to say this law was intended to take care of "volunteer" officers.

If one will read the entire debate at that time, as I have, he will note that there were several who wished to place the Volunteers (militia) on the same basis as the Regulars, but it was plainly shown that the Continental Congress of 1780 only intended to take care of the Regulars, as the speech of Mr. Webster shows.

SENATOR HAYNE ALSO STATES THAT BILL WAS FOR BENEFIT OF CONTINENTAL ARMY OFFICERS.

The following extract of a speech by Mr. Hayne, of South Carolina, expresses the same sentiments as Mr. Webster:

In endeavoring, Mr. President, to do justice to the conduct of the Regular Army, let it not be supposed I would do injustice to the militia. Sir, I would not if I could; and, thank God, I could not if I would detract from their exalted merits in the same contest. They did all that irregular troops could do. They achieved much and they suffered more. Marion, "the old fox" of the South, and Sumter, its "game cock" (names won by their skill and valor from a reluctant enemy), and Pickens, too, sir, whose valor led him to perform heroic deeds, which his modesty almost blushed to acknowledge, and Shelby and Campbell, and many others whom I could name, all, all justly entitled themselves to the lasting gratitude of their countrymen. They kept up the spirit of resistance among the people at a time when the State was overrun by the enemy. They kept hope alive and cherished that sacred fire, which, on the arrival of Greene with his army, blazed out into a fierce and consuming flame which drew back and finally destroyed the enemies of our country. But, sir, if these gallant men were now here, and they were called upon to explain the different parts performed by the militia and the Regulars in the memorable campaign of 1781 they would tell you (or I have read the history of the Revolution in vain) that without the army of Gen. Greene the victory could not have been achieved; that the Regular Army, being constantly in the field, served as a rallying point for the militia and afforded them the means of acting with effect against the common enemy. If those men were now here to decide the question now before this House, to determine whether the surviving officers of the Army who served to the end of the war are not peculiarly entitled to an honorable provision for their old age, my life upon it, sir, they would be found, like the venerable Senator from Maryland, the warmest advocates of this bill.

MR. DRAYTON EXPRESSES THE SAME SENTIMENTS.

In the House Mr. Drayton said in part:

I would not, by any means, have it understood that I am adverse to the pretensions of other officers and other soldiers of the Revolution.

The same sentiment runs all through the debates in 1828 in both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

WHAT THEY CLAIM THE WORDING OF SECTIONS 5 AND 6 IS.

According to literature circulated by a self-elected committee, apparently, to promote the passage of this piece of legislation, they state as follows:

[Act of May 25, 1861; act of July 22, 1861; approved July 22, 1861.]

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth, shall in all respects be placed on the same footing, as to pay and allowances, of similar corps of the Regular Army.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any volunteer who may be received into the service of the United States under this act, and who may be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to the benefits which have been or may be conferred on persons disabled in the regular service. * * *

They claim by the above language that this means that Congress meant to place Volunteer officers—they say nothing of privates—on the same basis as Regular Army officers.

Very wisely they do not quote all of section 5 and they omit part of section 6. If one reads the entire section 5, then he will readily understand why they neglected to show that a very essential part of section 5 had been omitted.

It appears that the Senate committee took it for granted that these gentlemen had quoted the entire section, because on page 1 of their report (Rept. No. 449, 2d sess. 65th Cong.) they use the exact language that I have just read.

THE REAL WORDING OF SECTION 5.

If one will read General Orders, No. 49, War Department, issued at Washington August 3, 1861, by The Adjutant General, he will see that the proponents of this legislation have omitted a very important part of section 5.

The whole section reads as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates organized as above set forth shall in all respects be placed on the same footing as to pay and allowances of similar corps of the Regular Army: Provided, That the allowances of noncommissioned officers and privates for clothing, when not furnished in kind, shall be $3.50 per month, and that each company officer, noncommissioned officer, private, musician, and artificer of cavalry shall furnish his own horse and horse equipments and shall receive 40 cents per day for their use and risk, except that in case the horse shall become disabled or shall die the allowance shall cease until the disability be removed or another horse be supplied. Every volunteer noncommissioned officer, private, musician, and artificer who enters the service of the United States under this act shall be paid at the rate of 50 cents per day in lieu of subsistence, and if a Cavalry volunteer 25 cents additional in lieu of forage for every 20 miles of travel from his place of enrollment to the place of muster—the distance to be measured by the shortest usually traveled route—and when honorably discharged an allowance at the same rate from the place of his discharge to his place of enrollment, and in addition thereto if he shall have served for a period of two years or during the war if sooner ended the sum of $100: Provided, That such of the companies of cavalry herein provided for as may require it may be furnished with horses and horse equipments in the same manner as the United States Army.

One can readily see why the proponents of this legislation in their literature did not quote the entire section. One can readily see that the above section does not promise in any way any "retirement" to volunteer officers; neither, if one reads the debates on this bill, can he find a single word about the "retirement" of volunteer officers.

WHAT SECTION 6 REALLY SAYS.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any volunteer who may be received into the service of the United States under this act, and who may be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to the benefits which have been or may be conferred on persons disabled in the regular service; and if the widow, if there be one, and if not, the legal heirs of such as die or may be killed in service, in addition to all arrears of pay and allowance, shall receive the sum of $100.

By reading the latter part of the section one can readily see that this section—taken in its entirety—is no argument in favor of "retirement," and one can easily understand why they did not quote the entire section.

The above bill was introduced in the special session of Congress on July 5, 1861, by Senator James Wilson, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Military Committee, and was known as Senate bill 1. This bill was afterwards merged with House bill 28.

SENATOR WILSON, CHAIRMAN OF MILITARY COMMITTEE, AFTERWARDS A VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

Later, in the year 1861, Senator Wilson "raised and commanded" the Twenty-second Massachusetts Volunteers.

The best evidence that the bill did not intend to provide that volunteer officers were to be placed upon the retired list the same as Regular Army officers, or Regular Army officers who were temporarily in command of volunteer commands, is the fact that upon his return to Congress—he never resigned his seat—is the fact that although he introduced Senate bill 1 and was a volunteer officer himself, he never introduced a bill along the lines of the present bill in Congress, neither did he ever make a speech in favor of such a bill.

CONGRESSMAN F. B. BLAIR, JR., ALSO A VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

The one who looked after the bill in the House was Frank B. Blair, jr., of Missouri, who also served in the Civil War as a volunteer officer.

The association claims that this bill—Senate bill No. 1—is an argument in favor of their bill.

They also claim that President Lincoln and the Congress of that time made them a sacred promise, and that the present Congress ought to live up to the promises made in 1861.

NO SACRED PROMISE ON PART OF CONGRESS.

One of the best arguments that there never was such a promise are the following facts:

1. Senator Wilson, author of the bill—Senate No. 1—was a volunteer officer, and although he was in Congress from 1861 to 1873, never introduced such a bill, nor made a speech in favor of any such bill.

2. Congressman Blair, also a volunteer officer, upon his return to the Capitol did not introduce such a bill, nor make a speech advocating such a bill.

3. When one reads all of section 5, he will note that it applies more especially to "horse and horse equipment," to "subsistence," to "companies of Cavalry," and that "each company officer should furnish his own horse" than it does to anything else.

It takes a man with a remarkable stretch of imagination to claim that a section referring to allowance for "clothing" and allowance for "forage," and so forth, can ever be construed into a law for "pension" or "retirement."

REFERENCE TO OFFICERS FROM THE REGULAR ARMY TEMPORARILY ASSIGNED TO VOLUNTEER COMMANDS.

In the debate in the Senate, the following refers to those officers of the Regular Army who were temporarily assigned to Volunteer regiments or commands:

Mr. NESMITH of Oregon. Under these circumstances, and in view of the facts before us, a necessity exists for placing men in command who are competent. Under the present arrangement of appointing citizens to high military command, a man who never saw a day's service may be selected for the position of major general. He, as a matter of course, ranks all brigadier generals who are in the field under him, no matter how much experience these brigadier generals may have had in the late war with Mexico, or in our last war with Great Britain; no matter if they have served for 50 years. They may be all Napoleons or Cæsars; they may have all the perfection it is possible to attain in military life; and yet some lawyer or other professional man may be selected as major general and placed over them to command them and to lead them and the Army to destruction and disgrace.

I see no argument in this speech of Senator Nesmith that would warrant anyone in saying that Senate bill No. 1 was intended to take care of those mentioned in the present bill, which has recently passed the Senate.

"BETTER TO ALLOW OFFICERS IN THE ARMY TO ACCEPT COMMISSIONS IN VOLUNTEER REGIMENTS."

Senator Wilson then takes the floor and says in part:

I shall vote most cheerfully for the proposition made by the Senator from Oregon. I think it is a wise one, and I beg leave to say that it is in perfect harmony with the policy I have advocated since the commencement of this war. I thought, in the beginning, that it would be better to allow officers of the Army to accept commissions in Volunteer regiments, and I so advised the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General.

SENATOR SHERMAN EXPRESSES THE SAME IDEAS.

Senator SHERMAN of Ohio. I simply desire to point out an inaccuracy that probably the Senator from Oregon would like to correct. The amendment as it stands would exclude all the officers of the new regiments. Some of the finest officers of the Regular Army are in the new regiments. The amendment, as it now stands, would exclude all those officers.

MR. BLAIR AGREES WITH THE ABOVE SENTIMENTS.

In the House, the following on page 149, Congressional Globe, July 16, 1861, by Mr. Blair, of Missouri, explains itself:

The bill also provides that these Regular officers who have been appointed in these new regiments may, at the end of the war, return to their own regiments in the Regular Army with the rank, pay, emoluments, allowances, and promotions to which they would be entitled if they had remained in their own regiments.

ONLY INTENDED TO TAKE CARE OF REGULAR OFFICERS TEMPORARILY WITH VOLUNTEER REGIMENTS.

If one reads the debates of the House and Senate at that time, he can see that it was the intention of Congress to only take care of those men who were temporarily transferred from their own commands to Volunteer regiments or commands, and so worded that they would be placed at no disadvantage with other officers who stayed in their own regiments or commands.

MR. BLAIR EXPRESSES WHAT AMENDMENT WAS INTENDED TO COVER.

A little later Mr. Blair explained to the House the effect of the amendment offered by Senator Nesmith, of Oregon, about which I spoke a few minutes ago. He said as follows:

The amendment reported by the committee to the bill of the Senate is substantially the bill passed the other day by the House and differs from the bill of the Senate in the particulars in which the House bill was amended here the other day except in one or two features. The committee this morning ingrafted into the substitute a provision giving authority to the President to transfer major and brigadier generals from the Regular Army to the volunteer forces, to resume their positions at the expiration of the war in the Regular Army as if no transfer had taken place. We also provide that the families of soldiers in the Army may, with their consent, draw a portion of their pay, as is now the fact in the Navy.

REGULAR ARMY OFFICERS TO "RESUME THEIR POSITIONS AT EXPIRATION OF WAR."

This is still further evidence that it was only intended to take care of those soldiers of the Regular Army who were assigned to volunteer commands so that they could "resume their positions at the expiration of the war in the Regular Army as if no transfer had taken place," and that it was not the intent to take care of men who left civil life to go into the Army and who left the Army to go back into civil life.

SENATOR WILSON INTRODUCED SENATE BILL NO. 1 AND NO. 2 AS WELL.

On the same day as he introduced Senate bill No. 1, Senator James Wilson also introduced Senate bill No. 2.

OFFICERS TO "RESUME THEIR POSITIONS IN THE REGULAR ARMY."

The following, at the end of section 7, is additional evidence that none of this legislation was intended to provide "retirement" for men who left the Army and went back to civil life:

Provided, That all the officers of the Regular Army who have been or may be attached or assigned to duty for service in any other regiment or corps shall resume their positions in the Regular Army and shall be entitled to the same rank, promotion, and emoluments as if they had continued to serve in their own regiments or corps.

The above was added to the amendment of Senator King, which read:

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall cause regiments, battalions, and companies to be disbanded, and officers, noncommissioned officers, and musicians to be discharged, so as to reduce the Military Establishment as is provided by the next preceding section.

SENATOR HARRIS EXPLAINS REASON FOR AMENDMENT.

Senator Harris immediately said the following:

I do not propose to discuss this question. If Senators think fit so to modify this bill, of course, it is not for me to attempt to resist it; but I will say that I am surprised that the Senate should strike what seems to me so fatal a blow to this measure of the administration. I can but think that Senators have failed to consider the effect of the proposition that has been made by my colleague. It is very clear to my mind that the officers of the Army who are to be commissioned in these new regiments, and whose presence in these regiments is indispensable to give them efficiency, in my judgment, can never be induced to accept those commissions if this bill contains these provisions. Will any officer of the Army surrender his present position and take a commission in one of these new regiments, with the understanding expressed on the face of the bill that he is, at the end of this controversy, to be discharged from the service and go into retirement? Is it not very clear that we, by means of this provision, are to exclude from these new regiments every officer of the present Army? It seems to me that Senators have not considered the effect of the vote that has just been taken. If they have I have no more to say. For myself I think it fatal to the measure.

WHAT BECOMES OF "REGULAR ARMY OFFICERS" AFTER WAR?

The following by Senator Doolittle also explains why the amendment was added to section 7:

I desire to ask a single question. I understand that, by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from New York, these regiments are to be mustered out of service six months after the necessity for them ceases to exist. The question I would ask is, What becomes of the officers who go into these regiments appointed from the Regular Army. Do they go out of service with the regiments? If so, ought not some provision to be inserted in the bill by way of inducing officers of the Regular Army to go into these new regiments, to preserve to them in some way their right as officers in the Army? Otherwise, the new regiments will not be filled up with any of the officers from the Regular Army. Is there any provision of that sort?

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE REPORT STATES OFFICERS REGULAR ARMY TO RESUME THEIR POSITIONS.

The following report, by Mr. Frank Blair, jr., on page 273 of the Congressional Globe of July 29, 1861, also explains itself:

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

I desire to make a report from a committee of conference. The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. N. 2) to increase the present Military Establishment of the United States, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its amendments to the bill of the Senate, except section 8, and agree thereto with the following amendments:

Page 4, section 6, line 8, after the word "reduce," strike out as follows: "in such manner and to such extent as Congress may direct" and insert in lieu thereof "to a number not exceeding 25,000 men, unless otherwise ordered by Congress."

Page 5, at the end of section 7, add the following: "Provided, That all the officers of the Regular Army who have been or may be attached or assigned to duty for service in any other regiment or corps shall resume their positions in the Regular Army, and shall be entitled to the same rank, promotion, and emoluments, as if they had continued to serve in their own regiments or corps."

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the eighth section of the amendment of the House and agree thereto.

HENRY WILSON,
J. H. LANE,
HENRY M. RICE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
FRANCIS P. BLAIR,
R. MALLORY,
A. B. OLIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHAIRMAN BLAIR EXPLAINS INTENT OF SECTION 5.

In addition, Mr. Blair said as follows:

Another amendment agreed upon by the committee of conference is an addition to the seventh section of the Senate bill of a part of the seventh section of the House bill, requiring that all the officers of the Regular Army who have been or may be attached or assigned to duty for service in any other regiment or corps shall resume their positions in the Regular Army, and shall be entitled to the same rank, promotion, and emoluments, as if they had continued to serve in their own regiments or corps.

The committee of conference also agreed to the eighth section of the amendment of the House, which provided that the recruiting of these 11 new regiments should be placed in charge of officers appointed for the new regiments from civil life; and that, in the meantime, the officers of the Regular Army should not be employed in recruiting, but should be employed actively in the field.

Such is the substance of the recommendations which the committee agreed to present to their respective Houses.

MR. LOVEJOY WANTS TO KNOW WHAT BECOMES OF REGULAR ARMY OFFICER TEMPORARILY TRANSFERRED.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the officers of these 11 regiments who are not transferred from the Regular Army are to be continued or are to be removed at the end of the war?

Mr. BLAIR of Missouri. The Military Establishment of the Government, with this addition, will amount to 40,000 men; but the bill requires that the number shall be reduced at the close of the war to 25,000 men. As a matter of course some of the officers will be retired; but it is provided that such officers as have been taken from the Regular Army and placed over these new regiments shall not be retired, but shall resume their old places in the Army, with the rank, promotion, and emoluments they would have been entitled to had they continued in their own regiments during the war.

The President is required to disband the regiments or battalions or companies in order to reduce the Army to a number not exceeding 25,000.

Mr. LOVEJOY. And that will discharge a number of officers.

Mr. BLAIR of Missouri. As a matter of course.

NO LAW RETIRING OFFICERS.

The following, a little later in the debate by Mr. Kellogg of Illinois and Mr. Blair, explain themselves:

Mr. KELLOGG of Illinois. I desire to ask the committee if there is any provision for retiring the brigade, field, and staff officers of that portion of the Army that is not to be reduced at the expiration of the war, or whether when the war shall have closed we shall have upon our hands an army of brigadier generals and staff officers sufficient in number to command the entire Volunteer corps? What I desire to know is, whether, after we have retired the soldiers, we are to have an army of officers almost equal to the number of soldiers quartered upon the Government and receiving their pay when we have nothing for them to do?

Mr. BLAIR of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows as well as I do, and I suppose every gentleman upon this floor knows, that all these brigadier generals and major generals who have been appointed to command the Volunteer Army will be reduced at the end of the three years' term of enlistment, which is the longest term for which they can serve without further action by Congress. As to the additions made of brigadier and major generals and their staffs, by this bill they will have to be provided for by additional legislation.

Mr. KELLOGG of Illinois. That is the very point to which I wished to call the gentleman's attention, and now I understand that there is no law retiring that class of officers.

Mr. BLAIR of Missouri. None at all.

Mr. KELLOGG of Illinois. That is all I desired to know.

"WHEN YOU BRING MEN INTO THE ARMY FROM CIVIL LIFE—THEY CAN GO OUT WITHOUT DIFFICULTY."

The following by Senator Wilson—in the course of the debate—chairman of the Military Committee, afterwards a Volunteer officer, also explain themselves:

The Senator says that I remarked that if these regiments were to be officered by civilians, we could dismiss them at the end of three years. So we could; and work no particular injury, for this reason: By organizing these 11 regiments, and enlisting the men for three years, and appointing the officers from civil life, we simply make 11 regiments of Volunteers—nothing more, nothing less; and when you bring men into the Army from civil life, if you tell them their commissions are to run only for three years, they can go out of the Army without any difficulty, and without any injustice. But, sir, in order to make these new regiments efficient, the Government has adopted the plan—and I believe it to be a wise one—of putting in every one of these regiments 27 officers from the line of the Army—men of culture, men of experience, men fitted to make these regiments at once veteran troops.

The Senator asks why they are better than the Volunteers. Does not the Senator see why they are better? You have appointed 11 colonels for those regiments. Nine of those colonels, I think, are taken from the Army. One of them is a brother of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman], a man educated, I think, at West Point—a man who has served the country, a gentleman acknowledged by military men to be a man of great capacity, who is at the head of a brigade over the river to-day. Then, sir, you have taken for colonels 10 out of 11 men trained to the Army, and who have served their country in the public service. Take your list of lieutenant colonels and majors, and there you find men who are officers of the Army. Open your list of captains and of first lieutenants, and you will see about half of them taken from the Army. Would not a regiment thus organized, led by experienced and brave officers, be incomparably better at the end of a few days than a regiment raised in Massachusetts, or in Iowa, or New York, with not an officer, perhaps, trained in military affairs in the ranks of the regiment? You make these regiments at once, in the course of a very few days, good troops, to be relied on in all emergencies.

SENATOR LANE, VOLUNTEER OFFICER, MEXICAN WAR, EXPLAINS SECTION.

The following by Senator Lane, who served in the Mexican War as a colonel of Volunteers, also explains the reason—and the only reason—why amendment was added to section 7:

I suppose there is no Senator on this floor who would be willing to induce the officers of the Regular Army to enter the new regiments with the understanding that they were to leave the profession of their lives when this trouble closes. That is the proposition of the honorable Senator from New York. The distinguished Senator from Iowa proposes to sugar-coat the pill of the Senator from New York by saying to these officers of the old Army, "If you will accept commissions in the new, we will at the close of the war return you to the rank that you now hold in the old Army"; that is, sir, we will take a first lieutenant in the old Army and advance him in that Army for his gallantry and courage, perhaps, to a brigadier generalship; we will take a second lieutenant of the old Army and transfer him to the new, and by his gallantry and courage he is advanced in the new regiments to a brigadier generalship. After the war closes the Senator from Iowa proposes to bring back the brigadier general in the new regiments to the position of first or second lieutenant in the old. I do hope, Mr. President, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York may not be adopted.

Section 7 provides that officers of the Regular Army shall resume their positions:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall cause regiments, battalions, and companies to be disbanded, and officers, noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates to be discharged so as to reduce the Military Establishment, as is provided by the preceding section: Provided, That all of the officers of the Regular Army, who have been or may be detached or assigned to duty for service in any other regiment or corps, shall resume their positions in the Regular Army, and shall be entitled to the same rank, promotion, and emoluments as if they had continued to serve in their own regiments or corps.

WHAT SECTION 8, SENATE BILL NO. 2, REALLY SAYS.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the enlistments for the regiments authorized by this act shall be in charge of the officers detailed for that purpose who are appointed to said regiments from civil life; and that in the meantime the officers appointed to the same from the Regular Army shall be detailed by the commanding general to such service in the Volunteer regiments now in the field as will, in his judgment, give them the greatest military instruction and efficiency; and that the commanding general may, in his discretion, employ said officers with any part of the Regular forces now in the field until the regiments authorized by this act shall have been fully recruited, and detail any of the officers now in the Regular Army to service with the Volunteer regiments now in the field, or which may hereafter be called out, with such rank as may be offered them in said Volunteer regiments, for the purpose of imparting to them military instruction and efficiency.

Approved, July 29, 1861.

SENATE BILL NO. 3 INTRODUCED THE SAME DAY AS SENATE BILLS 1 AND 2.

Senator Wilson also introduced Senate bill No. 3 on the same day as the others, and part of this bill is quoted by some of those advocating this piece of legislation—Townsend-Raker bill—as evidence that Congress at that time intended to provide "retirement" for men who left the Army to go back to civil life.

BILL NOT TO TAKE CARE OF MEN WHO RETURNED TO CIVIL LIFE.

If one reads the debates and the law he will find the exact opposite.

The following by Senator John Sherman, one of the Senate conferees, explains itself:

I agree entirely with the Senator from Vermont as to the question of paying retired officers; but we had either to leave these officers on full pay in the Army and Navy during this war—or, in other words, to defeat this proposition for a retired list—or else accept it as it is. It simply adds to the rates fixed by the Senate, a dollar and twenty cents a day. I should have much preferred it if they had said a dollar and twenty cents a day, and said nothing about rations; but the legal effect is the same.

Senator COLLAMER. I ask the gentleman if he thinks it is the same? We have been raising the ration to-day, I believe, in this very bill. The commutation keeps growing with the ration.

Senator SHERMAN. I beg pardon of the Senator; he is mistaken. The commutation of the ration stands precisely as it did before; but where the ration is dealt out in kind, a few more articles are given. The commutation of the ration is the same fixed by law—30 cents a day.

I quote the following extracts from speeches made by Senator Wilson and Senator Hale, which explain themselves.

REAL REASON FOR RETIREMENT—OFFICERS OF ARTILLERY UNABLE TO GO INTO BATTLE.

It would appear from the speech of Senator Wilson as if the real reason for a retirement bill at that time was not a "sacred promise of Lincoln"—or of Congress—but because "four regiments of Artillery, the most important part of the Army," were unable to go into battle because "not one of these colonels, owing to their age or infirmities," was capable of leading his men.

The following from the speeches of Senator Wilson and Senator Hale explain themselves:

CONGRESS DID NOT INTEND TO TAKE CARE OF MEN WHO RETURNED TO CIVIL LIFE.

The following extracts from speeches made on Senate bill 44 are also additional evidence that Congress did not intend to take care of men who left civil life to go temporarily into the Army and then return to civil life.

The Senator who introduced this bill was Senator James Wilson, chairman of the Military Committee, who, as I have said, became a Volunteer officer himself. He therefore can not be accused of being prejudiced against Volunteer officers.

SENATOR WILSON, A VOLUNTEER OFFICER, EXPRESSES HIS OPINION OF SOME VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

Senator Wilson says as follows:

The proposition, Mr. President, is certainly a very plain and simple one. I think it ought to be sustained and become the law of the land. The good of the country, if not the salvation of the country, requires it. We have summoned into the field a vast force of Volunteers; we are to call into the field many more, for we have authorized the President to call into the field 500,000 men. That force will make 500 regiments. The fact is, and no man can deny it, that some of the officers, both field and company officers, that have been appointed are wholly unfit to command or lead men into any battle field. The conduct of some of the officers in this city during the past 90 days has been discreditable in the extreme. They have demoralized the corps to which they are attached. I have seen regiments come into this city and stand for hours in a burning sun or in storms of rain without provisions, without comforts of any kind, while some of their officers were gathering around the hotels and spending their time in eating good dinners and drinking champagne. I have visited the camps about this city; I have seen the sufferings of the men, enough to make one's heart ache, through the neglect and utter incompetency of some field and company officers. Sir, the fruits of this conduct are now before us. The utter rout the other day is only the legitimate fruit of the incapacity of many of the field and company officers connected with the Volunteers. In my judgment the time has come—and it is a duty that rises above all personal considerations—to weed these men out of the Army at the earliest possible moment. The idea of trying them by court-martial is simply absurd. The cases demanding action are too many, and the hours are too precious, for court-martial. Most of the field and company officers of the Volunteers are loyal, brave, devoted. They are actuated by lofty motives, and ever ready to give their time and their blood to the cause of their country; but some men, utterly unfitted for their positions, have received commissions. Such men should be forced from positions they do not or can not fill.

"TIME TO REMEDY EVILS," SENATOR WILSON STATED.

A little later he said as follows:

What I wanted to say to the Senate was that the men whom we have summoned into the field have in many cases been officered by incompetent men, and not only incompetent men but men whose conduct has been such as to reflect disgrace upon themselves, upon their commands, and upon the country. Why, sir, there are regiments in the service that everybody knows, who knows anything about the subject, have been demoralized by the conduct, inefficiency, or neglect of their officers. Sir, these facts are before the country, and I say the time has come to remedy the evils, if they can be remedied.

SENATOR WILSON CLAIMED "MANY OF THESE MEN OUGHT TO LEAVE THE SERVICE."

A little later Senator Wilson said:

Now, sir, that many of these men ought to leave the service nobody can doubt. The idea of ever organizing an army and leading on to the field regiments and companies under men who have not yet joined their regiments up to this hour is absurd. Why, sir, you have only to go to the camps and the streets and you find men strolling about, not knowing where their captains or their colonels are. You find colonels and captains and officers strolling about your hotels that have not gone to the places where they belong. I say the time has come to arrest this thing. I go further, and I say that the time has come to organize the forces that come into this city into brigades and to insist that there shall be daily squad drills, company drills, and battalion drills; and that the brigades shall daily, or at least three or four times a week, be brought together and learned to cooperate. In your battle—I will not call it a battle—your series of skirmishes the other day, in which there was evinced as much bravery as was ever displayed on this continent—on that occasion, the very fact that the men had not been brigaded until within a few days and their officers had not learned to cooperate, prevented any large, powerful, and concentrated movements; and to-day, sir, while you have regiments lying all around you, they are not brigaded, not organized. Regiments are lying around—some of them doing nothing here; in some cases through the ignorance of their officers and in others because of their neglect of duty. I do not reproach men for their inexperience, but I do reproach them for neglecting their duties.

"SOME OF THE OFFICERS DESERTED, ABANDONED, AND OUTRAN THEIR MEN."

The Senator says our men fought bravely. Why, sir, nobody doubts that. There were regiments on that field that made attacks in a manner that would have done credit to the Old Guard of Napoleon. There were acts of the most desperate valor performed; but owing to unskillfulness, owing to the unfitness or neglect, especially of some of the company officers, and the generals and men will tell you so, that field was made—I will not say it was made a lost battle, for I hardly see how that number of men on that field could have won a victory—but that rout, that ignominious race in which some of the officers deserted, abandoned, and outran their men, was brought upon us by the incompetency and misconduct of officers. I refer to it now simply to show that we ought to correct it. The Senator from Ohio agrees with me in that. Therefore I propose to clothe the President with this power. That he will exercise it moderately and temperately I do not have a doubt; but the knowledge that the President of the United States has been clothed by Congress, in this emergency, with this power, which he may exercise, will have the most salutary effect upon the officers who are in the field, or who may come into the field. While Senators are ready to vote money and men it seems to me that what is greater than all else should not be neglected; that we should open our eyes to the experiences of the last 90 days, and let those experiences guide us in our legislation, and in the administration of the Government for the future.

HAD SENATOR WILSON "RETIREMENT" IN MIND?

A little later, Senator Wilson used these words:

Now, sir, a word in regard to what some Senators think injustice toward the men. Why, sir; my remarks apply to a class of officers, not to them all; not to anything like a majority of them. I believe the great mass of these officers to be true men, who have done the best they could, and I am not here to reproach them for doing the best they could. But there is a class of men in the field and company officers that have got into the service, coming from all the States, my own as well as others, who are showing every day their incompetency; or if they are competent, that they do not try to do their duty—men who go away from their camps and stay two or three days. Why, sir, the quartermaster of a regiment stayed away recently five days from his regiment. He stayed in this city while his regiment was 25 or 30 miles away facing the enemy. I have witnessed scenes of suffering in this city that have brought sickness and death upon brave and noble men, through the utter neglect of officers, that have made my heart ache and brought tears from my eyes, and every other Senator could have witnessed them, if he had gone among them. Sir, we owe it to the brave and true men who are doing the best they can, and who deserve our sympathy and our support, and we owe it to our country to make these men, who neglect their duty, do their duty, or put them out of the Army. It is a matter of humanity—a matter of patriotism—and if I could to-day weed that class of men out of the Army, and keep them from the men that are to be called into the field.

SENATOR WILSON STATED INCOMPETENT OFFICERS SHOULD BE REMOVED.

A little later we find Senator Wilson stating as follows:

Now, sir, without any ill will toward any human being in this Volunteer force, without any disposition to undervalue the services of any man, even the most humble, I believe it to be our highest duty at this time so to legislate and so to administer the laws of the country as to require all the men brought into the field to do their whole duty. When they are incompetent, and have proved their utter incompetency, when they are neglectful of their duty, when they spend their time about hotels and in a manner that is discreditable to them personally, instead of being with their regiments and companies doing their whole duty, they should feel that the eye of the President of the United States, their Commander in Chief, is upon them, and if they fail to do their duty they will be removed from the Army.

CHAIRMAN OF SENATE MILITARY COMMITTEE GIVES REASON FOR RETIREMENT BILL.

Senator Wilson said in part as follows:

Now, sir, let me say a single word in regard to the importance of it. This Congress ought not to adjourn without passing some such measure. It would be unjust to the country and unjust to the Army. Why, sir, take the four regiments of Artillery, the most important part of the Army. Four of those colonels ought to be retired. Not one of those colonels to-day, owing to their age or infirmities or other causes, will be ordered into the field. Two of the four lieutenant colonels are in the same condition and some of the majors. Go to your other regiments, and you will find worn-out, sick, or disabled officers in high positions. They can not go into the field at the call of the country. You have to pay them where they are. Age adds to their receipts. They render no service whatever; and the younger officers who are called into the field, captains to command regiments, are to receive the pay of captains to fight the battles of the country and have no promotion. Is this just? Why, sir, I saw the old Fourth Infantry enter this city a few weeks ago from Texas under the command of a captain. The truth is, and if you take the Army Register and examine it carefully you will find it so, that as you approach toward the head of the Army your officers are paralyzed by age.

SENATOR HALE SAYS IT IS GIVING A PREMIUM ON GOUT.

Senator Hale said as follows:

I think if you pass this bill the highest ambition of these officers will be to get on the retired list. It is giving a premium on idleness, gout, rheumatism, and everything of that sort that renders a man incompetent for his business. This bill gives him the highest rank pay that he was ever entitled to when he gets too incompetent to render any service.

SENATOR WILSON, LATER A VOLUNTEER OFFICER, GIVES REASON WHY HE INTRODUCES BILL.

Mr. Wilson said in part as follows:

In regard to this being a war measure I say here, to-day, most emphatically that the reason this bill is pressed at this session is to add to the efficiency of the Army for the present war, and I think that if the Senator will study the Army Register he will see the absolute necessity of it. The Senator says that majors in the Army are before the enemy to-day commanding divisions, commanding bodies of men that a marshal of France would have been proud to lead in the days of the First Empire. That is so, sir; but why is it that majors are leading divisions to-day? It is because your old officers of higher command are unable to go into the field and take command. We have several officers—a large number in proportion to our Army—who are utterly incapable to go into the field; men from 70 to 85 years of age, worn out by disease.

SENATOR HALE WISHES SENATOR WILSON HAD STATED "WHAT OTHER REASONS WERE."

Senator Hale said in part as follows:

The necessity for this retired list, if I understand the Senator from Massachusetts, is found in the condition of the Artillery, and the proposition is to retire these gentlemen upon the highest pay of their rank. I have taken occasion to look at the Army Register, and I want to give the Senate a statement of the pensions they are voting to these gentlemen. The colonel of the first regiment of Artillery receives $3,365.94; the colonel of the second Artillery, $3,917.60; the colonel of the third, $5,553.36; and the colonel of the fourth, $3,618.60. Very patriotic, very eloquent, very pathetic, touching, and effective appeals have been made to the Senate in behalf of these veterans. I feel them all, and a good deal more. The Senate did not attend to the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in pressing this measure, so minutely as I wish they had. He said a good many of these colonels, "from age and other causes," it would not do to call into the field. I wish the Senator had gone on and stated what some of the "other causes" were; but as he did not, I will not. I do not know but that some of these allowances may be now cut off, some few pounds of hay or something of that kind. But I suppose this to be the substantial pay, the substantial pension that you are voting to gentlemen who can not render any service, and have not done so for a good while.

SENATOR WILSON, VOLUNTEER OFFICER, CHAIRMAN MILITARY COMMITTEE AFTER WAR ALSO.

On February 13, 1866, Senator James Wilson reported out Senate bill 138 as a substitute for House bill 361.

This is the same James Wilson who introduced, among other bills, Senate bills 1, 2, 3, and 44 in the war Congress that met from July 4, 1861, to August 6, 1861.

This bill was introduced by Senator Wilson after he had served as a volunteer officer himself in the Civil War.

"UPON OCCASIONS OF CEREMONY" OFFICERS ENTITLED TO "WEAR UNIFORM."

In the debate on this bill Senator Nesmith offered the following amendment, which was adopted:

And be it further enacted, That all officers who have served during the rebellion as volunteers in the armies of the United States and who have been or who hereafter may be honorably mustered out of the Volunteer service, shall be entitled to bear the official title and, upon occasions of cermony, to wear the uniform of the highest grade they have held by brevet or other commission in the Volunteer service; in the case of officers of the Regular Army the Volunteer rank shall be entered upon the Army Register: Provided, That these privileges shall not entitled any officer to command, pay, or emoluments.

The amendment was agreed to.

A little later Mr. Fessenden says as follows:

I have one more amendment to offer. It is to add the following additional proviso to the fourth section:

"And provided further, That in the selection of officers as provided for in this section officers of the Regular Army who have commanded Volunteer troops may be accounted as officers of Volunteers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Fessenden further states:

There is a little obscurity in the amendment that I offered a few moments ago as an additional proviso to the fourth section. My intention was not to oblige the department to consider the Regular officers who had served in the Volunteers as Volunteer officers, but to give them the choice, to take them either way. The amendment does not affect my purpose. I move to add to the end of that amendment the words "or as officers of the Regular Army," so that it will read:

And provided further, That in the election of officers, as provided for in this section, officers of the Regular Army who have commanded Volunteer troops may be accounted as officers of Volunteers, or as officers of the Regular Army.

"NO PARTICULAR INDUCEMENT" TO OFFICERS "VETERAN RESERVE."

In the same debate Senator Nesmith says as follows:

So far as it is intended to reward officers who have been wounded in the service I would be glad to see them all placed in the Army if they desire it, and to give them such reward as it is in the power of the Government to give them; but I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana for a variety of reasons.

In the first place, as has been stated by the Senator from Maine, there was no particular inducement held out to the officers who went into the Veteran Reserve Corps that they should be retained in the service at the close of the war.

STATEMENT BY CONGRESSMAN FARNSWORTH, A VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

In the debate in the House Congressman J. F. Farnsworth, in reporting the Conference Committee of the House, said in part as follows:

I will explain this matter if Members will give me their attention. I will only say, in conclusion, that this was the very best we could do, and, under the circumstances, the committee on the part of the House thought it best to recommend the passage of the bill. It is very important that a bill should be passed. It is recommended and strongly insisted upon by Gen Grant and by all the officers of the Army. I am satisfied if this is not adopted we shall lose the Army bill. I think it is a very good bill. We retain the provision in reference to officering the new regiments, by which all the vacancies below the grade of captain are to be filled by officers and men who have served with the volunteers. Under the law as it now exists with reference to the Veteran Reserve Corps, a man who has been disabled by wounds may be appointed an officer of a Regular regiment. An officer who has lost an arm—as many of our most worthy officers have, who are still in the service—may still, under the present law, be appointed to a command in any regiment of the Regular service. So that the necessity for enlarging the Volunteer Corps on that account is not so great. The argument on the part of the Senae against the Veteran Reserve Corps is this: That we shall get into the service a large number of officers who are incapacitated bodily for the performance of efficient service, and who will be, in consequence, retired in a short time; that under the law as it now exists they will be placed upon the retired list, with large pay. There is considerable force in this argument.

CONGRESSMAN SCHENCK WAS ALSO A VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

A little later we find Congressman Schenck saying as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in all candor, that the result of this conference is better than I expected. The gentleman who has made the report has certainly stated fairly the fact that in most of the details of the bill the views of the House prevail, and that in various sections following that which provides for the aggregate force of the Army the bill corresponds in a good degree, and indeed I might say almost exactly, with the bill which this morning my colleague upon the committee [Mr. Paine] and myself desired to submit to the House as a compromise.

The only point as to which there has been a material difference between the two Houses, and in regard to which the House, by this report, has made a considerable concession to the Senate, is with reference to the Veteran Reserve Corps. As gentlemen of the House are aware, the House has shown throughout a determination to insist upon some provision for wounded officers and men who are still capable of military duty. Hence, on each occasion when we have adopted a bill we have provided for 10 regiments to be called the Veteran Reserve Corps, to be made up of wounded or disabled men from all branches of the service, and to be officered by wounded or disabled officers. By this compromise the Veteran Reserve Corps is cut down to four regiments. But then it must be remembered that while we give up four regiments of colored Infantry, we gain upon the last bill passed by the House two regiments of colored Cavalry. Two out of four regiments of Cavalry are to be colored.

By the way, Congressman Robert C. Schenck entered the Union Army in 1861 as brigadier general and was promoted to major general, and elected to Congress from Ohio in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

THREE OUT OF FOUR OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEE WERE VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

The conference report on this bill was signed by Henry Wilson and Ira Harris, managers on the part of the Senate, and J. F. Farnsworth and Nelson Taylor, managers on the part of the House. Of these four gentlemen Wilson, Farnsworth, and Taylor were Volunteer officers and would therefore not be prejudiced against "Volunteer" officers in any way.

John F. Farnsworth served in the Union Army as colonel of Cavalry and brigadier general. Nelson Taylor served as captain in the First New York Volunteers in the Mexican War, 1846 to 1848, and also served in the Union Army and obtained the rank of brigadier general. Henry Wilson in 1861 raised and commanded the Twenty-second Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers.

CONGRESSMAN (PRESIDENT) JAMES A. GARFIELD ALSO VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

A little later in the debate, Congressman James A. Garfield—afterwards President—who was also a Volunteer officer, said as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I think the House may congratulate itself on the success of this conference, and that the committee may congratulate itself on the very happy result which it has achieved in this struggle. I have looked through this bill with a great deal of care, and as the result of that examination I must say that I hope the House will adopt the report of the conference committee; for I am sure it is very much better than we had any reason to hope for, considering the results of the last attempt at a conference with the Senate.

Note that he states—

I think the House may congratulate itself on the success of this conference, and that the committee may congratulate itself on the very happy result which it has achieved in this struggle.

The bill he is talking about was approved July 28, 1866, and is entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States."

CONGRESSMAN HALBERT E. PAINE, ALSO VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

Congressman Halbert E. Paine, who entered the Union Army May, 1861, as colonel of the Fourth Wisconsin Volunteers, was in 1863 promoted to rank of brigadier general, and in the following June lost his leg at Port Hudson; brevetted major general in March, 1865, states as follows:

I hold in my hand a document on which I made accurate notes of the agreements of the morning. In looking through the second conference report I find there are only three points in which the report differs from the report to which the third conference agreed to subscribe. We were willing to agree to everything except the provisions relating to the number of ordinary Infantry regiments and the number of the colored troops and of the Veteran Reserve Corps. The difference is not enough to warrant the rejection of this report, and I hope it will be adopted.

It will be noted that all of these gentlemen were Volunteer officers, and, therefore, as I said, absolutely are not prejudiced against "Volunteer" officers in any way.

"TO WEAR UNIFORM"—"NO EMOLUMENTS."

Section 34 of this bill reads as follows:

SEC. 34. And be it further enacted, That all officers who have served during the Rebellion as Volunteers in the armies of the United States, and who have been or may hereafter be honorably mustered out of the Volunteer service, shall be entitled to bear the official title, and upon occasions of ceremony to wear the uniform of the highest grade they have held by brevet or other commissions in the Volunteer service. In case of officers of the Regular Army, the Volunteer rank shall be entered upon the official Army register: Provided, That these privileges shall not entitle any officer to command, pay, or emoluments.

CONGRESSMAN CONKLING STATED GRANT, SHERMAN, MEADE, THOMAS, ALL ADVISED ABOLISHING VETERAN RESERVE ARMY.

In the debate in the House we find Mr. Conkling saying as follows:

The Government has by act and word held but one language on this point, and no expectations have been created that any set of officers were to be preferred to others in the final reorganization.

A little further we find Mr. Conkling saying as follows:

I suppose it is no secret that the public authorities recently caused to be convened in this city a number of first generals of the age. The object of the convention was to consult as to the best disposition to be made of the Military Establishment of the country, now that the war is over, and to consider and devise the best legislative provisions in reference to the regular or permanent Army. These generals were those whose large experience and whose professional eminence selected them as the best advisers, and whose official station makes them the persons to execute the law to be enacted. They came together; the lieutenant general, Gen. Sherman, Gen. Thomas, Gen. Meade, all came. Gen. Sheridan and others did not come. This group of men, so illustrious and so skilled, studied the whole subject and presented their views in writing. The measures they deemed wisest were embodied in a bill which they approved. That bill was introduced in the Senate, carefully considered in committee there. It became the subject of conference and correspondence between the committee of the Senate and the officers who had recommended it. It was elaborately considered in the Senate and passed with but little alteration, and came to us. Here it went to the Military Committee, and there it stays.

In its place we have a bill presented which contains various things which were especially and pointedly condemned by the officers to whom I have referred, by the committee of the Senate, and by the Senate also. There may be reasons for this, though we have not yet heard them.

Beside the bill, however, which these officers blocked out, they made a record of their recommendations. One was upon the point now before us. I will read it. It is, as will be discovered, in answer to a communication sent them with a bill, to which had been added a provision creating a Veteran Reserve Corps. The paper is signed by Gens. Sherman, Meade, and Thomas, and I am not sure whether by Gen. Grant also:

"The only essential change proposed in the Army bill is to omit the Veteran Reserve Corps altogether."

This is the reason they give:

"In any army, no matter what pains be taken in selecting recruits, when we come to put them into service, experience teaches that nearly 30 per cent fail by reason of the ordinary imperfections of human nature. Now, if 8 regiments of the 50 be taken from the invalids, or men of impaired strength, we add 15 per cent, or in all 45 per cent of invalids, which is too large a proportion. In the end it is cheaper to provide directly, by way of pensions, for this class of soldiers. If the officers of the Veteran Reserves have a good record and restored health, they can be appointed just as other officers of the Volunteer Army."

"PROVIDED, THESE PRIVILEGES SHALL NOT ENTITLE AN OFFICER TO COMMAND, PAY, OR EMOLUMENTS."

On June 29, 1866, Senator James Wilson reported out Senate bill No. 401. During the debate in the Senate Mr. Nesmith said as follows:

I now offer the amendment which I offered a short time since, to add as an additional section the following:

"And be it further enacted, That all the officers who have served during the rebellion as Volunteers in the armies of the United States, and who have been, or hereafter may be, honorably mustered out of the Volunteer service shall be entitled to bear the official titles upon occasions of ceremony, and wear the uniform of the highest grade they have held by brevet or other commission in the Volunteer service. In the case of officers of the Regular Army the Volunteer rank shall be entered upon the official Army roll: Provided, That these privileges shall not entitle an officer to command, pay, or emoluments."

The amendment was agreed to.

A little later Senator Harris said as follows:

I offer the following as a new section, to come in after the fourth section:

"And be it further enacted, That in the selection of officers to be appointed under the provisions of this act, officers of the Regular Army who have commanded Volunteer troops may be counted as officers of Volunteers or as officers of the Regular Army."

I will state that this is the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] when a similar bill was before the Senate a few months ago and adopted by the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

OFFICERS OF REGULAR ARMY RETIRED ON ACCOUNT OF DISABILITY.

In the debate on July 9, 1866, Senator Howard, of Michigan, stated as follows:

Mr. HOWARD. I believe we have gone through with all the amendments offered by the committee. I offer the following amendment to come as section 33 at the end of the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That officers of the Regular Army entitled to be retired on account of disability occasioned by wounds received in battle may be retired upon the rank of the command held by them in the Regular or Volunteer service at the time such wounds were received."

Mr. WILSON. That proposition, I take it, means simply this: A large number of officers of the Regular Army were made officers of Volunteers. Some of those officers, perhaps four or five of them, were desperately wounded. The proposition is that they shall be retired on the rank they held when they received their wounds, and I think it is right that it should be so. Where does the Senator propose to insert the amendment?

Mr. HOWARD. At the close of the bill, as an additional section.

Mr. WILSON. Put it in as section 32.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; let it come in as section 32.

Mr. WILSON. My suggestion is that it come in after the thirty-first section as a new section.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; I will move to insert it as section 32; as it stands in the bill it can be changed to section 33.

The amendment was agreed to.

PRIVATES ENTITLED TO HONORARY RANK OF FIRST LIEUTENANT.

A little later Senator Lane, of Indiana, offered the following amendment:

Mr. LANE of Indiana. It is an amendment to another amendment, not the amendment pending now of the Senator from Delaware, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read to settle its character.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment of Mr. Ramsey, which was to amend the amendment adopted on motion of Mr. Nesmith, as the thirty-third section of the bill, by inserting after the word "service," the following words:

"And privates who have served three years and been honorably discharged, shall, upon like occasion, be entitled to the honorary rank of first lieutenant and wear the uniform of that grade, and at the expiration of five years from the 9th of April, 1865, shall be entitled to the honorary rank of captain."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment is not now in order. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. LANE of Indiana. The vote was taken on the motion of the Senator from Oregon and that was passed. This is an amendment to that, intervening between the amendment of the Senator from Delaware and a vote that had already been passed, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves to strike out the twelfth section of the bill. That is the motion before the Senate. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is not an amendment to that amendment, and therefore is not in order.

SENATOR RAMSEY SAYS "IT COSTS NOTHING; IT IS A MERE EMPTY HONOR."

A little later Senator Ramsey stated, as follows:

I now offer the amendment which I indicated before, to insert after the word "service," in the twelfth line of the section which was inserted on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Nesmith], the words "and privates who have served three years and been honorably discharged shall upon like occasions be entitled to the honorary rank of first lieutenant and wear the uniform of that grade, and at the expiration of five years from the 9th of April, 1865, they shall be entitled to the honorary rank of captain." I will simply ask Senators, why should a distinction be made in favor of officers and no like discrimination in favor of privates who did the service and fought the battles? I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RAMSEY. I can see no sufficient reason why there should be a discrimination against the privates. They really did the fighting in all our battles. If special honors are to be showered upon the officers, to which I have no objection, why make a discrimination against the privates? I hope it will not go out from this Senate Chamber that there is that kind of indifference to their credit, reputation, and honor hereafter. It costs nothing; it is a mere empty honor, if you please to say so. If you are to shower honors upon officers who have already all places conferred upon them in the civil, probably, as well as the military service, I can not see any reason why this little honor should not be paid to the privates. In the French service almost every officer and private has a red ribbon bestowed upon him. Why should not the privates here have this little honor conferred upon them?

SENATOR WILSON—"ON OCCASIONS OF CEREMONY."

Mr. WILSON. The amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Oregon provides simply that officers of the Regular Army who have served with Volunteers shall, on occasions of ceremony, have the rank they had among the Volunteers.

MR. NYE HAS HIS JOKE.

Mr. NYE. This extends the same to the privates.

Mr. WILSON. This does not apply to Volunteers; there is not a Volunteer in the country concerned in it. It is a proposition that the rank and file of the Regular Army who have served three years shall on all occasions of ceremony be first lieutenants.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask that the amendment be read again. I think that the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely mistaken about it.

The Secretary read Mr. Ramsey's amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Massachusetts is surely mistaken.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly not. It says "privates." Privates of what? Privates of the Regular Army.

Mr. CONNESS. Every private who has served three years in the Army.

Mr. WILSON. We are dealing with privates of the Regular Army, not Volunteers.

Mr. CONNESS. It can be amended so as to read "privates of the Regular and Volunteer services."

Mr. WADE. Without this provision, what is there to prevent the privates from assuming just such characters as they please on occasions of ceremony and taking the title of majors if they see fit?

MR. NYE THINKS THERE IS A PENALTY.

Mr. NYE. There is a penalty.

Mr. WADE. I do not think there is.

"THUS THE PRIVATES MIGHT COMMAND THE COMPANY."

Mr. NESMITH. So far as this is applicable to the Regular Army, I fear there may be some difficulty about it. On an occasion of ceremony in a year or two all the privates would be captains, and the lieutenants remaining lieutenants, the captains would have the right to command. Thus the privates might command the company. It would create a great deal of embarrassment to make 80 captains in a company commanding two or three officers.

Mr. CONNESS. It is quite apparent that the members of the Senate who belong to the Committee on Military Affairs do not understand this amendment. I think it is easily understood, and I must say that the Senator who has given it existence simply proves to the country that he is not unmindful of the great services the brave private soldiers have rendered to the country.

The amendment of Mr. Ramsey was defeated.

"PROVIDED THESE PRIVILEGES SHALL NOT ENTITLE AN OFFICER TO COMMAND, PAY, OR EMOLUMENTS."

The intent of section 34, as stated by Senator Nesmith, who offered the section, is as follows:

I offer the following as a new section: "And be it further enacted, That all officers who have served during the rebellion as Volunteers in the armies of the United States, and who have been or hereafter may be honorably mustered out of the Volunteer service, shall be entitled to bear the official title, and upon occasion of ceremony to wear the uniform of the highest grade they have held by brevet or other commission in the military service. In the case of officers of the Regular Army, the Volunteer rank shall be entered upon the official Army Register: Provided, That these privileges shall not entitle any officers to command, pay, or emoluments."

SENATOR NESMITH SAYS "IT IS MERELY COMPLIMENTARY TO VOLUNTEER OFFICERS."

In the debate Senator Nesmith used these words:

I will state that this amendment is a precise copy of an amendment which passed the Senate in the original Senate bill now pending before the House of Representatives. It is merely complimentary to Volunteer officers, permitting them to have the designation and, on occasions of ceremony and public occasions, to wear the uniform of the highest rank they held in the Volunteers, and the Volunteer rank in the case of officers of the Regular Army is to be transferred to the official Army Register. It is a matter that will cost nothing, it increases no pay or emoluments, and entitles them to no command. It is a mere compliment.

SENATOR GRIMES SAYS "IT PROVIDES FOR OCCASIONS OF CEREMONY."

A little later Senator Grimes said as follows:

Mr. GRIMES. I will ask the Senator to let that lie on the table until it can be examined. I have no objection to it as among officers of the Army, but it provides for occasions of ceremony. The difficulty is that officers of the Army and Navy are frequently brought together on occasions of ceremony, and, there being no brevets in the Navy, a young man who has been brevetted as a major general or as a brigadier general, although having been in the service not more than two or three years, will rank on those occasions of ceremony as an officer of the Navy who has served the country faithfully for 50 years. I should like to have an opportunity to amend the amendment. Let it lie on the table until I can draft an amendment so that they may have this rank as among Army officers.

Mr. NESMITH. I have no objection to that.

On March 6, 1866, a former Volunteer officer, Robert C. Schenck, reported House bill 361 as a substitute for Senate bill 138, mentioned above. When it was advised in Congress that the Veteran Reserve Corps be continued as a permanent organization Mr. Rogers stated as follows in the House:

MR. ROGERS SAYS GEN. GRANT WAS AGAINST "ANY SUCH CORPS."

Mr. ROGERS. But, sir, it is enough for me to know that Gen. Grant, Gen. Sherman, Gen. Meade, and Gen. Thomas have all given the weight of their opinion against the formation of any such corps as this. Sir, I have confidence in the patriotism and the sagacious judgment of these officers. I do not pretend to be a military man; I have never been in the Army; but as one of the representatives of the people of this great country I am ready to accept the views of those who are better qualified than I am to determine what is best calculated to promote the efficient organization of the Army of the United States. I am satisfied that the advice given by such men as these is prompted by the purest motives and the highest wisdom, and I am willing to be guided by that advice.

MR. DAVIS SAYS HE IS "NOT UNDER SOCIAL INFLUENCE."

A little later Mr. Davis says, as follows:

I wish to say I am not under any social influence. Since I have lived in Washington I have never, like my honorable friend from Ohio, had the privilege of being entertained by distinguished characters at dinner. I am under no influence of that kind, but I respect the opinion of men high in the military service. When I knew there was pending a bill which had been submitted by Lieut. Gen. Grant, Gen. Meade, Gen. Burnside, and other distinguished generals, and when I thought that bill had been concocted under their supervision, I say it is not only entitled to my consideration but to the consideration of every Member of the House. There is no one who supposes these distinguished generals of the Army know nothing of military affairs, or at least do not know as much as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House. I only honor the men whom the country honors and in whom, I am sure, the country has confidence.

THEY TAKE CARE OF OFFICERS, REGULAR ARMY, TEMPORARILY IN VOLUNTEER REGIMENTS.

Section 38 of this bill reads as follows:

SEC. 38. And be it further enacted, That officers of the Regular Army who have also held commissions as officers of Volunteers shall not on that account be held to be Volunteers under the provisions of this act.

HON. JAMES G. BLAINE OFFERS NEW SECTION.

Hon. James G. Blaine offered a new section to read as follows:

I move the following as an additional section, to come in after section 39:

"And be it further enacted, That in all cases where a Volunteer officer has been appointed in the Regular Army to the same rank or grade which he may have held in the Volunteer Service, or to any lower rank or grade, his name shall be borne on the Army Register with date of his Volunteer appointment, and he shall take rank as with continuous service from that date."

The section was agreed to.

It seems that when House bill 361 was passed and sent to the Senate as a substitute for Senate bill 138 that the Senate pigeonholed House bill 361 and reported out an entire new bill, which was known as Senate bill 401.

FOLLOWING MEMBERS OF MILITARY COMMITTEE VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

The following members of the Military Committee of the Senate for the Thirty-seventh Congress, first session, who had charge of all the war legislation in 1861, became Volunteer officers: Henry Wilson, chairman, who raised and commanded the Twenty-second Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, and Senator Henry S. Lane, of Indiana, who served in the Mexican War as lieutenant colonel of Volunteers.

Senator Jacob Collamer, of Vermont, served in the War of 1812. He served in Congress from December 3, 1855, until his death, November 9, 1865.

Hon. Francis P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, was chairman of the House committee, and he served as a colonel in the Union Army; William A. Richardson, another member of the committee, was captain in the Mexican War; and Gilman Marston, of New Hampshire, another member of the committee, served with distinction as colonel and brigadier general of Volunteers in the Union Army.

ALL THE FOLLOWING WERE VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

The following data will be of interest as showing the names of members of the Military Committee of the Thirty-seventh

Congress and Thirty-ninth Congress who saw service in the Union Army:

Members of the House Military Committee, Thirty-seventh Congress, first session, who served in the war:

On page 396, Biographical Congressional Directory, 1774–1903, states, in part, as follows:

Francis P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, enlisted as a private in the regiment of Col. Doniphan, serving through the Mexican War. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-fifth, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh, and Thirty-eighth; also served in the Union Army as colonel.

On page 767 states, in part, as follows:

William A. Richardson, of Illinois, enlisted as captain in the Mexican War and promoted to the rank of major. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirtieth, Thirty-first, Thirty-second, Thirty-third, and Thirty-fourth.

On page 684 states, in part, as follows:

Gilman Marston, of New Hampshire, served with distinction in the Union Army as colonel and brigadier general of Volunteers. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh, and Thirty-ninth.

Members of the Military Committee in the Senate for the Thirty-ninth Congress, first session, who served in the war:

On page 889 states, in part, as follows:

Henry Wilson, Massachusetts, in 1861 raised and commanded for a time the Twenty-second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers. His term of service in the Senate from 1855 to 1873.

On page 643 states, in part, as follows:

Henry S. Lane, of Indiana, served in the Mexican War as lieutenant colonel of volunteers. His term of service in the Senate from 1861 to 1867.

List of members of the House Military Committee for the Thirty-ninth Congress, first session, who served in the war:

On page 785, Biographical Congressional Directory, 1774–1903, states, in part, as follows:

Robert C. Schenck, Ohio, entered the Union Army in 1861 as brigadier general; promoted to major general. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, Thirtieth, Thirty-first, Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, and Forty-first.

On page 497 states, in part, as follows:

Henry C. Deming, Connecticut, entered the Union Army in 1861 as colonel of the Twelfth Connecticut Volunteers. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth.

On page 884 states, in part, as follows:

Gilman Marstron, of New Hampshire, served with distinction in the Union Army as colonel and brigadier general of volunteers. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh, and Thirty-ninth.

On page 634 states, in part, as follows:

John H. Ketcham, New York, entered the Union Army as colonel of the One hundred and fiftieth New York Volunteers in October, 1862, and appointed brigadier general by brevet, afterwards brigadier general, serving until he resigned, in March, 1865, and appointed major general by brevet. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, and Fifty-eighth.

These gentlemen being soldiers themselves can not be accused of being prejudiced against the "Volunteer" officers, and yet the records show that none of these gentlemen ever introduced "a Volunteer officers' retirement bill," and none of these gentlemen ever made a speech in favor of such a bill.

In addition the following list gives names of the Members of the House and Senate for the Thirty-seventh and Thirty-ninth Congresses, who saw service in the Civil War.

MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS, WHO TOOK PART IN THE CIVIL WAR.

On page 684, Biographical Congressional Directory, 1774–1903, states, in part, as follows:

Gilman Marstron, of New Hampshire, served with distinction in the Union Army as colonel and brigadier general of Volunteers. He was a member of the following Congresses: Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh, and Thirty-ninth

On page 375 states, in part, as follows:

MASSACHUSETTS.

Nathaniel P. Banks in 1861 entered the Union Army as major general of Volunteers, and served throughout the war. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-third, Thirty-fourth, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, Forty-fourth, and Fifty-first.

On page 497 states, in part, as follows:

CONNECTICUT.

Henry C. Deming entered the Union Army in 1861 as colonel of the Twelfth Connecticut Volunteers. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth.

On page 835 states, in part, as follows:

NEW YORK.

Nelson Taylor, captain in the First New York Volunteers in the Mexican War, 1846–1848. He was a Member of the following Congress: Thirty-ninth. Also served in the Union Army, and attained the rank of brigadier general.

On page 634 states, in part, as follows:

John H. Ketcham entered the Union Army as colonel of the One hundred and fiftieth New York Volunteers in October, 1862, and appointed brigadier general by brevet, afterwards brigadier general, serving until he resigned in March, 1865, and appointed major general by brevet. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, Fifty-eighth.

On page 392 states, in part, as follows:

CALIFORNIA.

John Bidwell served in the War with Mexico, attaining the rank of major. He was a Member of the following Congress: Thirty-ninth.

On page 457 states, in part, as follows:

KANSAS.

Sidney Clarke, captain and assistant provost marshal general in the War for the Suppression of the Rebellion. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, and Forty-first.

On page 645 states, in part, as follows:

WEST VIRGINIA.

George R. Latham served in the Union Army as captain of Volunteers. He was a Member of the following Congress: Thirty-ninth.

On page 874 states, in part, as follows:

Kellian V. Whaley served in the Union Army. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-seventh (from Virginia), Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth (from West Virginia).

On page 450 states, in part, as follows:

NEW MEXICO.

J. Francesco Chaves, major of the First New Mexico Infantry in the Union Army; promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel. He was a Member of the following Congresses: Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, and Forty-first.

A Volunteer officer, Gen. James A. Garfield, was, I understand, chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee for the Fortieth Congress; another Volunteer officer was chairman of the same committee for the Forty-first Congress; Brig. Gen. John Coburn was chairman in the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses; Gen. Henry B. Banning, a Volunteer officer, was chairman of the committee in the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses.

The chairman of the committee in the Forty-sixth Congress was not a Volunteer officer, but there were some distinguished Volunteer officers on the committee—Gen. Edward S. Bragg and Gen. Anson G. McCook.

These same gentlemen were members of the committee in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Another distinguished general, Gen. William S. Rosecrans, was chairman of this committee in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Gen. Bragg was chairman of the committee in the Forty-ninth Congress.

None of these gentlemen introduced a bill for the retirement of Volunteer officers, and I find no record of any of them advocating such a bill.

NONE OF THESE VOLUNTEER OFFICERS INTRODUCED A "RETIREMENT BILL."

I can not find a record where any of the above gentlemen ever introduced a bill to provide for "retirement for Volunteer officers," nor can I find where any one of these gentlemen ever made a speech in favor of such a bill.

FIRST BILL ONLY TOOK CARE OF DISABLED OFFICERS.

I find no bill to provide "retirement for Volunteer officers" was introduced until February 23, 1903, and even then it was not introduced by anyone who saw service in the Civil War. Even then it only provided for officers who "lost an eye, a leg, a foot, an arm, or a hand," or "in the discharge of his duty was so disabled as to make his disability" commensurate with the above.

BILL WAS INTRODUCED "BY REQUEST."

Even then the introducer of the bill stated that he did it, and so marked on the bill, "by request."

VERY MODEST BILL FOR THE RETIREMENT OF CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

This very modest bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who served as an officer of Volunteers in the Army or Navy of the United States during the War of the Rebellion and who, in the line of his duty during his service as such officer of Volunteers, lost an eye, a leg, a foot, an arm, or a hand, or in the discharge of his duty was so disabled as to make his disability commensurate with that of the loss of a leg, a foot, an arm, or a hand shall, upon application to the Secretary of War, be placed on the retired list of the Army with the rank which he held at the time when be incurred the disability, in the same manner as provided for the retirement of officers of the Regular Army.

This very modest bill was not reported out of the committee.

In January, 1904, there was introduced a bill in the Senate for recognition of noncommissioned officers and enlisted men of the United States Volunteers as commissioned officers in certain State military organizations, but it provided "that no person should receive any pay, pension, or bounty by reason of the passage of this act."

The bill reads as follows:

For the recognition of the military service of noncommissioned officers and enlisted men of the United States Volunteers as commissioned officers in certain State military organizations.

Be it enacted, etc., That all noncommissioned officers and enlisted men honorably discharged from the service of the United States who were actually engaged in the Civil War not less than three months and thereafter commissioned captain or lieutenant in any State military organization the muster-out rolls of which are on file in the War Department at Washington, D. C., and who rendered actual military service as such officers not less than 30 days under the general command of officers of the United States in connection with the regularly organized military forces of the United States, under any call by the President or any call by a governor of any of the United States during the Civil War, whose services were accepted by the President or Secretary of War, shall be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as commissioned officers during the period they were in actual service, and he is hereby authorized and directed to place such officers upon the United States register of Volunteers and issue certificates of discharge, upon the application and satisfactory proof of identity, to all such honorably discharged officers, giving the recorded service by them rendered: Provided, That no person shall receive any pay, pension, bounty, or other allowances by reason of the passage of this act.

Next bill only took care of "major generals and brigadier generals."

WHAT IS THE LINE OF DEMARCATION?

In a hearing on this bill on December 13, 1906, when a member of the committee asked Gen. S. L. Glasgow the question, "What is that line of demarcation?"

Gen. GLASGOW. The grade included in this bill is that of brevet brigadier general.

The CHAIRMAN. Major generals and brevet brigadier generals usually rank a colonel. These are cared for now. Why not include lieutenant colonels, majors, captains, and first and second lieutenants?

Gen. GLASGOW. The honorable chairman of this committee addressed me a letter as to this inquiry, and as your time is all taken up I wish to bring a few facts briefly to your attention, and I will ask your courtesy to read one paragraph in the letter addressed to Mr. Hull referring to this particular question. The whole letter treats of the subject, but I will read this one paragraph because it sums up the matter. This is a letter from me to Mr. Hull, of date of February 16, 1906, in answer to a request made by him to know why the bill apparently discriminated against the junior grades of Volunteer officers. The paragraph is as follows:

GEN. GLASGOW SAYS IT IS "ONE OF EXPEDIENCY."

There is and should be no objection among comrades to the principle of this bill. All grades are entitled to recognition. The question is one merely of expediency. If Congress at this time will pass a bill including all grades no one would give the same more hearty approval than the beneficiaries of this bill. If, however, such a bill would not be entertained at this time there can be no valid objection to the enactment of this bill, within the limits defined, for the reason that most of the beneficiaries of this bill are more than 70 years of age, the average age being 74. Those who have not attained the age of 70 years would not receive the benefits of the bill until they shall arrive at that age. The officers of junior grades are as an average from 7 to 10 years younger than the average age of the beneficiaries of the bill in question. The beneficiaries of the bill in question who have passed the age of 70 years should have the benefit of the bill without delay; and, further, the enactment of this bill would establish a precedent that would render easy future legislation for the benefit of all grades at or prior to the time that the beneficiaries would arrive at the allotted age. There is no question as to the equitable principle that all officers should be included in the retired list. The means to arrive at that end in the most speedy manner possible are now to be considered. If it should be impossible to enact a bill at this time including all grades, and the proposed bill should be defeated for the reason that it does not include all grades, no one will receive any benefit, no legislation in that respect accomplished, and the result will be no recognition by Congress of the service given.

This is the position that the proposed beneficiaries of this bill take in regard to that. The whole matter rests with Congress. This bill in no way exhausts the subject but leaves open the question of the recognition of junior grades; but the beneficiaries whose ages are from 70 to 90, respectfully ask recognition now.

COLONELS, CAPTAINS, AND LIEUTENANTS FORGOTTEN (?).

The next time this bill bobs up (Dec. 18, 1905) to provide for "a Volunteer retired list," as a careful reading of the bill will show, it only provides for "each surviving major general and brigadier general of Volunteers" and "each surviving colonel of the Volunteer regiment." The full bill reads as follows:

To create in the War Department a special roll to be known as the Volunteer retired list, to authorize placing thereon with pay certain surviving officers of the United States Volunteer Army of the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and is hereby, created in the War Department a special roll to be known as the Volunteer retired list for certain surviving officers of the United States Volunteer Army of the Civil War.

SEC. 2. That upon written application to the Secretary of War, and subject to the conditions and requirements hereinafter contained, there shall be entered on said list the name of each surviving major general and brigadier general of Volunteers in said Army, and each surviving colonel of a Volunteer regiment therein who was at any time appointed and commissioned by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as brigadier general of Volunteers by brevet on account of services rendered in said Army. Such entry on said Volunteer retired list shall be subject to the following conditions and requirements, namely: Each person so entered shall have served as an officer or an enlisted man not less than two and one-half years in said Volunteer Army between April 15, 1861, and July 15, 1865, at least one year of which service shall have been in the field with troops; he shall have been honorably discharged from said service and shall have reached the age of 70 years; he shall not belong to the Regular Army and shall not have been retired; said application to be accompanied with proof of the identity of the applicant, and both the application and proof to be under oath.

MAJOR GENERALS WILLING TO TAKE IN THE OTHERS.

Evidently the major generals, brigadier generals, and colonels believed that they could not get through their legislation unless they took in the captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants. We find the next bill broad enough to take in all commissioned officers.

BILL BECOMES BROADER STILL.

This bill was introduced on December 9, 1907, and reads as follows:

To create in the War Department a roll to be known as the Volunteer retired list, to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers of the United States Volunteer Army of the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That upon written application to the Secretary of War, and subject to the conditions and requirements hereinafter contained, the name of each surviving officer of Volunteers in the United States Volunteer Army of the Civil War shall be entered on a roll to be known as the Volunteer retired list. Each person so entered shall have served with credit as an officer or an enlisted man not less than one year in the field with troops in said Volunteer Army between April 15, 1861, and July 15, 1865; he shall have been honorably discharged from said service; he shall not have been retired; said application to be accompanied with proof of the identity of the applicant, and both the application and proof to be under oath: Provided, That an officer who resigned or was discharged from said service because of wounds received in battle, if otherwise qualified, shall be entitled to retirement without reference to the length of his service in said Volunteer Army.

BILL A LITTLE BROADER STILL.

On February 7, 1908, first session Sixtieth Congress, there was a bill introduced in the House the title of which reads as follows:

A bill to create in the War Department a roll to be known as the Volunteer retired list, to authorize placing thereon, with retired pay, certain surviving officers and enlisted men of the United States Army, Navy, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes.

This bill was known as H. R. 16645, and was introduced by Mr. Bradley, of Kentucky. The bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon written application to the Secretary of War, and subject to the conditions and requirements hereinafter contained, the name of each surviving officer and enlisted man of Volunteers in the United States Volunteer Army of the Civil War shall be entered on a roll to be known as the Volunteer retired list. Each person so entered shall have served with credit as an officer or an enlisted man not less than 18 months in the field with troops in said Volunteer Army between April 15, 1861, and July 15, 1865; he shall have been honorably discharged from said service; he shall not belong to the Regular Army, and shall not have been retired, but shall be eligible if he served in the Regular Army with credit as an officer or enlisted man not less than 18 months in the field with troops in said Volunteer Army between April 15, 1861, and July 15, 1865, has been honorably discharged from said service and has not been retired; said application to be accompanied with proof of the identity of the applicant, and both application and proof to be under oath: Provided, That an officer or enlisted man who resigned or was discharged from said service because of wounds received in battle, if otherwise qualified, shall be entitled to retirement without reference to the length of his service in said Volunteer Army.

THIS BILL TOO BROAD FOR PROPONENTS OF THIS LEGISLATION.

As this bill provided for retirement of enlisted men as well as Volunteer officers, it does not seem to have been very well received by the "Volunteer officers."

In his report on a similar bill The Adjutant General, under date of January 27, 1907, states as follows:

That there were approximately 125,000 commissioned officers in service in the Volunteer Army during the Civil War—

And that—it does not seem unreasonable to assume that about 25 per cent of the Volunteer commissioned officers of the Army, or about 31,250, will be surviving June 30, 1908. That of these 18,750 would have served 18 months, and therefore be eligible under the terms of H. R. 6288 as amended; and that the cost of the bill, less the pensions, will exceed $13,000,000.

Gen. Raum, in a letter written to the chairman of the Military Committee, on April 9, 1908, stated that he thought there were only 8,000 officers instead of 31,250, as stated by The Adjutant General.

GEN. HULL ALSO A VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

The chairman of the Military Committee at that time was Hon. J. A. T. Hull, and while he was a Volunteer officer I have been able to find no record where he ever introduced or advocated any Volunteer officers' retirement bill.

From the Biographical Congressional Directory, 1774–1903, I find the following:

That Chairman J. A. T. Hull enlisted in the Twenty-third Iowa Infantry, July, 1862; first lieutenant and captain; wounded in the charge on entrenchments at Black River May 17, 1863; resigned on account of wounds October, 1863; was also Member of the Fifty-second to Fifty-eighth Congresses, inclusive.

PRESENT BILL BROAD ENOUGH FOR ALL—EXCEPT PRIVATES AND NONCOMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

A bill introduced in the Fifty-first Congress, second session, is broad enough to take care of "each surviving officer of the Volunteers who served as an officer in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War."

At that time the Committee on Military Affairs reported, in part, as follows:

The number of surviving officers January 1, 1910, being officially estimated as 21,995, and the cost of said bill for the first year as $14,540,056.

The estimate of surviving officers for the year 1918 is 9,196, and the cost $6,266,307.

OVER 11,000 OFFICERS OF THE ARMY ALONE.

In a letter to me, under date of April 19, 1917, The Adjutant General wrote as follows:

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES,
House of Representatives:

According to the estimate of the War Department, the probable number of surviving volunteer officers for the year 1917 who served in the Army within the period of the Civil War is 11,832.

This office has no data upon which to base any estimate of the probable number of Volunteer officers, Navy and Marine, that served within the period of the Civil War, who are now living, but it is probable that if information concerning these officers can be obtained in any place, it is obtainable only from the Navy Department.

H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

THEY FORGET TO QUOTE ALL OF SECTION 5.

The proponents of this piece of legislation claim that section 5 of the act of May 25, 1861, approved July 22, 1861, is a "sacred promise to place them on the retired list the same as Regular officers," because they claim the section reads as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers, noncommisioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth, shall in all respects be placed on the footing, as to pay and allowances, of similar corps of the Regular Army.

WORDING OF SIMILAR SECTION IN 1898.

As I have stated previously, they neglected—intentionally, I presume—to print the entire section.

General Orders, No. 30, Washington, April 30, 1898, reads in part, as follows:

SEC. 12. That all officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army, and of the militia of the States when in the service of the United States, shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as that of officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army.

I do not believe that you can find any man who saw service in the Volunteer force in 1898 to claim that that means that Volunteer officers or enlisted men who were mustered out of the Army in 1898 and went back to civil life are entitled to the same retirement allowances as men who stayed in the service.

WORDING OF SECTION ORDERING MEN TO MEXICAN BORDER IN 1916.

Part of section 111 of Bulletin No. 16, Washington, June 21, 1916, reads as follows:

Officers and enlisted men in the service of the United States under the terms of this section shall have the same pay and allowance as officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army of the same grades and the same prior service.

I do not believe that any man in Congress to-day who voted for this bill in 1916 will state that he intended that officers who left the service of the United States and went back to civil life were to receive the same "retirement pay" as men who stayed in the service.

WORDING OF "SELECTIVE-DRAFT BILL."

H. R. 3545, introduced on April 19, 1917—known as the selective-draft bill—by Mr. DENT, chairman of the Military Committee, entitled "A bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," reads, in part, as follows:

SEC. 9. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for, other than the Regular Army, shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army.

I do not believe that any man in Congress to-day who voted for this bill in 1917 will state that he intended that officers who left the service of the United States and went back to civil life were to receive the same "retirement pay" as men who stayed in the service.

WORDING OF SIMILAR SECTION IN 1812.

Act approved July 6, 1812:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to form the corps of Volunteers into battalions, squadrons, brigades, and divisions, and to appoint thereto, by and with the consent of the Senate, general, field, and staff officers, conformably with the Military Establishments of the United States, and who shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of a similar grade in the Army of the United States.

WORDING OF SIMILAR SECTION FOR MEXICAN WAR.

Act approved May 13, 1846:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever the militia or volunteers are called and received into the service of the United States under the provisions of this act, they shall have the same organizations of the Army of the United States, and shall have the same pay and allowances.

CONGRESSMAN GARDNER, A VOLUNTEER OFFICER, IN SPEECH ON PENSION FOR GEN. SICKLES.

In discussing a bill for the benefit of Maj. Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, Gen. Washington Gardner, at that time Congressman from Michigan, said, in part, on page 4728, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 15, 1910, as follows:

"The soldier who carried his musket, who drew his $13 a month, and on the battle line left an arm or a leg as the result of his heroic conduct endures quite as much pain as the major general back yonder on his horse who, by a chance shot, suffered in like way the mutilation of the body. Again, sitting just beyond the corner of the Speaker's desk, there is a man whose brother commanded a brigade in Sickles's corps at the Peach Orchard. Four times was Gen. Byron R. Pierce wounded upon the battle field. Sent by Grant to lead his men in a desperate charge, he was brought back 30 minutes later badly wounded, when Grant, by authority previously conferred by Abraham Lincoln, conferred upon the gallant officer the star of a brigadier general. That man has suffered all these years from his several wounds, and to-day gets $30 a month pension. I know him personally and well. It is not right, it is not just, that Gen. Sickles should receive $687.50 per month, as this bill would give him, and his equally heroic subordinate general receive but $30."

PATRIOTISM OUGHT TO BE ABOVE THE SUSPICION OF FILTHY LUCRE.

A little further on, on the same page, he says, in part, as follows:

"We have to pay something, gentlemen, for being soldiers; we have to pay something for being shot; we have to pay something for human suffering; it is the price of patriotism in war, and his wounds is the glory of the veteran soldier in peace; but our country, whether in war or peace, will make a mistake if it ever puts a commercial value upon patriotism. Like Cæsar's wife, patriotism ought to be above the suspicion of filthy lucre." [Loud applause.]

As I said at the beginning, the evidence will show that there never was a "sacred promise" of either President Lincoln or Congress.

There is no truth in any of the contentions of the author of this self-appointed committee to further the interests of the legislation, and the bill ought not to pass. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, how much does the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. SIMS. How much time has the gentleman from Wisconsin used now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 77 minutes remaining.

Mr. ESCH. I desire to yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, in speaking earlier this afternoon I said one of my objections to this bill was the fact it did not confine the President to any special area in the United States, and that it was not absolutely necessary that these plants must be in connection with or near to a plant that was manufacturing war material. The chairman said it was limited to a restricted area, so to speak, and they must be in connection with plants or localities manufacturing war material. I want to call the attention of the committee to section 2 of the bill:

That the President is hereby authorized and empowered within the limits of appropriations herein or hereafter made—

To construct at any place or places within the boundaries of the United States such power plant or power plants as he may deem necessary.

Now, to me, as I understand the language, there is nothing there that restricts him with regard to manufacture of war material or to localities where war material is manufactured. We have the statement of the chairman of the committee that those restrictions are understood, but when this is once passed by House and Senate and becomes the real law of the land any statement made by the Chair at this time would have nothing to do with the question. In my judgment, this section 2, paragraph 1, gives the President of the United States the power to construct anywhere within the boundaries of the United States as he may see fit. Now, in paragraph 2 of section 2 it gives him power, for the purpose of increasing the capacity or the productivity of any private power plant within the boundaries of the United States, to commandeer. Now, I would like to have the chairman of the committee tell me where the language is in the bill that absolutely restricts him in the location of these plants or in commandeering them.

Mr. SIMS. There is nothing in the bill restricting it geographically.

Mr. SNELL. That is the reason I brought it up. I feel that there should be something of the kind written in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. It should not be geographical.

Mr. SNELL. I do not mean necessarily geographical, but to do this work and spend this money it must be somewhere where they need the power for increasing the production of war materials.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly. That is the object and purpose of it.

Mr. SNELL. But it does not say so in the bill. He can do it anywhere in the United States. He can take over a power plant whether it is connected with one of these war-material plants or not.

Mr. SIMS. I take it that he would not do it where it was not needed.

Mr. SNELL. It should be written into the law as to just what we intend to have done.

Mr. SIMS. I thought the gentleman was going to offer an amendment when we get to that stage. I do not know what it may be, but if it seems to be a necessary and proper amendment I will not oppose it.

Mr. SNELL. I intend to, as there is nothing in the bill that restricts along the line I suggested.

Mr. SIMS. I could not imagine or conceive of the possibility of the present President or any other President ever making under this bill the kind of development the gentleman seems to contemplate.

Mr. SNELL. What I asked was if there was anything in the bill, and I understood you to state it was restricted in the bill. In taking up the question of time, you say it was limited as to time. I maintain that section 8, which says—

That the President may retain any property and operate any plants, transmission lines, structures, facilities, or appliances constructed or acquired under the provisions of this act for such time as he may deem necessary or advisable for the purpose of selling or otherwise disposing thereof—is absolutely opposed to the provisions in the other part of the bill, which say that it must be done within five years.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman know that as a matter of bargaining and trying to get the best you can in selling or otherwise disposing of it perhaps he may be aided and assisted in building units of existing power plants? Now, the only probable purchaser, when the Government must dispose of it in five years, may sit there and not make any terms at all and reach a time when the President would have no power to deal at all.

Mr. SNELL. Do you not think that five years would be a reasonable time in which to make disposition of it?

Mr. SIMS. I do. I do not think what you have in mind will take place.

Mr. SNELL. Why do you say five years in one place and in another place make the time unlimited?

Mr. SIMS. It gives five years for the purpose of disposing of it—selling or otherwise disposing of the plant. Now, that is the purpose of it. The time as given must be lived up to in good faith. But suppose, now, the——

Mr. SNELL. What was the object of putting in five years when you say in the next section that he can have all the time he wants?

Mr. SIMS. We do not say that. It is only for the purpose of disposing of it.

Mr. SNELL. Disposing of it is all there is, anyway.

Mr. SIMS. After the war is over.

Mr. SNELL. That is all there is to it—the question of disposing of these plants. In one place you say it must terminate in five years, and in section 8 you say that he can take any length of time he thinks is necessary.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no.

Mr. SNELL. Is not that the actual language of your bill?

Mr. SIMS. They could not operate it beyond that period. And how could it hurt? It would not be in competition with anybody.

Mr. SNELL. I can not understand what you mean, and I would like to have you explain why you say in one place he can have five years, and that that is the time, and then in the next section you say he can have all the time that is necessary.

Mr. SIMS. I will not confess that the bill needs an amendment; but when the amendment time comes the gentleman can offer one.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman certainly can not say that he has explained what those two sections mean and has answered my questions.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if I shall yield some time now?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], a member of the committee.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very sorry that the membership of this committee is not more largely represented at this time, not that I would desire them to hear the sound of my voice, nor even because I believe that my opinions would carry any weight on this subject. But the importance of this bill is so great, and the questions involved in it are so momentous, that I truly believe there should be a larger attendance of this committee in order that it might be informed of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman's position is very pertinent, and I would be very glad if there should be more Members present. There are 13 gentlemen present now, but one of them is a former Member. If the gentleman thinks that makes a large audience I will not make the point.

Mr. DEWALT. I believe I can talk a great deal better when I have only one as an audience, but the importance of the bill is of such a character that I truly think we are not performing our entire duty by absenting ourselves on an occasion of this kind.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I notice that the gentleman said he could speak much better where only one was present. I know he is young and unattached, and while he may have enjoyed talking to one he has not done so effectively up to this time.

Mr. DEWALT. No; but I am still seeking for that audience of one.

Now, the general scope of this bill is quite definite, although it is large. The general scope and purpose of it is to increase the electrical and mechanical power in the country.

In order that scope and purpose may be accomplished, certain things are provided for in the bill, and in order that those provisions may be strictly defined, certain terms are employed in the bill which are clearly and exclusively defined as to their meaning. In order, then, that one may get a comprehensive view of what the bill really means, the committee should be informed as to what the terms of the bill actually mean by their definition.

Now, a power plant, according to the terms of the bill, is a place where any power, either electrical or mechanical, may be generated. Then when we speak of the word "operator" in the bill we not only include the actual operator of the plant, but we speak of the owner or the lessee or the manager of the plant, because all those terms are included under the general term "operator."

Then there is a very potential term used in the bill, and that is the word "acquire," because the President under the terms of this bill is given the right to acquire property, private property, public-utility property, private property of the nature of plants used for the generation of electric power; the power to acquire land, if you please, in order that he may use it in the establishment of these various plants. And therefore it is clearly necessary for the understanding of this bill that the meaning of the word "acquire" should be ascertained, and this word "acquire" means that the President has the right to take by condemnation; that he has the right to take by purchase; that he has the right to obtain by lease; and that he has the right to take the absolute title of the property which he deems necessary to the accomplishment of the purposes of this bill.

So that, whilst this bill is under consideration, it seems to me that it is worthy of the serious thought of the membership of the committee as to whether or not some of the suggestions that have come to the minds of others might not at least be enforced by proper amendments.

Now, the term "within the United States," which was just referred to a few moments ago by one of the gentlemen who were criticizing the provisions of the bill, means any territory within the United States, under the jurisdiction of the United States, so that the bill is all-embracing so far as geographical terms are considered.

And then the limit of time is also to be considered, and that was just referred to a few moments ago. The limit of time here, as to the general purposes of the bill, is six months after the proclamation of peace and the affirmation thereof is obtained, to wit, six months after the legal termination of the war; and then the other limitation of time is after five years to do certain things, to wit, the disposing of certain articles which are taken either by condemnation or lease; not so far, however, as disposing of plants which are solely and strictly erected by the Government itself. There the limitation is extended. In fact, there is no limitation except the one general limitation that the President shall have time for disposing of them, either by sale or otherwise, as the best interests of the Government may be determined.

Now, after laying out these ideas in regard to the bill, and the scope of the bill and the purpose of the bill, the next question logically will be, How is this to be accomplished? In other words, when you have an ailment, when you recognize the ill, then the logical thing to next determine is what is the remedy.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have read the testimony before the committee as diligently as I could, and I want to ask the gentleman whether there was any testimony produced before the committee indicating whether this bill was to be administered by a power administrator or by a corporation or how? Did the administration anticipate it in any way?

Mr. DEWALT. The power is all lodged in the President of the United States and such agents and employees as he himself may determine, and that would constitute the administrative function of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. So that the question of the agency to administer this bill is entirely open and entirely within the discretion of the President?

Mr. DEWALT. So I would say, sir, from the tenor of the bill.

Now, as I was about to say, before being properly interrupted by my friend from Minnesota, how are these purposes to be accomplished? According to the provisions of this bill the first thing that the President is given the power to do is to construct plants. In other words, the appropriation of $175,000,000, which this bill carries, would give him money enough, initially, to construct a plant. He might buy the lands upon which the plant is to be constructed. He can buy all the necessary appliances, machinery, and so forth, to construct this plant. The next thing he can do, according to the provisions of this bill, is that he may install in private plants such machinery and appliances as are necessary for the purposes of creating and generating this electrical power.

Mr. ESCH rose.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. DEWALT. I will yield first to my colleague on the committee [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. In reference to who would control, even if a corporation is created under the act and provided by the act, it is likely that the party designated by the President to manage all the other powers would also be designated as the one to manage the corporation.

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly. While the power is given under the bill to create a corporation, and while the power is given in the bill to buy the stock of an existing corporation, engaged within the contemplation of this bill, the bill also provides specifically that the Government must be the majority owner of such stock, so that always the control of the enterprise would be in the hands and in the power of the Government.

Now, not only is this power given to install in private plants the necessary muniments for the construction and generation of this power, but——

Mr. ANDERSON. Right there I would like to ask the gentleman whether he construes that section of the bill to which he has just referred to warrant the Government in installing these appliances and equipment without the consent of the owner?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, yes; there is no doubt about that. There is no doubt about that, because that follows as naturally as the flow of water downstream. When you give the President of the United States ample power to commandeer, the power to take, to acquire the title, of course, once having that, he has the power to install and improve as much as he pleases without the consent of the owner. But always there is the right of compensation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I observe that there is a limitation placed on that power for five years.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And then in section 8 there is no limitation whatever when the President has acquired the same property. Does the gentleman distinguish between those?

Mr. DEWALT. I do. The distinction in my mind is this, and I am frank to say that it is one that gave me considerable trouble in the committee. I am very honest in saying that I believe that section 8 was opening the door pretty wide, or, at least, setting it upon its hinges for opening, for public or governmental ownership of these utilities. I could not quite consistently make up my mind why in one place five years' limitation was placed upon it and no limitation in the other. But now it is clear that the five years' limitation applies to that matter in regard to private plants and installations and of the things in private plants and the taking over the establishment or the sale and the leasing of such plants which are in part controlled by the Government. But if the gentleman from Ohio will notice, section 8 has a different purpose—that the President "may retain any property and operate any plant, transmission lines, structures, facilities, or appliances, constructions carried on under the provisions of this act, for such time as he may deem necessary or advisable for the purpose of selling or otherwise disposing thereof."

Now, what plants or transmission lines are these? They are those that he has constructed or acquired under the provisions of this act, not those in which the title or the operation thereof remains in the original owners or operators, not those in which he has advanced money and taken security therefor by mortgage or otherwise, but those which he has actually taken over, which become, ipso facto, by such taking over, the property of the Government itself.

Section 8, therefore, without limitation applies only to that class of property, and I think properly so. In other words, the Government having become the actual owner of the structure, the actual owner of all property in the structures and appliances appurtenant thereto, must have time to dispose of the same, and the limitation in section 8 is expressed by the purpose of the section.

What limitation is that? The limitation that he shall hold it for one purpose and one purpose only, and that purpose is selling and disposing thereof. In other words, the limitation is not expressed in definite terms of years and months, but in legal phraseology it is determined by the purpose incorporated in the section itself, to wit, such time as may be reasonable for the disposition of property, either by sale or otherwise.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman's explanation is entirely clear as far as the plant constructed by the Government itself is concerned, but when you include with that these appliances it seems to me that they are covered by section 5, and that there is a distinction.

Mr. DEWALT. I admit in all fairness that the criticism on that portion of the bill is not only one which should have the serious thought of the committee, but one that agitated the minds of several members of the committee that have far larger experience than I have in these matters. I need not refer by name to the gentlemen on the committee, but there was that question always arising in the minds of several gentlemen whether there should not be in this very section a limitation in terms definitely fixed by tenure of years and months.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. I think there were a number of members of the committee that had that doubt, but I think there was no doubt on this proposition that if the Government used money to install electric equipment or construct dams, in that instance the Government ought not to be compelled to dispose of the property within five years, and perhaps no time; that the Government might primarily retain it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is not contemplated under this bill to build dams at all.

Mr. DEWALT. No; I am frank to say that the testimony of those interested in the prosecution of this work and the framing of the bill was to the effect that it would take too long to build dams. Nevertheless, as the gentleman from Wisconsin says, there are and will be occasions where the Government in the transaction of work will construct dams and spend money in this way. But the primary idea is that where the Government itself has, either by the act of condemnation or purchase, acquired the title, where it is engaged in official construction of work itself, Congress ought not to say to the President of the United States, "You must sell that property within five years whether the bargain be good, bad, or indifferent."

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. It has occurred to me since the bill was reported, in reference to paragraph 1, section 2, page 4, of the bill, the paragraph that the gentleman discussed, providing for the purchase of a power plant, that it carries no limitation.

Mr. DEWALT. I will come to that in a moment. The third power given under the provisions of this bill in order that it may be operative is that the Government has the right to advance money to the operators of these plants. And the operator of these plants includes not only the general manager thereof but includes the actual owner thereof, the lessee, or party who is actually running the concern. The Government, therefore, in order that this war may be prosecuted, and in order that this emergency may be met, has the right to make advances of money to the owners or the operators of these plants, taking as security therefor a first lien upon all the property; and in the contract for the giving of such money the bill states and provides that such security must be obtained; and further, that if default is made in the prompt payment either of the interest or the principal, that the property immediately upon such failure reverts to the Government again and becomes the property of the Government either for the leasing or for occupancy or for use and without any rental to be paid to the original owner.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I shall have to ask, by reason of these interruptions, for more time, if I can do so.

Mr. SIMS. How much time would the gentleman like to have?

Mr. DEWALT. Let me go on for a while and possibly I might get very tired.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman now have any idea how much time he might need?

Mr. DEWALT. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman, a member of the committee.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, further than that, the bill is very wide in another provision. It not only gives the President of the United States through his administrative function the right to build, to construct or install, to advance money, if you please, but it goes one step further, and that is this, that after such installation, after such construction, after perhaps advancement of money to the original proprietor or owner of the premises, and the taking over by the Government, the Government has the right to sell the power that is thus generated, and to sell the power where it is deemed it is best to be used for the emergency now existing or in the future to be occasioned. Therefore you see, gentlemen, the provisions of this bill are exceedingly wide. Not only does the bill provide that the Government, through the President of the United States, shall have the right to construct, that he shall have the right to install, that he shall have the right to improve, that he shall have the right to acquire, that he shall have the right to take over, but after he has done all or any of these things he shall have the further right to sell power that is generated. Now, further than that——

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. He can go even further than that, and he can control the distribution of the power which is generated by somebody else.

Mr. DEWALT. I am coming to that. If the gentleman will let me alone, possibly I will be able to answer all questions without the gentleman interposing them. The very next power that is given is the one the gentleman refers to, to require private power plants to transmit their power to other plants and to require all of their power for the United States. That is the very thing the gentleman refers to.

In other words, the provisions of this bill are so wide that the President of the United States can take all the power of one company and connect it with the power of another company, or he can say to Company A, "You must transmit your power to plant B or locality C, and you must, if you please, at my dictation, because the emergency demands it, in my opinion, transmit that power and omit plant C and give it all to plant B." And another power. He can merge, if you please, all or some of these companies, merge them by process of law, or he can merge them by taking them over and concentrating their powers. More than that. The bill goes further and says that after he has merged, or after he has taken over or after he acquires, which acquirement means taking over, by any of the processes I have indicated, he has the power to lease that very plant to you or to me, under certain provisions, and if we do not comply with those rental provisions or the contract specified by the Government itself, the plant returns to the Government and the Government has the right to release, again acquire the property, and lease to you or to me. Now, further than that. There is one provision in this bill which caused possibly a good deal of comment in the committee, which ought to have serious consideration by this committee. The President is given authority under this bill to modify, cancel, or annul any contract now existing at this time or in future contemplation by any of these power plants. The gentleman from Philadelphia may own a power plant. He has made a contract, if you please, with the transit company of Philadelphia to furnish 20,000 kilowatts of power in a specified time. That contract is running for a period, say, of five years at a certain rental. The power that is given the President of the United States under this bill would allow him to-morrow morning, if he saw fit, to annul, modify, or cancel that contract and say to the gentleman from Philadelphia, who owns the power plant, "You must divert that power, not to the transit company of Philadelphia but you must give it to Hog Island, the shipbuilding industry." Therefore I repeat what I said but a moment ago that the provisions of this bill are of such momentous importance that I do trust that somebody who is better informed than I and better able to express the sentiments of the committee than I will plainly set forth to the membership of this committee the serious proposition we have on hand.

The railroad legislation was important; the taxing legislation was important; but the wide powers contained in this, the far-reaching effects, in my judgment, are even more important than those, because they were temporary in their nature, while these will lead to permanent ownership, if you please, if the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio is worth consideration.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. SNOOK. Referring to the power conferred by this bill to modify contracts, I suppose my colleague is referring to paragraph 14, page 10.

Mr. DEWALT. No; it is on page 8.

Mr. SNOOK. Paragraph 14, on page 10?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not know the number. No; it is page 8, paragraph 9:

> In furtherance of any of the foregoing purposes, to modify, cancel, or suspend any existing or future contracts for the delivery of power to any person not engaged in the production of raw material—

And so forth.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. ESCH. This power to annul contracts is not new. It is contained in the national-defense act of April 3, 1916.

Mr. DEWALT. We are not going into a new field; but while we are not going into a new field, notwithstanding let us be careful of the steps we are taking in the plowed field that is not new, because in effect this is virtually a new enterprise, to wit, the going of the Government into the generating of electric power, mechanical power, and the control over it.

Now, whilst I am quite anxious to go on with the further provisions of this bill I recognize my time is limited, and I recognize, too, that there are others here who are far more able to illustrate and to explain the provisions of this bill than I am. But whilst this thing is under consideration let it not be forgotten, gentlemen of the committee, that there is one saving clause in it all and one great saving feature in it all, that whilst these extraordinary powers are given to the President of the United States and to the administrative officers that he may select, nevertheless the bill provides that none of this property, that none of these appliances, that none of the private property of the individual can be taken unless due compensation is given by law. Of course, that would have followed without any provision in the bill, because no man's property can be taken for public purposes, except in case of war and immediate peril, unless due compensation is given. But this bill provides that compensation shall be given in a certain way, to wit, that if agreement can be made, then compensation is to be paid, but the President is to determine in the first instance how much the compensation shall be, and if they can not agree 75 per cent is to be paid by the Government, and as to the remainder the party is to be relegated to the Court of Claims.

Mr. GOOD. Suppose a party enters into a contract for the sale and delivery of certain machines within a specified time, and that the man that has manufactured them has purchased his raw material and has entered into a contract with a private power company for his power; now, the Government takes the power away from him, and he is obliged to fail on his contract; then the person to whom he has sold the machines would, of course, have the right of action to recover damages for failure to perform the contract.

Mr. DEWALT. Generally speaking, he would; yes.

Mr. GOOD. Would he not in this case?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; I think he would in this case.

Mr. GOOD. Then what would be the remedy of the person who had been obliged to respond in damages, if any?

Mr. DEWALT. The only remedy that the party would have, in my judgment, would be to present his claim before the proper jurisdiction, to wit, the President of the United States, and if the President ignored the claim he would have to be relegated to the Court of Claims. However, the field is such a wide one and would lead to such interminable litigation that I think that the Court of Claims would recognize the validity of the claim, it being one of the incidents of war. But this can be truly said, that the basic proposition is that you can not take property for public purposes unless you pay for it. Now, if that is sound as a legal proposition, then what follows? Then you must inquire as to what is property. Now, is the contract, such as you have illustrated, property? My judgment is that it is a contract, it is a thing of value to me, which I have contracted for with you, to wit, to furnish you so many machines at a specified period and at a specified price. Now, the Government intervenes and prevents me from fulfilling the contract, and then, therefore, I am at a loss. A loss of what? The benefit of my contract. It stands in my mind as a legal proposition that if the Government does that it must be responsible. That is my judgment.

Mr. HAMLIN. If my Government intervenes and prohibits the carrying out of my contract in the interest of the people and in the interest of the life of the Nation under the war power, could he recover from me?

Mr. DEWALT. That is dependent entirely on how far you determine the war power.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am inclined to think the gentleman was in error awhile ago when he said he would have to respond in damages.

Mr. DEWALT. The Supreme Court of the United States has gone so far in stretching the Constitution, not only in the last few years but some time prior to that—and I say this in no criticism at all of the Supreme Court, because their judgment is so much better than any set of men who are lawyers, or any other men, that it would be a profundity of ignorance to make such assertion—but the Constitution has been stretched, not to the breaking point but to the limit almost of extremity. I do not believe the Constitution can be stretched so far as to take property of that kind unless the peril is immediate. If the peril is immediate, I agree with you.

Mr. HAMLIN. Any peril in war time is always immediate, and the very taking of this property by the President is in the interest of the party who claims he is damaged.

Mr. DEWALT. That is where you and I disagree as lawyers. I do not believe you can take property under the war power of the Government unless you pay for it, except the peril is present and the danger is immediate. And that is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but he is one of the best lawyers in the House.

Mr. DEWALT. I think that is saying very little for the rest of us.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It seems to me that this bill has gone infinitely further than we have ever gone before. I want to be able to vote for it, because I believe it has some absolutely necessary power. I would like to ask the gentleman how he interprets the amendment on page 14, at the bottom of the page, that the appropriation is to be made available during the time the act is in effect? Does that mean until the act is repealed? Would it not take a formal action of Congress?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think there is any doubt about that. I think that is the proper legal construction of the phraseology.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Reluctantly I yield back all the time I did not use.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used all his time. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I listened with very great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT]. I quite agree with him that this bill is more important and more far-reaching in the powers which it grants than any bill which we have heretofore passed. I make that assertion because the bills which we have heretofore passed granting powers to the executive branch of the Government have been limited to the doing of acts which were clearly necessary to carry on the war and were limited to the war period.

I think, in general, it must be said in addition that most of the laws which we have heretofore passed have contained some general declaration of policy by which the executive branch of the Government must be governed in executing them, while this bill leaves the policy, and the administrative machinery as well, entirely to the discretion of the Executive.

We have become accustomed to making great grants of power. I think we have become so accustomed to it that we do not scrutinize proposed legislation with the care which a due regard for the functions of this House and of the Congress require. The best evidence of that fact is that there are on the floor at this moment less than 20 Members of the House.

I assert that this bill is not a war measure, and when I make that assertion I do not refer to the purposes of the bill. In its purposes it is a war measure. It seeks to permit to be done things which are essential to be done in the conduct of the war. But it is not a war measure in the sense that the powers conferred in the bill must necessarily be exercised with reference to the things which are connected with the prosecution of the war or are limited to the period of the war.

In this connection it is significant that the jurisdictional clause which has been contained in every one, I think, of the bills which we have heretofore passed, and which declares that it is essential to do certain things in order to carry on the war, has been omitted from the bill now under consideration.

There are some other clauses in the bill which contain intrinsic evidence of the fact that the powers conferred by this bill are not intended to be limited to the war period or necessarily to war activities. I call attention to the definition, for instance, of "war material." "The term 'war material' means any material or commodity which, in the opinion of the President, it may at any time"—not during the war period—"be necessary or important to produce"—not for war purposes, but to produce for any reason—"or of which he may deem it necessary or important to increase the production."

It is quite evident that this definition does not limit the President to increasing the facilities for the production of things which are essential for the carrying on of the war.

Now, I refer again to a section of the bill to which reference has already been made—section 8: "That the President may retain any property"—and the definition of "property" under this bill is very wide indeed—"and operate any plants"—and that is not limited to power plants—"transmission lines, structures, facilities, or appliances constructed or acquired"—and the definition of "acquired" is a very broad definition under this bill—"under the provisions of this act for such time as he may deem necessary or advisable for the purpose of selling or otherwise disposing thereof." That is practically unlimited. That is, he may hold this property indefinitely. That that is its purpose is indicated by the last paragraph on page 13, because that paragraph provides—

Except as is herein otherwise provided all other authority granted to the President by the provisions of this act shall cease at the termination of the war period.

Now, these provisions, taken together, are extremely important if we consider what may be done under some of the sections of this bill. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] whether there was any testimony as to how this bill was to be administered or by what sort of an agency. Every witness who appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—and I have read the testimony with some diligence—evaded an answer to every question that was asked intending to anticipate the character of the agency which was to administer this law. We do not know whether there will be a "power administrator," who will exercise as a Government official the functions of this bill or whether there will be a corporation organized whose directors will have no responsibility to the Government at all except the responsibility which they owe to the Government as a stockholder in the corporation to carry out the purposes of the act. Either of these methods or an entirely different method may be used.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the Government must at all times be a majority stockholder in this corporation or in the corporations created or organized for the purposes of the act. I deny that. I direct attention to paragraph 11 of section 2:

If in his judgment such action shall be necessary or useful for the purpose of this act to form one or more corporations under the laws of any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States for the purchase, construction, extension, lease, maintenance, or operation of any such power plants or facilities.

Now, listen:

Or for the merger or consolidation of any private power plants—

This authorizes the organization of a holding corporation.

I quote again:

or for the purchase of the whole or any part of the capital stock thereof.

Let me emphasize the fact that under this paragraph the holding corporation may purchase a minority of the stock of an operating corporation.

In other words, while the Government must be a majority stockholder in a corporation organized for the purpose of holding the stock of other corporations, it need not be the holder of a majority of the stock of any operating company.

Now, it seems to me perfectly clear, in the first place, that if the Government is to form a corporation for the purpose of controlling the manufacture and distribution of power, the Government ought to own all of the stock in that corporation; and, secondly, it seems to me perfectly clear that if the Government purchases the stock of an operating company it ought not to purchase less than a majority of the stock of that operating company.

I think we may all feel a good deal of misgiving about this method of conducting governmental business and controlling private industry. It is axiomatic that the obligations of a director of a corporation to a stockholder in that corporation are in no sense identical or in no sense equivalent to the obligations which an officer of the Government owes to the Government.

The obligations of a director or officer of a corporation in which the Government is a stockholder are not different than they would be if the Government was not a stockholder. We are proposing under this bill to control the manufacture and disposition of power through a piece of machinery, the officers and directors and managers of which will have no obligation at all to the Federal Government, except such obligations as are imposed upon the directors of any corporation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The power is here given to lend money to finance the corporation.

Mr. ANDERSON. The power given in this bill is not confined to lending; the language is broad enough so that the Government could give it outright if it wanted to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think that is true; but so far as the lending is concerned does not the gentleman think that that absolutely conflicts with the powers granted to the War Finance Corporation?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not familiar with the provisions of that act as is the gentleman from Ohio, and his opinion would be worth much more than mine.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The power is given exceptionally to the Government to finance corporations which in its judgment are contributing to war work.

Mr. ANDERSON. The difference is that the War Finance Corporation must require certain security, while under this bill no security at all need be required. The money advanced, or a part of it, is to be taken and considered as applied to the amortization of the plant, and at the end of the war period repayment of the amount applied to amortization is waived. I find no fault with this if it can be done by somebody who has more responsibility to the Government and to the people of the country than attaches to a director in a private corporation.

Under the provisions of paragraph 11, section 2, a holding corporation could be formed for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this act with a capital stock limited only by the appropriations made by the act or which might be made to carry it into effect. The Government would be required to own not less than 51 per cent of the capital stock. The minority stockholders might be any persons whomsoever. They might also be stockholders in competing corporations or in corporations directly interested in power or traction rates.

Presumably the minority stockholders would have representation upon the board of directors. These directors might also be directors in competing corporations or interested in other private corporations affected by rates or charges for power.

This holding corporation might purchase and control either a majority or a minority of the stock of any private power plant, the officers and directors of which would have no obligation whatever to the United States and no obligation whatever to the holding corporation except the obligation that attaches to an officer or director of a private corporation as such to the corporation stockholders.

Within the limits of the appropriations made for that purpose the holding corporation could consolidate the stock ownership of private power plants within any given area, and by virtue of such stock ownership and control obtain a complete or partial monopoly of the market.

At the termination of the war the President would be confronted with the necessity either of retaining the control of the holding corporation thus created or transferring or selling the stock of the same, which would result in giving the private stockholders in the holding corporation the monopoly previously enjoyed by the Government.

I do not object to the creation of a corporation the whole of whose stock shall be owned by the United States for the purpose of financing the power extensions which may be necessary for the prosecution of the war. I do not think the proposition of creating corporations for the actual operation of plants wholly owned by the Government is altogether objectionable, but the creation of a holding corporation empowered and designed to control the manufacture and distribution of power through partial stock ownership in private power plants whose directors have no responsibility or obligation as officers of the Government is a proposition so opposed to the principles upon which government itself is instituted, and is at the same time so unnecessary to the accomplishment of the purposes of this bill, that it ought not to receive the approval of the House.

It is not necessary or wise that the Government itself should assume the obligations of a stockholder in private power plants created under the various laws of many States in order to carry out this act, nor is it desirable that the tremendous, far-reaching powers of this act, which will extend, under its present terms, long beyond the end of the war, should be exercised by persons whose responsibilities and obligations are those of private directors of private corporations and not those of public officials.

It is worth while remembering in this connection that power plants are frequently connected with public utility corporations by direct ownership and by interlocking directorates and stockholders.

It is claimed by those who are responsible for this bill that the ownership on the part of the Government of any part of the equipment or facilities of a power plant will be sufficient to enable the Government to fix the rates of power and perhaps incidentally rates to be charged by public utilities operated in connection with power plants. If these gentlemen are correct, and if we are to assume that the policy which has animated the management and control of the railroads, the telegraphs, and the telephones is to be adopted in the management and control of power plants, it is safe to predict that within six months after the passage of this bill there will be a general increase of power rates and probably in the rates of connected public utility corporations.

It is also worth remembering in this connection that the Railroad Administration in the case of the railroads and the Postmaster General in the case of the telegraphs and the telephones claims the right to fix rates without any reference whatever to valuation or to any other known basis of rate making and without regard to the powers of State commissions.

It may be that I am unduly apprehensive of what may happen as the result of the exercise of the powers conferred in this bill. If the exercise of these powers were confined to the war period and it were possible at the end of the war period to determine the questions which the exercise of this power will raise, we might well grant the power as being necessary to the conduct of the war, leaving the questions of policy after the war to be determined when the war is over, but the powers conferred by this legislation continue for a long period and in some instances for an indefinite period after the termination of the war and must therefore be regarded both with reference to the conditions which now exist and the conditions which may exist after the war.

If there is any virtue in democracy, that virtue lies in the fact that the genius and purpose of every citizen, however humble, may find expression in the laws by which he is governed and in fixing the responsibility of those who administer the law to the people who make it. If a holding corporation is organized under the paragraph to which I have referred, and that corporation in its turn owns the stock of private power plants, the responsibility for the efficient and honest management and expenditure of the Government's funds will be thereby twice removed, and the difficulty of control and regulation after the war rendered doubly difficult. I would not like to see this situation arise.

Mr. ESCH. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have approached this bill—and the vast powers it grants—with awe. I have given it the most careful consideration. I am known as a conservative who believes that ordinarily the Government should assume no functions that can properly be left to private enterprise. But these are war times. The case is extraordinary, and I am convinced of three propositions:

First. That authority must be given to the President to control and increase the power of this country. It is a necessity.

Second. That under the varying circumstances that exist no limitation should be put upon his discretion as to how his authority should be exercised.

Third. That in order to prevent his control from growing into a Government power monopoly, or something like it after the war, the time in which his authority should be exercised should be strictly limited to the war period, defined by this bill as six months after the President's declaration of the ratification of the treaty of peace, which will probably be more than a year after the termination of the war, during which time Congress could make any provision for extension of time or special cases.

I. THE NECESSITY THAT CONFRONTS US.

Fifteen minutes is a short time to discuss these three matters, but I want to give some of the reasons. This bill is necessary, for alas, we have increased production by leaps and bounds because of the war, and every horsepower of production needs power. Our coal supply as well as railroad transportation have been deficient, and relief has been sought by most of these new factories from the private power plants which, by reason of employing less labor in one plant than are employed in 50 boiler houses can supply power cheaper and better. They can divide the power between factories that work by day and factories that work by night. They can avoid hauling coal by sending power through the wires. Additions to these plants have become absolutely necessary.

The President may take over existing plants under section 12 of the food and fuel conservation act of August 10, 1917, public No. 41, which I shall ask permission to put in my remarks; and, Mr. Chairman, I ask leave generally to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I insert that section:

SEC. 12. That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant, or any part thereof, in or through which any necessaries are or may be manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined, and to operate the same. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, is not essential for the national security or defense, the same shall be restored to the person entitled to the possession thereof. The United States shall make just compensation, to be determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, and operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof. If the compensation so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code. The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for carrying out the purposes of this section, including the operation of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, the purchase, sale, or other disposition of articles used, manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined therein, and the employment, control, and compensation of employees. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the use or operation of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for the purpose of the continued use or operation of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, and the accounts of each such factory, mine, plant, or part thereof, shall be kept separate and distinct. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The section gives power to the President to take over any manufacturing plant for production that is necessary for war purposes. That might include the production of power. He takes it only for the period of the war. The United States is to pay any damages done by such taking. The act is well drawn and understood. It is my opinion that probably all the good in this bill could be had by adding a short section allowing the increase of power plants. It is not enough to commandeer existing plants, because they are hopelessly insufficient.

II. THE PRESIDENT'S DISCRETION CAN NOT BE LIMITED.

Existing power plants have been overloaded. Some of them have worn-out boilers and machinery and are going, but are in danger of breaking down. Others are in the wrong place. The testimony shows that New York has enough power and more, while Newark has not enough, and they are building a line to Newark to take care of the shipyards.

The same conditions exist elsewhere. In some cases it is an addition to the plant that is needed. In some places it is connections; in some places it is distributing lines; in some places an entirely new plant must be constructed.

The remedies are different. The eastern districts are in charge of three departments of the Government. The War Department has been trying to take care of the Pittsburgh district, and very probably there will be new plants established there, large plants, near the coal mines, so as to burn culm and avoid the carrying of coal by distributing power. The Navy Department has charge of the Philadelphia district. The Emergency Fleet Corporation has charge of the New Jersey district. Not only those districts, but New England and the West are crying for power to-day to do their war work. Another complication is that these power plants which would be taken over by the Government are doing other work that is just as essential. They are furnishing light to our towns. Some of them have gasworks annexes. Some of them in my own and many other towns are furnishing power for the running of electric cars. It is a more complicated system that is growing up amongst us than could ever be imagined.

Our grandparents would have laughed if we had told them that such a thing would be so, but the whole community as to power is being supplied very much as the whole body of man is moved, by the pumping of a single heart. No law can limit the ways in which this shall be done. In some cases the President may think it expedient to go to the existing power-plant owner and lend him money to finance his plant without the security that would be demanded by the finance board. These great power plants are not able to borrow money in these days, not only because the United States is borrowing so much, but because they fear that the enlargements may not be useful or valuable after the war. Possibly they judge wrongly on that subject. I believe that after the war the enlargement of our manufactures will be such that all power will be in demand and that these improvements will pay. The owners tell us that the cost of labor and construction is so great that the plants would be worth less then. This bill, therefore, gives a wide discretion; it can not be limited. It gives a discretion of lending by providing funds which are to be returned, while the title to the additions and improvements is to remain in the Government until the loan is returned. The bill provides in case of necessity for lending money with an agreement that if within five years after the war or some period after the war—I would say at the end of the war—the property is not worth so much as was spent on it, it shall be taken over by the owner of the plant at an appraised valuation. It provides also in case of necessity, which I hope will not arise, that the Government may build new plants. It covers all that ground, Mr. Chairman. It can do no less. We shall have to leave those three authorities, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, to deal with discretion in matters which they have in charge, but which we know nothing about. We can not provide how that discretion shall be exercised.

III. THE PRESIDENT'S AUTHORITY SHOULD BE LIMITED TO THE WAR PERIOD.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I believe.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am.

Mr. HAMLIN. And a good lawyer, too. I want to ask him this question. I entirely agree with the statement made a moment ago that the authority of the President ought to be limited to the war period.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am coming to that now.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me ask this question. The gentleman can discuss it. I find on page 18 that the authority of the President is limited to the period when the war terminates.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Let we take the sections up in their order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Except as herein otherwise provided——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There are a great many places to be amended.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to inquire of some of the things——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have only five minutes left. I thought we might discuss this under the five-minute rule. However, I think it well to state what amendments ought to be made to the bill. On page 4 of the bill, at line 21, the President, for instance, is empowered to enlarge an existing plant and allow it to be run by agents or contractors or through the proprietor of the plant. He is also allowed to lease the machinery, appliances, and structures to the operator of that plant. If the operator of the plant is willing to lease and take the structure, to put in his machinery, why should not the right of the President to lease the power to that contractor end with the period of the war?

The section adds five years more. I insert it as an extension:

(2) For the purpose of increasing the capacity or productivity of any private power plant within the boundaries of the United States to install in any such plant any structure, machinery, or appliances that he may deem useful to that end, either through agents or contractors employed by him, or by providing the operator of such plant with funds to be applied to that purpose; to lease the machinery, appliances, and structures thus installed or any parts thereof to the operator of such plant for the war period or for such period thereafter not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period, as he may deem expedient in the interest of the United States, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable; and to enter into contracts requiring or permitting the lessee to purchase such appliances, machinery, and structures, or parts thereof, at or before the termination of such lease at their then value, or upon such other terms as he may deem equitable for the protection of the interests of the United States and of the community served by such lessee.

It says that he can lease for the war period or for such period thereafter not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period, as he may deem expedient. I see no necessity of leasing machinery that is part of a going factory to the operator of the plant who contracts to buy that machinery for a term going beyond the period of the war.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman, I think, did not get my question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am coming to the gentleman's question; I am going over some others.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wanted the gentleman to point out some particular thing that does not end with the period of the war, so far as the power of the President is concerned.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is one. Now, the second one is page 6, where power has been lodged to make advances to an operator for equipment or expansion, and it provides for a valuation after the war of the property that has been put in the mill and says that the valuation can be made at the termination of the war period or not more than five years afterward. It reads:

(3) To aid in equipping any private power plant or in expanding any such plant to such extent as he may direct by making advances, upon such terms and conditions as he may determine, to the person operating or authorized to operate it, and in connection with such advances, to agree with such person that, if the actual reasonable cost of equipping or expanding such plant shall be in excess of its value at the termination of the war period, or at such later time not more than five years after the expiration of the war period, as he may deem reasonable for such valuation, and the machinery, structures, or appliances constituting such extension or expansion, or their equivalent, shall have been maintained and operated in accordance with his directions until such time, repayment of the whole or any part of such excess will be waived, and to provide by agreement for the manner of determining such costs and values by arbitration or otherwise and for the terms and time of such repayment: Provided, That the powers conferred by this subdivision shall be exercised only if the President shall deem that the emergency is such as to render it impracticable or undesirable to act with respect to such plant under any of the other powers conferred by this act.

The President ought to have no power, no one should have power, to tie up the whole of that mill, in which new equipment has been placed, for five years after the war. The valuation could be better ascertained when the war ends. There may be and is likely to be a great falling off in value in five years after the war which will not take place immediately. After the Civil War values rose until 1870 and then they began to fall. The United States ought to determine that value then at the end of the war. Now, the section mentioned by the gentleman is contained on page 7, line 20, where the President is allowed to lease the property owned by the Government to outside parties for the war period or such period thereafter not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period, on such terms as he may deem reasonable:

(8) To lease for the war period or for such period thereafter not exceeding five years or for any shorter period and upon such terms as he may deem reasonable, to any person or body politic for use or operation by such person or body politic, any plant, transmission line, or other property or part thereof, constructed or acquired pursuant to the provisions of this act.

Why so? I think the war period is enough. That is, six months after the declaration of the treaty of peace. During the time, after the war actually ends, we can deal with such questions.

Again, on page 9, it says that if the President uses public rights, he shall not alienate those public rights or franchises for any term in excess of five years after the war period upon any terms or conditions other than those prescribed by the sovereignty:

(12) To sell or exchange any plants or structures constructed by him and any property to which he shall have taken title, and any rights acquired by him, whenever in his opinion the interests of the United States will be furthered by such sale or exchange: Provided, That no public right acquired by him shall be alienated for any term in excess of five years after the war period, upon any terms or conditions other than those prescribed by the sovereignty from which such public rights shall have been acquired.

What right have we to say that he shall give outside parties rights against the State or municipality except during the war period? The phrase "five years after" should be struck out.

And again, on page 12, section 8, the first clause says:

SEC. 8. That the President may retain any property and operate any plants, transmission lines, structures, facilities, or appliances constructed or acquired under the provisions of this act for such time as he may deem necessary or advisable for the purpose of selling or otherwise disposing thereof.

And in the same section, page 13, lines 15 to 18, if the owner of any plant where machinery is installed fail to pay—the President may acquire title to such power plant and may thereafter sell it or maintain and operate it for such time as he may deem necessary for the purpose of protecting the interests of the United States.

These rights should certainly extend not over one year after the war period, but I should say not exceeding the war period, if I would carry out my notion. He has no need to maintain and operate beyond the needs of the war time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Have I answered the gentleman?

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman has in a way, and yet not entirely. Perhaps I got a little confused by the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] a moment ago. I understood him to speak of this as being, some portions of it, permanent law.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It ought not to be permanent law.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is any portion of it permanent law?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It comes very near it when it gives absolute authority to maintain and operate.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is what I was getting at. Of course, there must be a short period at the close of the war to give the President opportunity to close up these transactions.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. This gives six months in the beginning, after the declaration of the ratification of the treaty of peace. It is long enough.

Now, under the food act section, he has to the end of the war; under the railroad act, he has 21 months thereafter; under the telegraph act it is a shorter time. Five years in some cases and unlimited time, only limited by discretion, in others is all wrong. This Congress, if we desire to protect the United States as well as private citizens, should make a limit.

You will notice that on line 22 of page 13 it says:

The termination of the President's authority shall not affect any contract executed.

How long may those contracts run? I suppose it refers to these leases, but no contract should be executed which would go beyond the period of the war.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does not the gentleman figure that section 8 is permanent law if the President desires to make it so?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No. I think it gives a very large discretion, but that that discretion would be limited by the fact that whereas, in the railroad act we had power to grant permanent rights as to railroads as instruments of interstate commerce, our authority over those power plants under the Constitution of the United States ceases within the war period and a reasonable time thereafter. And I do not think, therefore, that section 8 should be construed so as to be unconstitutional. The words "reasonable period" should be read into the language wherever it occurs; "for such reasonable time as he may deem necessary."

Mr. EDMONDS. That might be possible if you put the word "reasonable" in there.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think the word "reasonable" must be implied if you are dealing with this subject, under the Constitution.

I thank the gentlemen for their consideration. If there are any more questions which gentlemen wish to ask during the remainder of my five minutes I will be glad to answer them; if not, I will yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] two minutes.

TOWNLEYISM.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I have been embarrassed and shamed and have been obliged to apologize for the good name of my State many times yesterday and to-day on account of many Members of the House calling my attention to the following news article which appeared prominently on the front page of the Washington Post of yesterday, September 25, 1918:

RUN CANDIDATE FROM TOWN—NONPARTISAN LEAGUE NOMINEE FOR GOVERNOR BARRED FROM BRITTON.

ABERDEEN, S. DAK., September 24.

Mark P. Bates, candidate for governor of South Dakota on the Nonpartisan League ticket, and A. C. Townley, Nonpartisan League organizer, were driven from Britton, S. Dak., to-day by a mob when they attempted to make a campaign speech there, according to reports received here.

When the nonpartisan members arrived in Britton they were met by a crowd of farmers and townspeople numbering between 200 and 300, who locked the town hall and refused to permit them to speak. They were then marched to the county line, reports said.

I have been asked if this fellow Townley who is referred to in the article is the same demagogue and socialist who, Leninelike, bosses politics in North Dakota and who in my State has succeeded in having nominated on the Republican ticket for election in November his hand-picked and "Townley-indorsed" candidates for all State and congressional offices. I have been asked if this is the same Townley whose league in the June primaries spent thousands of dollars of money extracted by his solicitors and agents from North Dakota farmers in its unsuccessful efforts to nominate as the Republican candidate for governor in the State of Minnesota C. A. Linberg, the author of the infamous antiwar and pro-German booklet, "Why your country is at war and what happens to you after the war." I have been asked if this is the same Townley the many pro-German and pacifist members of whose league were so enthusiastically interested in the renomination for Congress of Mr. LUNDEEN, from Minnesota.

I have been asked if this is the same Townley who, knowing my long record of activity and success in Congress in behalf of Federal legislation in the interest of those engaged in farming and in the interest of greater and better agricultural development throughout the Nation, and who, having secretly rankling in his narrow socialist and antiwar mind the knowledge of my strong support of our country's declarations of war against Germany and against Austria and my unwavering support of every measure that has been before Congress for a vigorous and effective support of our part in the war, opposed personally and through the organization of his league my renomination for Congress on the Republican ticket in North Dakota at the recent primaries in my State. I have been asked if this is the same Boss Townley who indorsed and set up as his candidate for Congress in opposition to me a man who, when the war lords of Germany were heaping insult after insult upon this country, and when these brutal German war lords announced that the peaceful ships of this then neutral Nation would not be permitted to make voyages from the United States to England unless they gave notice to Germany of the time of their sailing and landing, painted themselves with certain barber-pole stripes prescribed by the war lords, and passed through a certain German-prescribed path on the high seas, was writing and petitioning Congress that these outrageous insults and demands on the part of Germany should not be considered as a cause of war, but should be bowed down to by these United States. It is with great embarrassment and regret that I have been obliged to confess that this A. C. Townley referred to is the same Lenine-like demagogue who so many of the honest and well-meaning farmers of my State have been deceived and misled into believing will lead them into agricultural gardens of Eden where they will have all the fruits of the world for themselves and be free from all the present struggles and strifes of man for existence and progress in this world.

I do not wish to take the time of the House now to discuss the bolshevikism of Townley and the coterie of demagogues, socialists, and I. W. W. sympathizers with whom he has closely surrounded himself. I wish merely to say to my friends on both sides of the House that while the good State of North Dakota and the good people of that State are being injured and disgraced by this reign of Townleyism, it, like other false, unsound, and dangerous isms, will soon pass away. For many years my State was cursed and enthralled by McKenzie bossism. After some hard and bitter political struggles the State became rid of this evil bossism, which was nurtured by railroad and other corporate business interests. Now Townley bossism, upheld and supported by the most unscrupulous appeals to class prejudices, by demagogism in its lowest form, and by attractive but impractical socialistic economics, has the State government in its grasp. It will not, however, I am sure, be long until the sound mass of intelligent and thoughtful farmers in my State perceive Townleyism in its true character, when it will be discredited and Townley and his coterie of political grafters and sycophants will be obliged to seek other fields for their operations. Former President Theodore Roosevelt, who long has been one of the truest and stanchest friends in public life of the farmer and laboring man, discusses very tritely and forcefully the evils of Townleyism in the following article which recently appeared as an editorial in the Kansas City Star:

THEODORE ROOSEVELT WARNS OF BOLSHEVISTS IN AMERICA.

GOOD LUCK TO THE ANTIBOLSHEVIKISTS.

(By Theodore Roosevelt.)

The absolute prerequisite for successful self-government in any people is the power of self-restraint which refuses to follow either the wild-eyed extremists of radicalism or the dull-eyed extremists of reaction. Either set of extremists will wreck the nation just as certainly as the other. The nation capable of self-government must show the Abraham Lincoln quality of refusing to go with either. The dreadful fall which has befallen Russia is due to the fact that when her people cast off the tyranny of the autocracy they did not have sufficient self-control and common sense to avoid rushing to the other extreme and plunging headlong into the gulf of Bolshevist anarchy.

HIGH-BROW BOLSHEVISTS DANGEROUS.

In this country there are plenty of high-brow Bolshevists, who like to think of themselves as intellectuals and who, in parlors and at pink teas, preach Bolshevism as a fad. They are fatuously ignorant that it may be a dangerous fad. Some of them are mere make-believe, sissy Bolshevists, almost or quite harmless. Others are sincere and foolish fanatics who mean well and do not realize that their doctrines tend toward moral disintegration. But there are practical Bolshevists in this country who are in no sense high brows. The I. W. W. and the Nonpartisan League, just as long and so far as its members submit to the domination of leaders like Mr. Townley, represent the forces that under Lenine and Trotzky have brought ruin to Russia. If these organizations obtained power here, they would cast this country into the same abyss with Russia.

The I. W. W. activities have been officially set forth by the Chicago jury which found the I. W. W. leaders guilty of treasonable practices. These leaders protested that they were only trying to help "the wage slave of to-day" and had not taken German money. But the jury found them guilty as charged. The American people, when fully awake and aroused, will tolerate neither treason nor anarchy. No Americans are more patriotic than the honest American labor men, and these, above all, had cause to rejoice in the verdict. Undoubtedly there are plenty of people ignorant who join the I. W. W. because they feel that they do not receive justice. We should, all of us, actively unite in the effort to right any wrongs from which these men suffer. But we should set our faces like flint against such criminal leadership as that of the I. W. W.

SOUGHT ALLIANCE WITH THE I. W. W.

The Nonpartisan League endeavored to ally itself with the I. W. W. since we entered the war. When the league was started I felt much sympathy with its avowed purposes. I hope for and shall welcome wisely radical action on behalf of the former. But only destruction to all of us can come from the venomous class hatred preached by the present leadership of the league. Some of its leaders have been convicted and imprisoned for treasonable activities. Some of the league representatives have been actively pro-German. Some of them are Socialists or Socialist-Anarchists. For the first six months of the war and until it became too dangerous they were openly against the war, against our allies, and for Germany.

The only half secret alliance between these leaders and certain high Democratic politicians is deeply discreditable to the latter. The victory of the league in its recent efforts to gain control of the Republican Party in Minnesota and Montana would have given immense strength to the pro-German and Bolshevist element throughout the country, and the defeat was a matter of rejoicing to all right-minded and patriotic men. Mr. Townley's leadership, in its moral purpose and national effect, entitles him to rank with Messrs. Lenine and Trotzky, and the utterances of the league's official organ, especially in its appeal to class hatred, puts the official representative of the league squarely in the clan with the Bolshevist leaders who have done such evil in Russia.

I have before me an official letter from the league, written in January last, refusing to cooperate in nonpolitical work for the benefit of the farmers, saying "this organization is a political one, the farmers being organized for the purpose of controlling legislation in their own interests." In other words, the title "nonpartisan" is a piece of pure hypocrisy, and its league is really partisan in the narrowest and worst sense. Americans should organize politically as Americans, and not as bankers or lawyers or farmers or wageworkers. To organize politically on the basis adopted by the league is thoroughly anti-American and unpatriotic and, if copied generally by our citizens, would mean the creation in this country of rival political parties based on cynically brutal class selfishness.

I have no doubt that the rank and file of the members of the league are good, honest people, who have been misled. I am certain that there has been much neglect of the right of the farmers, and that it is a high duty for this country to begin a constructive, practical agricultural policy. But no good American can support the league while it is dominated by its present leadership. The Kansas citizens who have joined to fight the league because it represents Bolshevism are rendering a patriotic service to America.

The following letter, which was one of the Government's exhibits introduced in evidence at the recent trial at Chicago of a hundred members of the I. W. W., was written by Arthur Le Sueur, Mr. Townley's right-hand man in the Nonpartisan League headquarters at St. Paul, Minn., and shows his connection with William D. Haywood and the I. W. W. Haywood, it will be recalled, with 92 of his associates was convicted of violating the espionage act, interfering with conscription, and hampering the Government of the United States in the prosecution of the war, and was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment and fined $20,000. In his testimony at Chicago Haywood identified this communication as genuine. Arthur Le Sueur was for many years a resident of Minot, N. Dak. He has long been recognized as one of the leading and most active socialists in the country. For the last two or three years he has been closely associated with A. C. Townley in the organization and maintenance of the Nonpartisan League. Le Sueur is attorney and one of the three directors of the National Nonpartisan League, as testified to under oath by Townley when he was examined on charges of disloyalty by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, May 1, 1918. It is very probable that the exposure of this letter and of other evidence appearing at the Chicago trial, showing the connection and relation of prominent members of the Townley League with the I. W .W., influenced Col. Roosevelt in writing his editorial:

[Eugene V. Debs, chancellor; Arthur Le Sueur, president; Alva A. George, vice president; S. A. McClaren, treasurer; Laura L. Reeds, secretary; Marian Wharton, editor College News.]

"For the education of the workers by the workers."

THE PEOPLE'S COLLEGE,
Fort Scott, Kans., April 5, 1917.

Mr. WILLIAM D. HAYWOOD,
164 West Washington Street, Chicago, Ill.

FELLOW WORKER: Have just returned from Des Moines, Iowa, and am very glad to be able to report that all of the cases there are disposed of favorably and the boys at liberty. I think the defense committee is satisfied with the handling of the case. Of course, it was not one in which any labor principle was involved, and therefore the fight was simply made to get the boys out.

My expenses for the trip were $34.30, and if you will send me check for that it will clean the matter up.

How are you coming with the Minnesota proposition? I hope you don't start anything until the year has expired. This damned war business is going to make it mighty hard to do good organization work or good radical work of any kind, but I think the fight should be now centered against spy bills and conscription.

Have you heard from Pennsylvania with powers of attorney?

Yours, for industrial freedom,

ARTHUR LE SUEUR.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to analyze the provisions of this bill, for that has already been better done by the gentlemen who have preceded me. I do wish, however, to discuss the necessity for the provisions of this bill as a war measure, as shown by actual conditions in the district which I represent. The conditions in that district are perhaps not anomalous, because I am informed, and reliably so, that they exist in many other sections of the country and that they are, indeed, quite typical of power-shortage conditions. The fact of the matter is that there is throughout the country generally a shortage of electrical power at this time, and that this is very much hampering the war program of the Government. This same situation, as appears by the testimony taken by the committee at the hearings on this bill, existed in England a short time after the war, and that their program for the construction of plants for the manufacture of munitions was from 9 to 12 months ahead of the program to supply the proper electrical energy with which those plants could be operated, and that the electrical engineers of England warned the United States at the outset of this war that that might be, possibly, the condition confronting us in this country if we went along without making special preparations for electrical energy.

It was discovered about six months ago that we were likely to confront these conditions, and the War Department set about to correct them as well as it could. It had a survey of the country made, and, as was shown on the map which was exhibited before the committee to-day by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. SIMS], there exists throughout the country what is commonly referred to as "the congested section," which includes the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and that part of Maryland running down along the Chesapeake.

Now, included in that "congested district"—and it is congested for all purposes of fuel and transportation and electrical energy—is the Lehigh Valley, two-thirds of which is in the district which I have the honor to represent. In that district there are various large industries located. There is, in part, the anthracite mining region; there is the large cement region, which originated about 30 years ago and which was the origin, really, of the cement industry in the United States. In that district there are manufactured now about 23,000,000 barrels of cement per annum, and a large portion of the mills manufacturing this product use electrical energy in its manufacture. They were induced to use electrical energy because of its economy, its saving of coal, and its saving of labor; and because of those representations and those business reasons they eliminated from their plants their old method of steam power and relied entirely on electrical power; and most of those large contracts were made with a company known as the Lehigh Navigation Electric Co.

Now, the Lehigh Navigation Co. is a company that has been in existence almost a hundred years in that section. It was originally incorporated for the purpose of mining and transporting anthracite coal, and it occurred to them about eight years ago that it would be a most economical thing if they could utilize what is commonly known as the culm banks around the anthracite coal mines in that region. Culm simply consists of the coal dust, you might say—the fine particles of coal dust—that is produced as the result of the screening of coal, which theretofore had not been utilized for any useful purpose whatever. So at a cost of something like $15,000,000 this company constructed a plant at Hanto, and also another plant which it purchased at Harwood nearby, and they entered into contracts with these cement and industrial plants throughout the valley, transmitting their current a distance of something like 150 miles from the place where the energy was generated on long-term contracts for the furnishing of this electrical energy to them; so that these various cement plants, relying upon this, made their contracts, depending, of course, upon the uninterrupted furnishing of this service.

Now, nearby where these cement plants are being operated, and only about 30 or 40 miles also from the place where this electrical energy is being manufactured, is located the large Bethlehem Steel plant, now employing over 35,000 men, and being employed practically 100 per cent in the manufacture of munitions for the Government for use in the present war. The Bethlehem Steel plant used a considerable quantity of this electrical energy, but this fact did not at all interfere with the service to the other companies under their contracts until within a recent period of time. The pressure of the Government for the manufacture of munitions by the Bethlehem Steel Co. became so great that it was necessary for the Bethlehem Steel Co. to secure additional electrical energy.

A representative of the War Department, with full authority from that department to act in the premises, came upon the ground and, after a survey of the business conditions in that section, issued an order to the Lehigh Navigation Electric Co. to the effect that it must reduce the amount of electrical energy furnished the different cement plants and other manufacturing plants in that region 25 per cent of what they were entitled to under their contracts, and that this electrical energy should be diverted to the Bethlehem Steel Co. for the purpose of manufacturing munitions of war. And that was coupled with the further statement that the needs of the Bethlehem Steel Co. would be such in the near future that the diversion of 25 per cent would soon be increased to 50 per cent, with the prospect that in six months' time the entire quantity of electrical energy to which these cement and industrial plants would be entitled would be entirely diverted to the Bethlehem Steel Co. So that these cement industries and other industries which were furnished with electrical current in this way were faced with the proposition of having no means of operating their plants, their old steam method having been entirely eliminated, and they would be unable to use their plants and the men who were employed would practically be thrown out of employment at that place and be compelled to go to some other point to secure employment, and the contracts which they had made for furnishing the cement manufactured by them would have to be vitiated in some way.

Now, of course, as stated by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] awhile ago, the Government has the right to commandeer this electrical energy under these contracts if it sees fit to do so. But in doing so the provision of the Constitution still prevails that private property can not be taken for public use without just compensation.

The right—the contractual right—under the terms of these different contracts between the electrical company and the cement companies was a property right, and when the United States Government steps in and takes from them their property rights under the terms of these contracts it is just as much a taking of property as would be the taking of land; and therefore the serious situation was that the cement companies would be unable to fulfill their cement contracts or manufacture their product, and they would only be entitled to turn around and ask for compensation from the Federal Government, which had diverted this power from them. That would be a question, of course, for the assessment of damages, depending as to amount upon the facts that might be developed upon the trial of the issues in the case.

Now, it is proposed, however, to avoid as much as possible the damages that would ensue from this radical act on the part of the Government, made necessary by war conditions. The remedy that is proposed is that the Government will assist this Navigation Electric Co. in extending its plant so that it will be able to conform to the contract previously made and also enable the Bethlehem Co. to receive an adequate amount of electric energy to manufacture munitions that the Government needs and also supply the anthracite coal mines in that region with a sufficient quantity of electrical energy, so that they will be able to mine an additional quantity of coal so badly needed throughout the country for war purposes generally at the present time.

In order to do that it is estimated by the engineers that it will require an expenditure of a million and a half dollars to make this extension; and it is necessary that speedy action be taken in the enactment of the measure such as is contemplated in the bill, for it will require from four to six months to install the necessary machinery.

Mr. ESCH. As I understand it, this subsidiary company develops 20,000 horsepower.

Mr. STEELE. The plant at Horton develops 30,000 kilowatts, and the Bethlehem Steel Co. needs 12,500 kilowatts in addition.

Mr. ESCH. The Horton Co. could not supply under the existing contract what it called for. Therefore this bill is the only possible relief.

Mr. STEELE. The only possible relief that can be afforded.

Mr. ESCH. I understand that unless the Bethlehem Steel Co. gets 12,500 additional kilowatts it will be necessary to make a reduction or stop the supply to the cement works, and even require the shutting down of the coal mines.

Mr. STEELE. That is a fact.

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman will pardon me, he should refer to the fact that the testimony developed that the electrical companies were not able, under the money market, to finance the proposition themselves.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman is correct in what he is stating. The fact of the matter with reference to that situation is this: Just previous to the declaration of war the Lehigh Navigation Electric Co. had made its financial arrangements for borrowing something like [illegible] million and a half dollars to extend the plant at that time to meet what it contemplated would be the requirements of the company in furnishing electrical energy throughout the Lehigh Valley. This arrangement had been practically completed at the outbreak of the war, but because of the financial conditions before the declaration of war and the attitude of the Government in objecting to new capital arrangements it was not enabled to complete it. If it had not been for the war the extension would have been made by the company at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that there is a corporation expressly organized and authorized to loan financial aid where it is necessary in such a case as this, is there not?

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman mean the securities company?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The War Finance Corporation.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think any of the war-aid legislation extends to public utility companies. No legislation now in existence meets the situation I have been discussing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has this company made application to them for assistance?

Mr. STEELE. I can not answer the gentleman because I have no information on the subject.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it being operated on war contracts?

Mr. STEELE. The Bethlehem Co. is engaged almost 100 per cent in war contracts, and from 30 to 60 per cent of the cement produced is sold to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, during this afternoon the average attendance in this Chamber has been less than 20, taken at intervals of about 15 minutes. This is less than 5 per cent of the House membership. Over at the other end of the Capitol 90 per cent of the membership is present with crowded galleries. The two situations contrasted are practically this: This great representative body is in the act of yielding to the Executive stupendous and almost immeasurable powers heretofore controlled indirectly, perhaps by the legislative body, but really owned and controlled by the people of the United States. Over at the other end of the Capitol in the presence of a vast throng, the large membership finds itself in the act of extending an opportunity for a voting privilege to a part of the people of the United States. It illustrates that it is hard for the American people to obtain any extension of a right, but it seems in these latter days very easy for them to yield up a large portion of their rights.

It seems to me that in yielding these tremendous powers so aptly described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] who, with his far vision and powerful imagination, sought to give us some idea of the tremendous proportion of this grant of power, we ought to go slow in considering it. We should take into account what we are granting. We are taking from the people and handing over to the Executive multiplied millions of property and valuable and important rights heretofore exercised and enjoyed by the American people. This tremendous grant is made to the Executive under alleged war necessity. Does the Executive really believe that we should seize the property rights of the American people and transfer them to him? If he believes it should be done, he undoubtedly believes it should be constitutionally asked for that it might be constitutionally granted and constitutionally received.

I am in favor of granting any power necessary for the winning of a victory for this Nation in this emergency. But the official who is to accept this grant should believe in it so thoroughly and be so impressed with its necessity that he would say to the Congress in the constitutional way, "I need the power and I ask it of the Congress for the welfare of the Nation."

I asked a Member, the gentleman from North Carolina, who was making a speech on this bill, if the President had in a constitutional way asked for this grant of power. He said he did not know. He added something as to the matter of taste in a communication through the chairman of a standing committee having the same effect as a message to the Congress. This is not a matter of taste; it is a matter of the Constitution, and I hope when I mention the Constitution in this presence that nobody will rise and make the point of order against introducing a strange or obsolete subject in this Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Section 3, Article II, of the Constitution, reciting the powers and duties of the President of the United States, says:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

Reading section 3 as it applies to this bill, omitting that which is irrelevant, it would read as follows:

> He shall from time to time recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

The Executive has apparently not deemed it "necessary or expedient" to have this grant of power, because no message has come to the Congress of the United States for that purpose. Message only is the constitutional method by which the President should seek to influence in the first instance action by the lawmaking power. Ordinarily the lawmaking power should be confined to the Congress of the United States, uninfluenced by Executive recommendation. There is, however, reserved to the Executive on great questions where he desires and where he thinks he ought to influence the initiation of legislation the duty of sending a message in writing or by appearing before the Congress and recommending that such legislation be passed. I have heard Members criticized on the floor of this House for not supporting presidential policies and measures. Constitutionally what is a presidential measure or policy? There is no presidential policy known to the law or properly construable by the law for which any man should be criticized for not supporting unless, in the first instance, in the constitutional manner, the Executive has exercised his prerogative in recommending such legislation.

This measure contemplates an extraordinary grant of power involving legislative violence to vast private rights, affecting every unit of electrical and mechanical power in the United States. It can only be defended by a stern war necessity. Before we deprive the people of their rights the responsible head of this Government should in the constitutional way demonstrate the necessity and make the demand for the legislation. In the years to come when the representatives of the people are struggling to wrest this power from the Executive, whoever he may be, to restore it to the people, Representatives will look vainly through the presidential messages for the request for this grant. It will be looked upon as a settled policy rather than a war-emergency measure.

Men have said in this debate the vast powers granted are not expected to be exercised. Then they should not be granted. Wise statesmanship presumes that power granted will be exercised. More than that, it should be hedged about with every conceivable safeguard. Legislators should guard against the ill-disposed officer rather than too solicitously grant privileges to those who may be deemed wise and good.

If this measure is necessary for achieving national victory, if the Executive is so convinced and he has in any wise indicated such conviction to members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, such committee might properly take cognizance of that fact. But a due regard for the dignity of the House of Representatives and the Constitution of our country demands that the Executive message prescribed by the fathers should be forthcoming before this measure was recommended for our favorable action. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE], to refer to the necessity and the utility of this measure because of conditions which arise in my own district. There are two great divisions of power development in North and South Carolina. One of them is controlled by what is known as the Southern Power Co. and operates on the Catawba and Broad Rivers, and the other is the Carolina Power Co., that operates farther north on the Pedee River and the Roanoke River. Now, there is a condition arising which is shown in the report here. The Southern Power Co. has a normal amount of power in its territory to carry all the legitimate business that is being done there, and that is a tremendous war business in the manufacture of cotton goods at the milling points in that whole territory. It has 10 large hydroelectric plants in my district, and has really built cities where there were wildernesses a few years ago for the purpose of manufacturing cotton, and it has in the last year constructed and is just completing another very large plant, whose power is not needed in that particular district but it is needed in the district of the Carolina Power Co., and the construction is needed of 82 miles of power transportation lines of 100,000 volts capacity, requiring about 75 miles of additional lateral branches feeding the territory contiguous to Wilmington, N. C., and all between the Wateree River and Raleigh, N. C., the Wateree River being in South Carolina.

Now, the construction of that line and the transmission of 20,000 horsepower will release 150,000 tons of coal a year which is used in a territory which is remote from the coal fields, being a very large item. It releases from the necessity of transportation 3,000 coal cars for the coming season, and the company that is purchasing this power desires to connect the two reservoirs, the one running over with power and the other in want of power, and it is confronted with the fact that it can not go on the market with its securities because it is interfering with the money market for the bond subscriptions. It can not get the money to construct this line to comply with its contract, in which it proposes to deliver electricity early in the coming year, without some help or some relief from the Government. It has to get permission from the finance board here or it has got to borrow the money from the War Finance Corporation, or it has got to get it this way, and the question is a very serious one whether it can get it any way except this; and this is merely an instance of the utility of the measure which is proposed. Now, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] said, in substance, a little while ago that the proposition was to give the President power to seize the property of the citizens. It not only looks to that, but it is to give the Government the power to assist the citizens in developing that which is absolutely necessary for the carrying on of the industries of this country during this war, and that is the instance which I have attempted to give of the use of this act, and for that reason I am exceedingly interested to see the act put in operation as soon as possible, in order that the power which is in one reservoir—and you will find it so all over the United States—can be shifted and transferred to a place where it is needed to conserve the coal supply and the transportation of this country. That is the statement that I desire to make in asking for time this afternoon.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. NORTON. Is the gentleman in favor of legislation of this kind after the war?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am in favor of its terminating as soon after the emergency growing out of the war terminates as possible. I have always been a strict constructionist and I do not now expect to begin to advocate the retention of public utilities any longer than they are necessary.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have been interested in the gentleman's explanation of the bill. Do I understand that the corporations that are denied the opportunity to sell securities to raise money are to be allowed to have money out of the Treasury, and this is a bill to furnish them the money?

Mr. STEVENSON. The provisions of this bill authorize the Government to take hold and expend the money in creating these facilities or in assisting corporations now in existence in completing themselves and provide security to the Government in so doing. That is the reason for the great appropriation that is made in the bill. I yield back such time as I have not used.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to refer to the last remark of the gentleman in reference to its providing for security to the Government. What security is made to secure the Government?

Mr. STEVENSON. As I have read the bill, the Government has possession of the utility, and I take it for granted that if it has possession and can operate it can take care of itself in the operation.

Mr. HAMLIN. But when the war period is over and the authority of the Government to operate expires, the Government will have a lot of this stuff on hand, and it will have to sell it for whatever these people want to give them.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is a provision that it must be appraised and the Government will dispose of it; and if you develop a power and the power is put to a profitable and permanent use, you are not very likely to have to throw the power away. But suppose the Government has to take something less than it costs? The time is now at hand when we have to have the power for the purpose of carrying on the war industries. Now, if the Government has to lose something by accelerating that power and by increasing it, and by increasing the facilities for the transportation and delivery of that power, it is one of the expenses and one of the losses incident to being in a state of war which we will have to philosophically bear, I think.

Mr. HAMLIN. I agree with the gentleman; and that is the only reason in the world why I will support the bill. But this is the situation as it is likely to arise, in my mind: Has it occurred to the gentleman that some of these private companies might take advantage of the Government in coming and extending their plants?

Mr. STEVENSON. Selfishness is the dominating trait of humanity, and I have no question but that some people will take advantage of this condition. But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that they do it in every contract and every deal made with the Government, and they take advantage of the necessities of the Government when in a state of war; and we can not do away with it without eradicating human nature.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, a statement was put out some time ago by one of our colleagues, Mr. FERRIS, of Oklahoma, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee, in which it was announced that the Republican Party had been an obstruction political party. I wanted to take a little time with the members of the committee to say something about the functions of a minority party. The minority party, by virtue of a lack of numbers, is not held responsible for legislation. That function belongs to the majority party. I believe, as no doubt every Member in this Chamber believes, that a republican form of government can not be administered in a salutary manner for the public weal without some form of political organization. Public opinion can not translate itself into law except through this agency. There is not a government in the world that assumes to speak for the people that does not have a form of political party. Even in Germany, the enemy to-day of the liberties of a people, recognizes party organization. If it is in a country with a responsible ministry, such as Great Britain, they have several parties, but always two. And in our country we will always have at least two political parties fundamentally different. It has ever been so and will ever be so. The very distinction of schools of political thought compels it.

The line of demarcation in our history thus far has been the difference between that school of political thinking that tends to give increased power to the central authority in the interest of order, but at the same time retains local self-government in the local unit in the interest of liberty. The other school tends to retain more liberty in the local unit and less power in the central government. The differentiation between political parties in our country, therefore, has been that one emphasizes central authority in the interest of orderly conduct, while the other local self-government in the interest of liberty.

It is a well-recognized historical fact that these two lines of political thinking have formed the real basis for political parties. The extreme of either would not be wise. In the past the Democratic policy was decentralization, which embodied itself in the doctrine of State rights and, at certain periods, State sovereignty, which was the real cause of the Civil War.

Our Democratic friends will admit with me that in the last few years the centralizing power is being recognized fully, if not more greatly, on the Democratic side of the aisle than on the Republican side. However, the Republicans have never agreed with former Democratic policies. No political party in power will likely suffer an embarrassment by not using what seems to be the necessary authority to do what the leaders think ought to be done. So that the party in power will be centralizing in its tendencies, while the party out of power may be decentralizing in its tendencies. This is usually the rule. The party in power inevitably will take the responsibility for legislation. The country demands of it that service. It can not long remain in power if it does not. The party out of power, almost as inevitably, will take the position of the watchman on the tower to hold up the legislation by its parliamentary rights until what is worth while is gotten into the law, and what is dangerous, from their standpoint, is eliminated from it. The real purpose of parliamentary regulation is to secure to the minority this right in the interest of sound legislation.

This explains why, from 1861 until 1884, the Republican Party took the lead and responsibility of all measures which to-day make up our proudest period in history, while the Democratic Party was styled in our history as the obstructionist party, because it studiously and vehemently opposed every measure during that period. It matters not whether you look at the Lincoln-Johnson administration or any other, from that on until the Cleveland administration in 1885 the position of the Democratic Party as a minority party was to oppose except when by accident the House for a short time fell into Democratic hands. I remember most distinctly as a young man greatly interested in the political history of our country, and an interested student of our times, I used to take a great deal of pleasure in declaring what was true, but somewhat embarrasing to my Democratic friends, that there was scarcely a fundamental measure since the opening of the Civil War that had not been opposed by the Democratic Party in both the Senate and the House. We are free to admit, what all must recognize, that the reason for that was that the Democracy of the country was holding responsible the Republican Party, which was then in power, for the legislation and not being charged with such responsibility themselves presented an almost undivided opposition.

It is not necessary for me to specify what were the great measures in Lincoln's time and Johnson's time. They involved the prosecution of the greatest Civil War known to man. Opposition then verged close to disloyalty. Neither is it necessary to speak of the outstanding political measures in Gen. Grant's reconstruction period. His administration was distinguished by vitally important measures inherited from headed the Nation, the course of administration was obstructed from every angle by the party which to-day is in power.

No Democrat on this floor to-day will deny that these measures were almost every one of them opposed by the solid vote of the Democratic side of the House, including all of the the war, which should have received the support of the Democrats but did not. From 1869 to 1877, when the great soldier amendments to the Constitution, and other reconstructive measures following the Civil War as inevitable problems inherited by the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does my colleague recall that during the Civil War or the Spanish War any revenue measure was ever passed by unanimous vote?

Mr. FESS. Never in the history of this country.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it the line of the gentleman's argument that the position of the Republican Party now is similar to that of the Democratic Party at the time of Lincoln?

Mr. FESS. It is not. That is why I wanted to build the statement so that I would not be charged with being unfair when I came to make the statement I rose to make.

What was done in Grant's administration, from 1869 to 1877, was also noticed in the Hayes administration, from 1877 to 1881, and was repeated in the Garfield-Arthur administration from 1881 to 1885.

The outstanding measures of national importance in each of these administrations covering the period from 1861 to 1885, a period of 44 years, were the targets of the fiercest opposition of the minority or Democratic Party. These measures included besides those which necessarily grew out of the war the financial question, the tariff question, the civil-service question, the expansion question, the concentration and control question, and many others of like importance. The country will not forget the attitude of the Democratic Party in first demanding fiat money, then opposing its constitutionality, and later opposing the resumption of specie payment. Neither will it forget its attitude on the civil service, which, while professing to favor after it once was adopted, it repudiates when the party is called upon to enforce it.

During all of those 44 years there was a tremendous effort to build up the country from the standpoint of Republican policies, which displayed a greater stride in national prosperity than had ever been known before. That effort was fought by a united Democracy all along the line. Then, in 1885, when Grover Cleveland came into power, one of the very first measures that was introduced in Congress was the interstate-commerce act of 1887. The Republicans, while not opposed to the principle, wanted to look into it thoroughly, and therefore they did not give it a unanimous vote. The party of the majority for 44 years, and necessarily the responsible party, had become a minority party. On the other hand, during this same Cleveland administration the presidential succession law was not opposed by the minority party. In 1890, in the case of the famous Sherman Antitrust Act, which bears the name of a distinguished Republican in the Senate, at that time in the control of the Republicans, it was opposed by the Democratic Party in the main, although professing to be against combinations. And then, coming on down, taking in Cleveland's second administration, you find the same rule obtained in a degree, and also in Harrison's administration the same principle of the minority holding the majority responsible for legislation. In McKinley's administration, before the Spanish-American War the Democrats were furious for war, and for a time after war was declared there was a pretty united House on both sides of the aisle, especially on the declaration of war. President McKinley was given a unanimous vote for $50,000,000, granted as an emergency defense fund, to be used as he saw fit. But when it came to a revenue measure to supply funds with which to prosecute the war our Democratic friends—all but six of you—voted against it. Here in time of war a minority party voted almost solidly against a measure designed to supply the funds necessary for the prosecution of the war which had received almost a solid Democratic vote on the declaration of war. While some people have suggested that it was not patriotic, I had never felt disposed to so denounce the opposition, but was ready to admit that the point of dispute was not as to the end but as to the means of raising the money, and consequently I do not now think, nor did I then, that we ought to insinuate that it was an unpatriotic motive on the part of the Democrats. It was opposition to a theory of taxation Democrats have not indorsed rather than opposition to the war.

I do not think that our Democratic friends now have any right, from whatever angle viewed, to impugn the motive of any Republican if, before the war, he should have questioned the feasibility of a certain method of raising revenue, or any other measure upon which parties have been divided from the very beginning of our Government. I now refer to the revenue bill, to which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] referred in his speech, in which he said that the Republicans had not unitedly supported it. This was a measure before this country was in war.

Why, into that measure they had dragged at least three Republican ideas in order to win Republican votes, and while many Members on the Republican side of the aisle did vote for it, many Republicans did not stand for it because, as I said before, there was a serious question involved as to whether it was the right method.

But let it not be forgotten that that was before the war and at a time when the best consideration with the greatest deliberation was not only warranted but demanded. Again our friend from Oklahoma, speaking of the Republican side as obstructionists, referred to the Federal-reserve act. I want to take the time to remind the gentleman that the reserve act was in 1913, in time of profound peace, and I also wish to say that the enactment of the Federal-reserve act was not obstructed by the Republican Party. A great number of Republicans voted for it, and with the best of reasons, for in the main it was patterned after a Republican measure, the Aldrich bill. Quite a number voted against it, not because of the Federal-reserve act itself but because of certain features in it that we tried to amend and to eliminate from it. Had these amendments been accepted it would have left the House a very much better bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. With pleasure.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to state that those amendments were put in finally before the law became effective?

Mr. FESS. That is true; and the act has been amended four times to my knowledge, where I assisted in the amendment, since the law first became effective.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the administration failed to put it into effect for 15 months because of the lack of those features?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I repeat the act was not opposed as a whole, but only objectionable features of it.

Now, I should like to make another observation. The Federal-reserve act was bodily borrowed from a Republican measure, the Aldrich bill, the result of a Monetary Commission on which the greatest body of thought was gathered that had ever been gathered upon any subject in finance in the history of this country, and it must not be forgotten that was a Republican measure. When the bill was before us I printed in parallel columns of the RECORD the Aldrich bill and this act to show the complete similarity in principles and fundamentals.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. With regard to the revenue bill, of which my colleague has just spoken, I was one of those Republicans who supported it because I believed it was four-fifths Republican, and the only reason why I objected to it, and the reason why Republicans voted against it, was the excess-profits tax, brought in in a time of peace, concerning which, if the gentleman will permit me to read, the Secretary of the Treasury now says:

Mr. MCADOO. The excess-profits tax must rest upon the wholly indefensible notion that it is a function of taxation to bring all profits down to one level with relation to the amount of capital invested and to deprive industry, foresight, and sagacity of their fruits. The excess-profits tax exempts capital and burdens brains, ability, and energy.

The excess-profits tax falls less heavily on big business than on small business, because big business is generally overcapitalized and small business is often undercapitalized.

That is the opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury now holds upon the one item in that bill which the Republicans opposed.

Mr. FESS. I am glad that my colleague made clear that particular point, because I want to make it clear that it was not the bill as a whole that was opposed by Republicans, but defects, many of which have since been corrected. The bill had in it some features that the Republicans tried to amend at the time. I myself secured one amendment, as will be recalled—the preservation of the gold standard.

When my friend on the other side of the Chamber referred to the interstate trade act and charged that we obstructed it, he was again mistaken. Republicans voted for it as readily as the Democrats, for it was a Republican measure that had been recommended by President Taft in a Congress preceding. At that time Democrats opposed the proposition because of minority status. But not so with Republicans; they supported the measure quite enthusiastically.

The same thing is true with respect to the rural-credits act, another measure in the list mentioned by the Democratic chairman. The rural-credits act was an origination of Myron T. Herrick, from Ohio, a Republican, who had made an elaborate study of the subject in Germany. He was the first man to call attention in an official way to this character of financial legislation.

I simply call the attention of my friends on the other side of the aisle to these facts, which ought not to have been forgotten so soon, and must not be distorted for political purposes. When they say that we on this side of the aisle have assumed the position of an obstructionist party they shall not distort the real facts. All of these measures were passed in time of peace. Even though we had obstructed it is not fair to apply it as if it were war time. I call their attention to the fact that there was ground for our opposing the items that we did oppose, although they bore the brand of our own party, having been borrowed from us and having been dressed in a new garb. But that was not in time of war. It was before the war opened and can not be subject to the criticism justified if in time of war.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman has just made a statement to the effect that Myron T. Herrick indorsed this rural-credits act. It is true that Myron T. Herrick wrote a bill upon the subject of rural credits, but the gentleman from Ohio is bound to admit that Myron T. Herrick violently opposed this particular bill, that he circularized the United States against it, and made speeches against it—the bill that the Congress passed. I remember it very well; I was myself a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, which reported that bill; and I remember that Mr. Herrick made speeches all over the United States against the rural-credits bill which was enacted by Congress.

Mr. FESS. He opposed one feature of the rural-credits bill, a feature that is fundamentally wrong, and the elimination of that feature would have made it a much better bill. I refer to the feature which puts the Government itself in the banking business. That was the feature he objected to in that bill, and that is the one feature that weakens the bill. The same may be said in lesser degree with regard to the Federal reserve act.

We also objected to the latter being a partisan board of control. We introduced an amendment to make it nonpartisan and were ridiculed for even the suggestion of the possibility of any Executive doing such a thing. Note that was before it was done. That feature of the Federal reserve act would make it much better if it were eliminated.

Our opposition to that feature does not mean that we oppose the whole measure. I appeal to gentlemen on both sides of the aisle, what has been the position of the Republican Party as a minority party since the world war began? I am quite certain that there is nobody here, on either side of the aisle, that wants to do anybody, individually or collectively, an injustice. There is no occasion for it, and when we come to look into our party government, where we know legislation must be by party organization even in time of war, there will be a majority party, responsible, and a minority party armed with parliamentary procedure in order to see that the best results will be worked out in legislation. Note the contrast of the Republicans in war with the Democrats in the Civil War and the Spanish-American War. Only yesterday a distinguished judge, a Democrat from Georgia, said to me he had never seen such elimination of party spirit as displayed by Republicans. There never has been such a display of partisan abandonment as shown by Republicans, although in the minority. There have been heard partisan utterances, but not until it was opened by the Democratic chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. I make full recognition of the value of political organizations in legislation. But when the war opened, although the Republicans had been somewhat impatient with our "watchful waiting" and had criticized some things that we thought ought to have been different, partisan criticism was totally abandoned. However, we had suggested some things not done that we felt should have been done. Republicans have felt themselves free to raise certain questions as to a more complete preparation and a more vigorous prosecution of the war, but when it comes to voting on any war measure which was shaped as a fixed policy for the prosecution of the war, there has been no political division, so far as I know, on the Republican side.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I yield.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I agree with the gentleman that we can not decide the policy of a party by a vote on a special measure, but I would like to ask the opinion of the gentleman on this matter. Is it not a fact that one great measure that is at issue in the management of this war, a party measure between your side and the Democratic side, is the selection of a war board, or a war committee, to assist the President in the conduct of the war? Is not there this possibility that if your party should win in this election your policy will be to establish a war board such as your party has voted for and take from the President the absolute power to conduct the war as he sees fit? Is not that the essential thing at issue?

Mr. FESS. There will be no disposition on the part of Republicans in Congress in the slightest degree to interfere with the vigorous prosecution of the war. The gentleman should not speak of a committee on the conduct of the war. We have asked for no such committee. There is almost certain, however, to be a decided policy that the administration accept some budget system, to give better business methods to contracts and expenditures, and also a better audit system, so that the auditing of the accounts of one department will not be done by its own department, as in the case of the Government.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GILLETT. Was not the formation of the committee to which the gentleman refers—and which the Republican Party supported—originated by the Democratic Party in the Senate and carried through the Senate under the leadership of Senator SIMMONS, the Democratic leader, and after that the Republican Party supported it?

Mr. FESS. That is true; and not only that, the gentleman here that introduced this bill has offered the argument that this committee is unnecessary because Congress has already a committee with power to do that thing. If that Committee on Expenditures, a part of this body, has that power, then the gentleman can not inject the idea that we are going to interfere with the prosecution of the war by creating a new committee to do, as he says, the identical thing they now have the power to do, but of course does not and will not do.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. When the revenue bill was passed the leader of the Republican Party sought to recommit it with instructions to report the bill back with a provision authorizing the appointment of a committee to have control and supervision of the expenditures. I hold the position that you can not fight this war with committees and that the appointment of a committee would interfere with the Executive in his full power as Commander in Chief in his efforts to prosecute the war.

Mr. FESS. That statement may be a good political argument just before an election, but it does not get anywhere when the purpose of every political party is to win this war with the most vigorous prosecution possible and at the minimum waste of public funds. That, I think, everybody will agree to. We have no right to devote our entire attention to contracts. We must also devote some effort to how to avoid wasteful expenditures.

Mr. GILLETT. I suggest to the gentleman that it is not fair to let go uncontradicted the suggestion that this committee was to have control of expenditures. They would have had absolutely no control of funds. The committee whose organization the Republican Party supported was purely a committee of investigation.

Mr. SLOAN. And had nothing to do with the conduct of the war.

Mr. FESS. Absolutely nothing to do with the conduct of the war. The gentlemen confuses a committee to supervise expenditures to avoid waste and a committee on the conduct of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. ESCH. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. ESCH. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MAGEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MAGEE. Does the gentleman think that a Member of the House performs his full responsibility by voting for the authorization of appropriations aggregating $40,000,000,000, and then never concerning himself in any way, nor endeavoring to get any information, as to whether these moneys are wisely, economically, and lawfully expended?

Mr. FESS. I think, in answer to my friend specifically, that it is an indication of a weakness on the part of an individual Member to attempt to free himself of responsibility that he must and ought to exercise.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is not that auditing now being performed by the various appropriation committees of Congress?

Mr. FESS. To my mind the various appropriation committees of Congress have enough to do besides following this thing up. Their business is to initiate appropriations. We ought to have a committee to coordinate with that committee and follow up appropriations and see how they are being applied and whether they are being wasted. I had not intended to raise this question, had it not been for its injection here as an indication that the support of such measure was a desire to obstruct the prosecution of the war. No man can justly make such a statement. It means a more vigorous prosecution of the war at the least waste of public funds.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the gentleman from Ohio, he would create this committee, to devote its entire time and attention to this particular work and leave their other duties in Congress to their fellow Members?

Mr. FESS. A committee such as proposed, which was to be a joint committee made up of the complexion of both the Senate and the House, which would have been a Democratic committee, certainly would not have interfered with the war and would have been a help rather than a hindrance.

Mr. GARNER. I did not say anything in regard to interference; but does the gentleman take into consideration the duties of the various committees of the House? For instance, the Appropriations Committee, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is the ranking member on the Republican side, has full power and, I believe, full opportunity and full time to investigate these expenditures and ascertain whether they have been judiciously expended or not.

Mr. FESS. I do not agree with the gentleman. No such function was ever exercised by that committee, and never will be.

Mr. GARNER. And I also think the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs have that power.

Mr. FESS. I do not agree with my friend in that statement either.

Mr. GILLETT. We have to do with the appropriations for next year.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What will be the essential difference between the functions of this committee and the functions now being performed by Mr. Justice Hughes in investigating the $640,000,000 expenditure for airplanes without result?

Mr. FESS. The one chief difference is that one derives authority from the Executive; the other derives authority from the body that gives the appropriation, the Congress, and it would seem to me that when we vote money to any department and hold it responsible for its proper application, if an investigation is to be made as to the application of that money, it is not for the department that spends it to make the investigation, but it is for the department that gives it authority to expend it. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. In the gentleman's opinion, if we had had such a committee, does the gentleman think there would have ever been any occasion for Mr. Justice Hughes to have made the investigation, or for the Senate to have made its investigation——

Mr. FESS. Most certainly not, and the thing most surprising to me is the sensitiveness of our Democratic friends in refusing to have an inquiry. If our Democratic friends would welcome an investigation of those things that seem to have gone awry, look at the saving to the Nation from that standpoint, and invite an investigation, not by the department being investigated but by a coordinate body, the public would be better served. I am sure my friends will agree with me that when we vote without debate $640,000,000 of money for the building of aircraft, as we did in July of 1917, and we did it because we thought it would be better not to debate the bill on the floor of the House, that we are not wholly free from legitimate condemnation of the people when we simply throw it off by saying we were asked to do it in that way and thus performed our duty to the public, and we therefore do not propose to make any research as to what became of it. This attitude is culpable and should not be tolerated, much less in war than in peace. To me this claim that the Republican Party has acted as a mere obstruction party is pure partisan pabulum employed for partisan purposes where argument for principle is sadly lacking. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK], a member of the committee.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the statement of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on the philosophy of the parties. So far as I am concerned, so long as I have been in this House I have not said anything that looked like a discussion of party questions. Personally I want to say this, that I have no time now to discuss party questions. I want to see if I can personally do something to help win this war without reference to whether it is won by men who are Democrats or Republicans. I do not care which they are. [Applause.] Now, I want to say a word or two about this bill. I had not intended to talk on this subject at all, but I want to call the attention of the committee to this very important measure and to some one or two or three criticisms which have been made by some who have discussed the measure. There has been a great deal of discussion as to the power conferred in section 8, which gives the President the power to retain these utilities which have been taken over or which have been built or bought by him until he can dispose of them to advantage. I am sure I had a great deal of doubt about the advisability of this section of the bill and I have a great deal of doubt in my mind yet about the advisability of that section; but there is a good deal of force to the argument which was presented to the committee and which has been presented to this House that if the Government intends to spend a large sum of money in buying these utilities, in building utilities, and in putting money into utilities already in existence, the President ought to have a large discretion in disposing of them after the war is over. If the President is not given such discretion the Government is likely to lose a large sum of money. There is no doubt in my mind that on account of the expense at this time of installing these utilities the Government is bound to lose money under this bill if we turn those utilities back to the people who own them or if we dispose of them after the war.

I want to say, again, for myself personally, as I said when we passed the railroad-control bill, and as I said when we reported the bill for the control of the telegraph and telephones, that I am opposed to committing this Government to a policy of Government ownership of those utilities as long as we find there are people in this country who have brains enough and who are honest enough and who have the ability to administer these affairs and run these railroads and these utilities as they have in the past. [Applause.] But this is a war measure, and, as was pointed out to the committee, it is an absolute necessity at this time to have this additional power in order to manufacture war munitions and in order to mine coal. That is a question that has not been called to the attention of the committee, and I wish I had time to call the attention of the committee to a statement made by Dr. Garfield upon that subject to show the economy that will be worked out in the operation of the mining industries of this country, if they can have the power that is necessary to carry on this work. I do not have the time to read from the statement, but it says that by using the electric current necessary for the mining of coal there will be a saving of several millions of dollars a month to the consumers of this country, because these power plants use the by-product or the coal that is not used by the manufacturers of the country or by the domestic users.

Now, there is just one other thing that I want to call attention to that has been offered as an objection to this bill. The question has been asked several times if the necessity exists now it must have existed for some time; and why is it, men say, that we have not been called upon to make this appropriation before this time? The answer is given by Secretary Baker, and will be found on page 4 of the hearings, and it is this: When they began to make a survey of this subject and to find the necessity for this additional power and ascertained that it existed they tried to go to different appropriations that had been made for the War Department and for the Navy Department and other branches of the Government that were exercising these functions, but they found that it was impossible to work out a plan to use the appropriations that had already been made by Congress to the different branches of the Government. They did work out—and he said it was with the utmost difficulty—a plan by which they did lend assistance to some of the plants in the Pittsburgh district, where the necessity was the greatest, and they found it was very doubtful if they had the power to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SNOOK. They found that they had the greatest difficulty to work out a plan by which these appropriations could be used. I wish to quote just a moment from Secretary Baker's language on that subject. He says—and you will find it on page 4 of the hearings—

> It required a great deal of ingenuity to work out a plan by which the funds in the War Department could be made available for the establishment of supplementary power supplies. The Emergency Fleet Corporation had some elasticity in its funds; the Navy Department somewhat less elasticity. We have all been working at it fairly steadily for four or five months.

And then he went on to say that they found out, after investigating the subject fully and carefully, they thought the only way it could be reached was by framing a bill something like this.

It was suggested by somebody in the debate—I do not remember who—that it would have been better to have appropriated a lump sum and have left it to the power of the President to dispose of that sum in taking over these plants and constructing new ones. To my mind that plan would be very much more open to objection than the plan we are now using. I know that this bill grants large powers to the President, larger than any bill, probably, we have yet brought to Congress; but, even so, it is hedged around by many safeguards that put a curb on that power and makes it much better for the people and for the Congress than conferring on the President the power to spend a lump sum. That method of appropriation has been oftentimes criticized in this Congress, and I do not know of any more objectionable method by which we can legislate than by going in that direction.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would like to ask you as a member of the committee—and I am very much interested in your discussion of the bill—if the policy of the bill is, or was it presented to you by the department, that because of the interference in the sale of these securities it would be necessary in order to raise the money to do these essential things that the department thought wise to take the money from the Treasury and loan to these particular people?

Mr. SNOOK. The people who were engaged in these industries found it impossible to get the money to do this work.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Because they were forbidden to sell them?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes; because the money market was such they could not sell securities. They found the only way they had then was to come to the Government.

Now, going back to this section 8 and the power conferred by it in connection with paragraph 1 of section 2, I found to-day when I read the bill over in the House after the discussion had commenced that there is no limitation as to the time in paragraph 1 of section 2 of this bill as to when the President may spend money for the purchase of a power plant or for the building of a power plant. I believe that a limitation should be placed in that paragraph as well as in paragraph 2, and, if I do not change my mind, I shall offer an amendment after the word "construct" to define and limit the power conferred by paragraph 1 of section 2 to the war period, which is defined in this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think the gentleman will find that it is limited to the war period except where some provision is made.

Mr. SNOOK. Not in this section.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. But it is a general provision in the bill.

Mr. SNOOK. The committee, after fully discussing this bill, found the great necessity that confronted it, and in order to meet this necessity, reported the bill to the House. When it is amended, if the committee should deem amendments necessary, I think it ought to be speedily enacted into law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, perhaps I ought to apologize for digressing and for discussing a subject that is not in the bill and for taking up the time of the House at this late hour in the evening.

I am not going to make a partisan speech. I have not made one since the war began. I do not believe I have cast a partisan vote. It is not my purpose during the continuance of this war to do so.

I want to take up the few minutes allotted to me, however, in discussing a subject that I think is of very great importance, and that is an amendment to the rules which I have proposed and which has been referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. Chairman, since coming to Congress I have been deeply impressed with the necessity for some rule whereby bills of a local nature could be considered. Strange as it may seem, there is no such rule at the present time. On July 15 I introduced the following resolution as an amendment to clause 3 of Rule XIII:

> Provided further, That when any bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, upon which there is no minority report filed, is called for consideration, it shall be considered unless 10 members object, when it shall be immediately in order to move its consideration, which motion shall be put to the House without debate, and if carried by a majority vote, said bill shall be considered as if no objection had been made.

It will be seen that it amends the unanimous-consent rule so that any bill placed upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, upon which there is no minority report filed, shall be considered unless 10 Members object, when it shall be immediately in order to move its consideration, which motion shall be put to the House without debate, and if carried by a majority vote the bill shall be considered the same as if no objection had been made.

We ought to have a rule whereby local bills may be considered. Under our rules now one man in the House can prevent the consideration of a local bill during the entire session of Congress.

There are only four ways to get a local bill considered unless this amendment is adopted:

First. Upon a call of the committee that reported the bill. If the committee has been called on two previous Calendar Wednesdays and other bills considered that have been reported by it, the chances are the committee will not be called again during the session of Congress. There is little likelihood of getting any local bill considered in this manner.

Second. By placing the bill upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent the objection of any Member strikes the bill from the calendar and it can not be considered.

Third. By asking unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, a bill can be taken up unless a Member of the House objects. Of course, if he objects when the Unanimous Consent Calendar is called he will object to a request for unanimous consent at any other time in the House for the consideration of that bill.

Fourth. By offering a motion to suspend the rules, which requires a two-thirds vote. It is a rule of the Speaker not to recognize anyone who offers a motion of this kind for the purpose of considering local bills, except for the last six days of the session. It is usually too late then to secure favorable consideration by the other branch of Congress.

It will be seen, therefore, that there is really no way to secure consideration of a local bill except by unanimous consent. I am opposed to this rule, and it ought to be amended. If a Member introduces a bill which he vouches for as being meritorious, has it referred to a committee, and secures the unanimous report of the committee upon it, there ought to be some way to consider the bill in the House. Certainly one Member of the House who is not upon the committee that considers the bill and who has no personal knowledge of it should not have the right to say that it shall not be considered.

No Member can defend such a rule, either here or among his constituents at home. I was reared in the West, where the people believe in absolute equality. It is exceedingly difficult to explain to my constituents that consideration can not be secured by the House under the rules of a bill unanimously reported.

When a boy at school it was a rule that everyone took his turn in playing marbles, ball, or any other game.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, have I any time left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes left.

Mr. SIMS. Would the gentleman from Oklahoma be willing to continue his remarks by printing them in the RECORD? I approve of them so far as I have heard them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like the gentleman to be allowed to conclude. How long will it take the gentleman? It is a very interesting subject.

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection to the gentleman's continuing, but I want to make this statement to the committee, that when the time is out I want to commence the reading of the bill and read the first paragraph, and then move that the committee rise. That is all I want to do to-night. If the members of the committee do not object, I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma five minutes more if he desires.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the gentleman.

The farmer, when he goes to the old water mill, stands in line and takes his turn in getting his corn or wheat ground. Lawyers at the bar have their cases docketed and called in regular order. Everyone appreciates that in Congress some legislation is national in its character and more urgent than other legislation, and therefore must necessarily pass. Consideration of it can be secured by unanimous consent or by special rule from the Rules Committee, but you can not get a special rule for the consideration of a local bill.

I am unalterably opposed to any rule that permits one or two men in the House to say what legislation may be considered. I believe that we should have a rule that will permit the consideration of all legislation. Every Member is entitled to have his bills considered when reported unanimously by a committee, and surely, if no more than 10 Members out of the entire membership of 435 object, the bill ought to be considered. In the event 10 Members object it ought to be in order to move its consideration. If a majority of the House wants to consider the bill the minority should not be permitted to hold it up.

I assume that every Member who introduces a bill does so in good faith. If he is diligent enough to appear before the committee to whom it is referred and secure favorable consideration of it, he is entitled to have it considered by the House when it is unanimously reported.

I want to invite the attention of the Committee on Rules and Members of Congress to this proposed amendment, and earnestly urge its favorable consideration. I submit that no Member can satisfactorily explain to his constituents that the House does not have a rule whereby every bill unanimously reported can be called up for consideration at some time during the entire session. My State and the West suffer most on account of this rule. Many of the older States do not require any special local legislation.

Eastern Oklahoma has 101,519 Indians enrolled as members of the Five Civilized Tribes. For the past 25 years their affairs have required legislation at different times to wind them up. Local legislation is imperative, but a single objection prevents its consideration. I am opposed to the rule as it now stands, and opposed to any rule that will place it in the power of one man to say what legislation shall be considered. I thank the House.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we begin the reading of the bill, and that the bill be read, subject to amendment, by paragraph or subsections.

Mr. ESCH. I think that would be better, Mr. Chairman, because two or three of the sections cover two or three pages. It will be better to have it considered by paragraphs.

Mr. SIMS. Nearly all of these sections consist of but one paragraph. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read by subsections or paragraph.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would prefer to have it read by paragraphs. For instance, in section (a) there are no paragraphs, but there are three or four subsections.

Mr. SIMS. Where there are no subsections I ask that the bill be considered by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered by subsections or paragraphs, and where there are no paragraphs that it be considered by subsections. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read through subsection (a). Committee amendments may be read but not acted on to-night.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act, unless the context shall require a different interpretation—

(a) The term "power plant" means a plant equipped for, and employed or intended to be employed in, generating, developing, transmitting, or distributing electrical or mechanical power, and includes all machinery and appliances therein contained, together with all lines transmitting or distributing power in connection therewith, and all other property the ownership, use, or occupancy of which may be appropriate to or useful in connection with the maintenance and operation thereof.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 8, insert, after the word "power," the words "and in connection the products made through or in connection with the coking of coal or lignite or by combustion."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move, before the committee rises, an amendment to that. The word "the," in line 8, should be changed to the word "therewith," so that it would read "and in connection therewith products made," and so forth.

Mr. SIMS. We can discuss that to-morrow. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12776) to provide further for the national security and defense and for the more effective prosecution of the war by furnishing means for the better utilization of the existing sources of electrical and mechanical power and for the development of new sources of such power, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCCLINTIC, for two days, on account of illness; and

To Mr. MARTIN, for 30 days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4722. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4194. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4543. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12429. An act to authorize the health officer of the District of Columbia to permit the disinterment of the bodies of Eliza Hill Bowles, Bernice Worthen Bowles, and Bessie Vivian Bowles.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the chairman of the Capital Issues Committee submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Capital Issues Committee for the remainder of the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1303); to the Committee on Appropriations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of certain proposed amendments to Senate bill 3475 to prescribe the requisite form of death proof (H. Doc. No. 1304); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3. A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a copy of the journal of the session of the Haitain Council of State dated July 4, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1305); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12860) granting to members of the Army Nurse Corps (female) and Navy Nurse Corps (female) pay and allowances during any period of involuntary captivity by the enemy of the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 816), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12936) to prescribe the pay and allowance of certain officers of the Army while holding a brevet grade, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 815), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 13007) to provide homes for soldiers, seamen, and marines, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judicary.

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 13008) providing for the purchase of uniforms, accouterments, and equipment by any officer of the Navy or midshipman at the Naval Academy, officer of the Coast Guard or Coast Guard cadet, or officer of the Marine Corps from the Government at cost; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DENTON: A bill (H. R. 13009) granting a pension to Jessie Worley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KRAUS: A bill (H. R. 13010) granting a pension to Louis B. Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McARTHUR: A bill (H. R. 13011) granting an increase of pension to Robert D. Rector; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORGAN: A bill (H. R. 13012) to correct the military record of Frank Rector; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By MR. VESTAL: A bill (H. R. 13013) for the relief of John T. Adams; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. DRUKKER: Petition of Richard C. Benson, D. C., and other citizens of Paterson and Passaic, N. J., indorsing H. R. 5118, placing chiropractic upon a plane of equality with osteopathy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: Memorial of Federal Board of Farm Organizations, favoring legislation requiring the tag on all interstate shipments of feed and fertilizer to show exact contents; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: Resolution of the Rupert Commercial Club, Rupert, Idaho, indorsing H. R. 7628, providing for an auxiliary reclamation project in connection with the Minidoka project, Idaho; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. VARE: Petition of National Federation of Postal Employees, requesting passage of H. R. 152; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: Petition signed by E. S. Dale, of Rugby, N. Dak., and others, urging the passage of legislation for the protection of sheep from dogs and other predatory animals; to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 27, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek the divine guidance and wisdom for the duties that are now upon us, duties that press so hard, problems that are so stern and unrelenting. As we come completing the mobilization of the forces of this country in the interests of justice and humanity, we pray that Thou wilt give to each element in our national life its full expression of patriotism and devotion, that we may be indeed united in heart, committing our all to the great task to which we believe we have been called by the Divine Providence in this day. Grant us, we pray Thee, such a complete consecration of ourselves that we may have the satisfaction of knowing that we are working together with God in the interest of the divine purpose in human life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, September 24, 1918, was read and approved.

HAITI'S COMMEMORATION OF THE FOURTH OF JULY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a letter from the minister of Haiti, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 18, 1918.

The Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President of the United States, United States Senate.

SIR: At the request of the minister of Haiti at this Capital, I have the honor to inclose for the information of the Senate of the United States a copy of his note transmitting, as a matter of record, a copy of the journal of the session of the Haitian Council of State dated July 4, 1918, showing unanimous passage of the motion to participate in the commemoration of the anniversary of the independence of the United States.

It appears that a cablegram was sent by the Council of State to the Congress of the United States in Washington expressing the sympathy of Haiti in the war and her wishes for the success of the people of the United States, but that cablegram failed of transmission and did not reach this country.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ROBERT LANSING.

(Inclosure from the minister of Haiti dated Aug. 31, 1918.)

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF HAITI,
Washington, D. C., August 31, 1918.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note, dated the 27th of August, by which I am informed that the cablegram sent by the Council of State of Haiti on the occasion of the 4th of July never was received at the Senate of the United States, having been mislaid by the cable company in transmission between Port au Prince and Santiago de Cuba.

I deeply regret that untoward circumstances which thwarted and stripped of all its purpose the spontaneous manifestation of the council of state.

Be it as it may, I beg your excellency kindly to transmit as a matter of record to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States the inclosed copies of the journal of the session of the council of state of the 4th of July, 1918, where the motion to participate in the commemoration, now world wide, of the independence of the United States was passed by a unanimous vote.

For my part, and in compliance with the wish expressed by your excellency, I shall not fail to impart to the council of state the information given to the Department of State and forwarded to the legation, and also the sentiment felt by the Government of the United States at that cordial step of the aforesaid council.

Be pleased to accept Mr. Secretary of State, and etc.

SOLON MÉNOS.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF THE REPUBLIC OF HAITI,
Washington.

[Extract from the Official Gazette of the Republic of Haiti. Le Moniteur, No. 46, July 31, 1918.]

COUNCIL OF STATE.

(Session of Thursday, July 4, 1918.)

Councilor Légitime in the chair.

A quorum being present, the session was declared open.

Councilor Hudicourt addressed the Chair and was given the floor. After obtaining the board's agreement to change the order of the day, he made the following remarks:

"Gentlemen of the council of state, in the gigantic contest now going on between right and liberty on one side and barbarity and autocracy on the other the Haitian people have not taken the part assigned to them by their historic origin. We are none the less bound to manifest our sympathy and interest to the generous nations which are now straining all their moral and physical forces in the common cause, and in that of the small nationalities in particular.

"The 4th of July is the date of the anniversary of one of the most momentous events of universal history. It is the date of American independence; it is the date of the triumph of democracy.

"I have the honor to move that the council of state do adjourn in commemoration of that happy anniversary, and so to commune with the whole world in the pious remembrance of immortal George Washington, the pioneer of liberty.

"I also move that the council of state send on this occasion a cablegram to the Congress in Washington expressing our full sympathy and wishes of success for the people of the United States, who with the powerful help of their commerce and industry bring to the allies of the European entente the decisive weapon which shall bring about final victory."

PIERRE HUDICOURT, Councilor.

Councilor Denis St. Aude, second secretary of the board, caused a second reading of the motion by direction of the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of Councilman Hudicourt is before the council.

It is adopted by unanimous vote and an extraordinary adjournment of the session is declared.

Signed: Léo Alexis, Dr. D. Laroche, Jules Bance, P. Hudicourt, H. Price, Chs. Sambour, Enoch Désert, A. André, J. M. Grandoit, Alf. A. Nemours, Chs. Bouchereau, E. Dornéval, V. Jn. Louis, Emile Elie, Arthur François, S. Villard, Estime Jeune.

F. D. LÉGITIME,
The President.
S. ARCHER, D. ST. AUDE,
The Secretaries.
A. INNOCENT,
Reporting Secretary.

A true copy.

EM. LAMAUTE,
Chief Clerk.
A. BLANCHET,
Secretary of Legation.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have a telegram from the Republican State central committee of Michigan addressed to me stating that "the Republicans of Michigan, in State convention assembled at Grand Rapids, yesterday unanimously indorsed the resolution known as the Anthony amendment to the Constitution." It is signed by John W. Smith, member of the Republican State central committee, and I read it for the information of my colleagues. I ask that it may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Helen Hunt, of Jacksonville, Fla., praying for the immediate passage of the Federal suffrage amendment, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4962) authorizing the payment of claims for loss of private property in the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BECKHAM:

A bill (S. 4963) granting a pension to Breckenridge Wash; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FALL:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 176) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to investigate and report amounts of damages as indemnity for personal injuries by wounds on American side, southern international boundary, supplemental to report in House Document No. 1168, Sixty-second Congress, third session; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOINT CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I send a concurrent resolution to the desk, which I ask to have read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 21) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there is hereby created a committee to be known as the Joint Congressional Committee on Reconstruction, composed of six Senators and six Representatives in Congress. The members of said committee shall be selected as follows: Three Senators by the Democratic senatorial caucus, three Senators by the Republican senatorial conference, three Representatives in Congress by the Democratic House caucus, and three Representatives in Congress by the Republican House conference: Provided, That only Senators and Representatives in Congress who have been elected to serve in the Sixty-sixth Congress shall be eligible for membership on said committee. Such membership shall terminate with the service in Congress of the Member, and vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as the original selections were made, respectively.

That said committee shall make an investigation of the following subjects and report to Congress from time to time with such recommendations as to additional legislation or otherwise as it may deem advisable:

1. Problems affecting labor, including—
(a) Unemployment which may follow war.
(b) Utilization of discharged soldiers and sailors in civil employments.
(c) Conciliation and arbitration of labor disputes.
(d) The relation of men and women in similar employments.
(e) Substitution of female employees for male and vice versa.
(f) Feasibility of organizing permanent employment agencies.
(g) Requirements for labor after the war, both in agricultural and industrial occupations.
(h) Distribution of labor.
(i) Employment of surplus labor on public works of which the construction or completion has been suspended due to the war.

2. Problems affecting capital and credit, including—
(a) All matters relating to trusts and combinations.
(b) Federal loans to private enterprises.
(c) Federal supervision of capital issues.

3. Problems affecting public utilities, including—
(a) The establishment of a railroad policy after the war, and the relation of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the railroads.
(b) All questions relating to communication by wire.

4. Problems resulting from the demobilization of our industrial and military war resources, including—
(a) The disposal of surplus Government properties and supplies in this country and abroad.
(b) The conversion of munition industries into those of peace.
(c) The demobilization of the war strength of the Army and Navy, and the disposition of the men who have been in the service.
(d) The demobilization of civil war workers.

5. Problems affecting our foreign trade, including—
(a) The development of new markets.
(b) Combinations for the purpose of increasing our selling facilities.
(c) Changes in our banking facilities necessary to cooperate with such trade.

6. Problems affecting the continuance of existing industries and the establishment of new industries, including—
(a) The supply and control of raw materials.
(b) The encouragement of the production in the United States of articles that have not been made in this country heretofore.
(c) The encouragement of private enterprise in the development of the resources of the public domain.
(d) The utilization of a tariff on imports as a means to protect and encourage home industries.

7. Problems relating to agriculture, including—
(a) The advisability of continuing after the war price fixing of food products.
(b) Federal loans to farmers.
(c) Distribution of food products.
(d) The allotment of lands to returned soldiers and sailors and their establishment in new homes on the public domain.

8. Problems affecting the adequate production and effective distribution of coal, gasoline, and other fuels.

9. Problems relating to shipping, including shipyards, and especially in regard to the sale, continuance of ownership, or leasing of both yards and ships.

10. Housing conditions and the disposition of houses constructed by the Government during the war.

11. War legislation now on the statute books, with reference to its repeal, extension, or amendment.

12. And in general all matters necessarily arising during the change from the activities of war to the pursuits of peace, including those that may be referred to it by the Senate or House of Representatives.

That the committee is authorized to employ such clerical assistance as it may deem necessary, including the services of experts, and may, by subcommittee or otherwise, send for persons or papers, administer oaths, and employ stenographers, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject before it; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate and House of Representatives; and that expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House upon the presentation of vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Hun is evidently on the run; and while we may not be able to see the end of this war, the end is coming. It may come sooner than we anticipate; and when it does come, we should be prepared for the conditions which we shall have to face.

I wish to submit to the Senate briefly and in a form which does not cover anything like all the subjects to which I have referred, some of the reasons why I think action should be taken on this resolution.

When the United States declared war against the Imperial German Government, in April, 1917, although the more observing had for many months believed this step inevitable, practically no preparation had been made, and as a result it was necessary to prepare for war at a time when war actully prevailed. This failure has had many decided disadvantages. It not only delayed our active participation in the war, but it has and will cost us tens of thousands of additional lives and hundreds of millions, indeed, billions of dollars. The actual material with which we have had to supply ourselves since the spring of 1917 will have cost many billions more than it would if it had been provided in prewar times. I am not saying this in the way of criticism. Quite likely a majority of the American people did not visualize the situation which was developing, and as a result there may not have been sufficient public pressure demanding that more active steps be taken in making preparations. We know, however, that the successes of the German armies in the first years of the war were largely due to the very thorough preparation made by the German Government and that the weakness of the allied armies was their unpreparedness when war was declared. Although the allies were better prepared than the United States when it entered the war, it took them, especially Great Britain, a long time to become effective fighting forces.

While the end of this great conflict may not be in sight, we hope it is, and we know now what the end will be. When it does come, it will not give us any time for preparation; indeed, in one day the whole world scene will change. Unless we take advantage of the present to provide for the future we shall be caught in exactly the same condition as regards peace as we were when we declared war—unprepared. It will be infinitely more reprehensible if we fail to make preparations for peace, because we shall have lost our opportunity to take advantage of the great lessons we have learned from this war. There might have been some excuse from the viewpoint of many people for not making ample preparations to fight, but with that failure before our eyes, the example of the failures of other nations, and, more important, the provisions these nations are making for peace, there is no excuse for our country not preparing itself to meet the great after-war problems. Every nation now engaged in war has been and is now getting ready for peace conditions. Nearly three years ago conferences were held by the allies at which certain general principles were adopted in regard to trade conditions after the war, the relationship of one power to another, the relationship of the allied nations to friendly countries, neutral nations, and the enemy governments. Similar conferences were held by the central powers. Quite likely the conclusions reached at that time may have to be modified, but these conferences indicate the farsightedness of European governments and the tendency on the part of the other nations engaged in the war to do those things which everyone must recognize as absolutely essential.

Since early in 1916, in addition to these international conferences, the various belligerent nations have been investigating and studying every conceivable question relating to after-war conditions, their relation to the social and industrial life of the country, and have at least tentatively adopted plans for carrying out the policies required by the new era we must face. This is especially true—and the evidence is at hand—in the case of Great Britain and, to some degree, Germany. In these countries the investigations have advanced to such an extent that separate ministries have been established to assume charge of the necessary reconstruction. In Germany, if the evidence I have is correct, three such ministries have been organized and one has been created in England. I do not believe an identical course can be followed to the best advantage in this country—at least we should reach it through gradual stages—but we must without delay take such steps as may be necessary to provide for the innumerable new problems we must face the day peace is made. Because we do not need coal in the summer is no excuse for not filling our bins for the coming winter.

The resolution I have introduced provides the authorization and means to make the necessary investigations. It may not completely cover all the questions to be considered, and it may be necessary later on to introduce additional resolutions covering particular subjects; but as I do conceive it to be the business of Congress to give its active attention to this subject, and to do so at once, I hope there will be no delay in the consideration or adoption of this resolution.

Very briefly, my plan is to have a joint committee of Senators and Representatives, six from each body, consisting of an equal number of Democrats and Republicans, to be elected by the respective caucuses of the two parties in each House, and that this committee shall undertake the investigation of the subjects enumerated in the resolution and possibly others which may be brought to its attention later on. It is not intended, of course, nor would it be possible, for this committee to personally make all of the investigations required. It is my intention that the committee on reconstruction shall have power to appoint subcommittees to consider such questions as may be assigned to them; that the members of these subcommittees shall be citizens especially trained in the particular matters to be examined; and that they shall serve in the capacity of investigators and advisers. In addition, it is my purpose that the joint committee shall have power to employ experts to collect evidence and otherwise assist the main committee and its various subcommittees.

There have been included in the membership of the subsidiary committees of Great Britain some of the leading men of the Kingdom, and as far as I have been able to learn the chairmen are men especially qualified to direct the work of investigation. For instance, the committee on commercial and industrial policy after the war is headed by the Right Hon. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the committee on agricultural policy by the Right Hon. the Earl of Selborne, the committee on forestry by the Right Hon. F. D. Ackland, member of Parliament. The gentlemen I have named indicate the character of the men associated with this work. These committees make their reports to the prime minister, and in many cases the interim reports made by these committees have recommended legislation which, I understand, is under consideration. These committees have been in operation for more than two years.

When the day comes—it will be a day, not a week, or a month, or a year—and peace is declared, Great Britain will be ready to act promptly in inaugurating policies to provide for the readjustment of its domestic and national affairs. The United States is remaining absolutely idle as far as these important subjects are concerned, and unless we act, and act promptly, we shall lose a great part of the commercial trade advantages we have obtained during the war, especially in its early days, and we will have much confusion which it will take a long time to overcome.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate some of the more important matters which should be considered. Let us take, for example, our shipping interests. At the end of the war we are likely to have a merchant fleet larger than that of any country in the world—a different relative position than the one we held at the beginning of the war. This fleet will be very largely owned by the Government. We have constructed some of the greatest shipbuilding plants in the world, and without going into figures it is probably safe to say that those plants will have a capacity under after-war conditions sufficient to build and repair the merchant fleets of the entire civilized world. What are we going to do with these shipyards?

Are we going to sell the yards, lease them, or is the Government to continue operating them? It may be decided to be best to abandon those least advantageously located. What are we going to do with this enormous American tonnage, two millions of which has been made available during the past year? I am informed that 400,000 tons more will be turned over to the Shipping Board this month, and a very large tonnage is now on the ways and will undoubtedly be completed before the end of the war.

This question of shipping is intimately associated with the important subject of our foreign trade. Our trade with neutral countries has been greatly increased during the war period, and it is in condition to be developed to a much greater extent. The question of our foreign trade is of vital importance. Before the war, out of a total production of some six billions of dollars we found it necessary to secure foreign markets for something like a billion of our products. The manufacturing capacity—indeed the entire productive capacity—of the country has been increased enormously since the beginning of the war. If it is to be operated at its full capacity, especially when the demand for munitions of war ceases and this army of workers and vast amount of machinery enter the field of industrial production, the United States will quite likely have an additional productive capacity of from 25 to 50 per cent. Markets must be found for this surplus production, and they must be foreign markets. If these markets are not obtained, there will necessarily be a great slackening in every productive industry in the United States, a consequent reduction of employees, unemployment, and hard times.

What are we going to do with all the manufacturing plants and other establishments created for war purposes, the machinery of which may or may not be available for after-war production? What are we going to do with the millions of war workers now so busily employed, and who will find themselves out of employment at once when peace has been declared? The Government must take some action to protect these war workers. We do not know whether or not they have improved their financial conditions materially as a result of the high wages received during the war. As far as it is obtainable, the evidence would indicate that the savings of workers of that character have not been materially greater than in normal times. If that is true, when they are thrown out of employment it will not take very long to dissipate their savings. Without assistance from the Government it will take a long time for them to readjust themselves in connection with civil employments. Therefore we should prepare to meet this problem and develop a definite plan to provide for the employment of these millions of workers.

In this connection one of the available activities to be given consideration is resuming the construction of necessary public works which have been delayed or discontinued on account of the war. Many people believe that the building trades will be especially active because of the almost complete cessation of this industry in private directions since we have been engaged in war. There is a grave doubt, however, that this activity will result. Ordinarily when times are bad and uncertain financial conditions prevail, the building trades are never active. Moreover, we are doing a considerable amount of building as a Government. What is to be done with these buildings? What is to be done with the houses the Government has provided for its war workers? Are we going to continue to own and lease these houses or are we to sell them?

A very important question which should receive consideration, it seems to me, and without delay, is the removal of the many war activities from the Capital to other cities. There is a surplus of housing and office space in all of the large cities of the country. Telephone and telegraph wires are under the direction of the Government, and the heads of the various departments could easily keep in close touch with these activities through direct and special wires. If this step were taken—as in the case of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, which has already removed its offices to Philadelphia—the housing question, as far as Washington is concerned, would largely adjust itself.

If any plan has been adopted for the demobilization of our Army and Navy after the war, it has not been brought to my attention. What is to be done with these men, and how are we going to aid them to resume their former or other civil employments? With the single exception of a statement recently made by Secretary Lane, of the Interior Department, relative to the occupancy of public lands by soldiers and sailors, I have not heard of even any tentative schemes proposed to provide for this exigency. The suggestion of Secretary Lane should be given the fullest consideration.

I think it can be made even more attractive than the plan outlined by him in the case of Government lands, for they will need drainage, and other important and expensive improvements will be necessary before they can be made available.

Providing employment for these 5,000,000 men and transferring the millions of war workers into similar employments will mean vastly increased production. It is useless to provide for this production unless we at the same time make provision for its disposition, and in this connection the importance and necessity of securing foreign markets for our great surplus production is again demonstrated. If that is not done, our surplus products will be so much greater than our demands that prices will be adversely affected and it will not be profitable to produce.

When peace is declared there will be in process of completion billions of dollars of war orders. Necessarily most of those orders will be canceled immediately. That will mean that manufacturers throughout the country will have on hand or under contract large quantities of raw material and material in process. The prices of such materials will undoubtedly decline at once. Who is going to be responsible for the losses incident to that situation? Unless the Government saddles itself with these deficiencies, there will be an infinite number of claims for amounts aggregating billions of dollars, and as a result of that situation we will have uncertainty for years to come and probably many failures. The credit facilities of the country must be mobilized and prepared to meet this condition.

Let us turn to the general labor situation. I am not now referring to that phase of it which affects war workers or returned soldiers and sailors. Many new conditions have developed since the beginning of the war. Millions of women are now doing work heretofore performed by men and with which they were not connected until the war required it. Are they to return to their former employments or unemployment, or are they to continue their present pursuits in competition with the millions returning from military service? Would it be well for us to provide for permanent employment agencies throughout the country and not only find employment for those seeking it, but arrange for the transferal of unemployed to localities where there is a dearth of labor? It has frequently happened in the past that labor conditions have been acute in one section of the country and there has been a surplus in other sections. In my judgment, comprehensive plans must be made for the distribution of labor.

Intimately connected with the question of labor is the one relating to social welfare. Many European countries and other nations have taken steps, nationally, relating to many social-welfare questions, for example, like providing for old-age pensions, life insurance, and other similar matters. Those questions are being agitated in the United States in some localities, and a pensioning system has been adopted applying to a limited number of civil employments. It is being done in a desultory and probably unsatisfactory and unjust way. If it is wise to do it at all, it should be wise for the National Government to do it; but before any comprehensive action is taken the whole subject should be thoroughly investigated and the results obtained in other parts of the world carefully canvassed so as to properly determine the question paramount in considering such matters; that is, whether action of that kind is beneficial or otherwise. It seems to me that this is the time when that series of questions should have careful consideration.

If the surplus output of products I have indicated is likely to exist—it certainly will if all of our people are employed—how are we to develop our plans to secure new foreign markets for them, and are our credit and banking facilities sufficient to finance additional foreign markets on such a large scale? These questions go hand in hand, and they should be determined before the end of the war. With our large shipping interests fully developed, our agencies established in many neutral countries, we may well take advantage of the opportunity which will exist to extend these markets. Moreover, in that connection a careful investigation should be made as to the possibility of manufacturing those articles which the United States has purchased abroad in the past, but which can be produced in this country. We should never again be dependent on a foreign country to supply us with those articles we can manufacture ourselves. Every encouragement should be given to the establishment of such industries either through protective tariffs or other means, so that as far as it is possible we shall produce the things which we actually use. One of the strongest features of the German campaign is the fact that Germany has been able, through a scientific industrial policy developed before the war, to provide most of the things it actually required during a time when its coast has been blockaded and it has not been able to trade with the rest of the world.

This question brings us to the question of trusts and combinations. Heretofore the German Government has been an active participant in the organization of combinations and trusts. In many cases it has not only encouraged them, but has taken a financial and active interest in their operations. If we may judge by the reports of the various British commissions and the conclusions they have reached, Great Britain intends to out-German Germany in this respect. We know that it has been necessary for our own Government to do many things on a large scale which have been required by the war, and the result of this policy should be carefully considered and the determination reached as to whether or not it is desirable that such a policy shall be followed in the future. Undoubtedly we are going to modify our past policy in regard to large combinations. If we do not do so, in my judgment, we are going to lose our present advantageous position in world competition.

Just as an example of the views entertained by the British committee on commercial and industrial policies after the war, let me make one quotation from this report. In speaking of foreign trade, it says:

> In all probability a permanent improvement can only be obtained from better organization of the trades concerned, but those interested will almost certainly look for assistance from the Government in a variety of ways, and questions involving tariffs will have to be considered and dealt with.

Great Britain talking about tariffs!

> In our opinion it will be necessary for the Government to give special consideration to the circumstances of each trade, and any request for encouragement and assistance should be dealt with not only on its own merits, but in relation to the trade of the country as a whole. It must not be lost sight of that the connection between the different trades is closer than is always recognized, and the fact that the producers in one trade are the consumers in others makes it impossible to deal with the development of any particular industry without considering its effect upon those employed in others.

We have by legislation permitted American industries to combine in foreign-trade operations. Shall we or shall we not permit such combinations in relation to our home markets?

We may also find it desirable to consider the whole question of raw materials and their regulation. If I may judge by the sentiment expressed as a result of foreign investigations, it is the purpose of European countries to as far as may be practicable control raw materials produced in those countries. Not only that, but it is the intention to control capital or the uses made of capital raised in the home country to be invested in foreign countries. A very pertinent suggestion in this respect may be found in the report from which I have already quoted:

> Amongst other recommendations the departmental committee suggests that all purchases of iron or steel made by or for the Government, public bodies, and railway companies within the United Kingdom should be of British manufacture; that the raising of capital in the United Kingdom for undertakings abroad should be conditional upon the purchase of as much of the material required as possible in this country.

Moreover, the committee on reconstruction should look into and review with great care the war expenditures made since its beginning and should make recommendations for changes and economies in the existing systems and methods followed. Necessarily in time of war more or less waste and extravagance prevail. Perhaps much has prevailed which has not been necessary, but, in any case, when the war is over the strictest governmental economy must be observed, and we should be ready to at once readjust our civil governmental system to a peace basis which will combine economy and efficiency.

We have taken over and are operating the transportation lines of the United States, and have also taken over the telephone and telegraph wires. The law provides that they shall be turned back to their owners soon after the termination of the war. There will be a radical difference of opinion as to the disposition to be made of these facilities and as to the relationship the Government shall have in the future in their ownership, management, and operation.

I think it is generally agreed that in the past the policy followed by the Government in regard to the railroads has not produced results which would warrant its future continuation in the same form. It must be modified if we are to have efficient transportation service. This question is altogether too intricate for me to indicate even in the broadest terms my own views as to what should be done, but the subject can be studied now as well as later; in fact, I think we have sufficient data at this time to reach some conclusions, and it should be one of the first subjects to receive consideration by the committee on reconstruction I have proposed.

I am not sure that this committee should take under consideration immigration problems, but that is a question in which the people of this country are greatly interested. Are we to permit immigration from enemy countries under the same conditions which have obtained in the past and on the same terms applying to immigrants of neutral or allied nations? If my conclusion is correct as to the surplusage of labor in this country after the war, we may very well place unusual restrictions on those who have been largely responsible for bringing about the world catastrophe, and either the joint committee I have suggested or some other body should give careful consideration to this important phase of the international problems presenting themselves when we have peace.

As I said in the beginning, I do not pretend that this is in any sense a comprehensive statement of the duties or possibilities of the committee on reconstruction. I may take an opportunity at a later date to add materially to the cursory suggestions I have just made, but it can not be necessary to urge the desirability of prompt and efficient action in the consideration of these questions, and I hope that that will be the unanimous opinion of this Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to have made of the resolution?

Mr. WEEKS. I ask that it may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

INTERFERENCES WITH THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, last week, during the consideration of the so-called water-power bill, I took occasion to call the attention of the Senate to interferences by outside departments with the prerogatives and duties of the Department of the Interior. As an illustration of some of the consequences which necessarily ensue from such a confused condition of affairs, I ask leave to put into the RECORD a recent judicial decision affecting the title of the Honolulu Oil Co., to which I then made reference, and also as affecting the future of one of the naval oil reserves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VERY IMPORTANT OIL DECISION.

Judge Frank H. Rudkin, of the United States district court, rendered a decision yesterday in favor of the Honolulu Consolidated Oil Co., fraught possibly with most momentous consequences not only to that company and to the Southern Pacific Co. but also to the integrity of the proposed naval petroleum reserve which Secretary Daniels has been persistently urging.

In this decision, which reached this city only yesterday, Judge Rudkin uses the following language in discussing the proposed naval reserve:

"I think I am sufficiently familiar with the facts, however, to say that the prospects for success on the part of the Government, or the probability that this will ever be a naval reserve of value unless acquired under the power of eminent domain, are not bright."

The proceedings in which this decision was rendered were instituted by the Honolulu Co.—whose lands in the so-called naval reserve have been twice free listed by the Land Department—in an effort to obtain permission to drill two wells on one of its sections in the naval reserve grounds.

The wells which it proposed to drill were what are called staggered locations; that is to say, they are wells 200 feet away from the border of the company's holding and 400 feet upward along the line of the border from that point. Commissioner Landis, of the Navy Department, and H. F. Day, Special Assistant Attorney General, had agreed that these two wells should be driven, as did also Gratz Helm, present receiver of the Honolulu Oil Co., through his attorney, W. H. Metson. The matter was then referred to Secretary Daniels by telegraph, but he refused his permission unless the new wells were driven 200 feet directly across the border line from existing wells on neighboring ground. As all authorities agreed that thus driving the wells would merely tend to exhaust the same oil zone that was being drawn upon by the existing wells on the neighboring ground, the Honolulu Consolidated Oil Co. appealed to the court for leave to drive the wells as originally planned.

In the course of the oral decision rendered by Judge Rudkin, the full text of which follows, he expressed his opinion concerning the outlook for the proposed naval reserve in language which should prove important to all oil companies in this State owning land in the territory involved:

"Some months ago the court made an order enjoining the defendant from drilling further oil or gas wells on the lands here in controversy during the pendency of applications for patents before the Department of the Interior, with the proviso that such drilling might be permitted on future application to the court when found necessary for the protection of the property. An application is now pending for permission to drill certain wells to offset other wells on adjoining lands owned or claimed by third parties. The Southern Pacific Co. has a large producing well in section 1, 200 feet west of the west line of section 6, township 32 south, range 24 east, and other parties have two wells of considerable capacity in close proximity to the northeast corner of the same section.

"It is conceded by both parties that usage and self-preservation would prompt the drilling of wells on section 6 to offset the other wells in question, and the only objection urged against such a course by the Government is the fact that section 6 forms a part of a naval reserve, and the Government desires to hold these lands and their oil contents for future use, rather than for present exploitation. If the naval reserve was an established fact, there would be much force in this objection. But such is not the case at present. Nearly all of the lands in this proposed naval reserve are now in litigation, a large part with the Southern Pacific Co. and a large part with the present defendant. The Southern Pacific Co. holds title to the odd sections under patents from the United States, and suits are now pending to vacate these patents on the ground of fraud.

"Seventeen quarter sections are held by this defendant under mineral locations for which applications for patents are now pending before the department. The lands will be of little or no value for reserve purposes unless the Government succeeds in both branches of this litigation, for it is conceded that the removal of the oil and gas from alternate sections would destroy the value of remaining sections as oil-bearing lands. It is not within my province, nor is it my purpose, to discuss the merits of the litigation referred to nor to express an opinion thereon further than may be necessary to enable me to properly exercise the discretion called for at this time. I think I am sufficiently familiar with the facts, however, to say that the prospects for success on the part of the Government or the probability that this ever will be a naval reserve of value unless acquired under the power of eminent domain are not bright. It would seem that in order to succeed against the Southern Pacific Co. the Government will have to overturn a decision of the circuit court of appeals of this circuit, and in order to defeat the defendant here it will have to prevail upon the department to materially modify its views. I make this latter statement with full knowledge of the fact that the land office at Visalia has decided the controversy in favor of the Government. However, it must be apparent from an inspection of the records that the wide difference between the Department of Justice and the Department of the Interior is not over the facts, but rather over what is meant by diligent prosecution of work leading to the discovery of oil or gas, which is a mixed question of law and fact.

"Without further reference to the merits of the pending controversies, I will only say that when we consider the certainty of loss to the defendant in the event it should be successful, the uncertainty of loss to the Government, whether successful in part or not, and the inability of the court to compensate the defendant for the loss sustained, either now or in the future, it seems to me that the ends of justice demand that the usual practice of offsetting wells should be followed here.

"It is conceded that it would now be a useless waste of money to drill an offsetting well immediately opposite the well of the Southern Pacific Co. in section 1, unless such offsetting well was drilled farther within section 6 than I am willing to go. I think, therefore, that the offsetting well in this locality should be located 200 feet east of the west line of section 6 and 300 feet north of the Southern Pacific well on section No. 1. This is the location recommended by certain officers of the Government at one time. The other offsetting well should be located in the northeast corner of section 6, 300 feet south of the north line of the section, and a like distance west of the east line of the section. It is to be hoped that the vexed questions here involved will be fully adjusted at an early date.

"Let counsel for the receiver or the defendant submit an order in accordance herewith.

"It is understood that the question of the title of the Honolulu Oil Co. to its properties will be argued before the Commissioner of the Land Office in Washington during the first week of October."

INDEMNITY TO AMERICANS INJURED ON MEXICAN BORDER.

Mr. FALL. I introduce a joint resolution and ask unanimous consent that it may be read in full and considered immediately. I think, if Senators will listen to the reading of the joint resolution, there will be no objection to it at all.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 175) to correct an error in the wording of the appropriation of $71,000 made in the act approved July 9, 1918, and to authorize the Secretary of War to pay said sum to respective parties entitled thereto, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas under the provisions of "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," approved July 9, 1918, among other things, an appropriation of $71,000 was made to enable the Secretary of War to pay to the heirs or legal representatives of citizens of the United States killed on the American side of the line at El Paso, Tex., Douglas, Ariz., and other points, as found and ascertained by the commissioners appointed pursuant to the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to investigate claims of American citizens for damages suffered within American territory and growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico," approved August 9, 1912; and

Whereas under the terms of said resolution of August 9, 1912, the duly appointed commission therein provided for afterwards reported recommending that the amount of indemnity due American citizens killed or wounded at El Paso, Tex., Douglas, Ariz., and other points (as appears by the report of said commission transmitted by the Secretary of War to the Congress of the United States under date of December 5, 1912, and being H. Doc. No. 1168, 62d Cong., 3d sess.), was $71,000, of which total amount of $71,000 indemnity so found the amount of $42,000 was as indemnity for deaths, and the sum of $29,000 was indemnity for those wounded; and

Whereas by an error in the wording of the appropriation contained in said act approved July 9, 1918, $71,000 indemnity was directed to be paid for deaths alone, when by the wording of the act the Secretary should have been directed to pay the indemnity so found to each of those entitled to the same in the aggregate of not more than $71,000, whether as indemnity for death or wounding: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to pay or cause to be paid out of the $71,000 heretofore appropriated by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," approved July 9, 1918, the sum of $42,000 to the heirs, executors, or representatives or parties entitled to receive same for the deaths of those ascertained and reported by the commission appointed under the terms of joint resolution of August 9, 1912, and that he be further directed to pay out of said $71,000 so appropriated the remaining sum of $29,000 to those wounded, or to their heirs or proper legal representatives, the said sums of $42,000 and $29,000 to be paid to the proper parties in the respective amounts as found and reported and set forth on page 20 of said House Document No. 1168, Sixty-second Congress, third session.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in the Army appropriation bill an item was inserted on the floor of the Senate appropriating $250,000 to pay certain death claims in New Mexico, and also to pay the claims referred to specifically in this joint resolution—that is, $71,000 was specifically appropriated. In conference between the House and the Senate the balance of the appropriation was struck out, leaving the amount $71,000 appropriated to pay the claims ascertained and reported heretofore—several years ago. That became a law; but in the wording of the amendment, after striking out the entire sum of $250,000, the Secretary was directed to pay the sum of $71,000 for death claims alone—that is, for death claims as ascertained by this commission.

The commission ascertained and reported $42,000 for deaths and $29,000 for those who were wounded. The joint resolution makes no change at all in the appropriation, does not add a cent to it, but simply corrects the error as it occurred through the attempt to make the appropriation of $71,000 after striking out a portion of the total appropriation. The total damages found to be due by this commission were $111,000. The amount of indemnity recommended by the commission was $71,000. The appropriation has been made to pay the $71,000, and the purpose of this joint resolution is simply to correct the error in the wording of the appropriation, so that the Secretary may proceed to pay the indemnities as ascertained and reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF SPREAD OF DISEASE.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution which I send to the desk may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 177) appropriating $1,000,000 for the use of the United States Public Health Service for the relief and prevention of the spread of disease in the industrial forces and civil population was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $1,000,000 is hereby appropriated for the use of the United States Public Health Service out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to become immediately available and remain available until expended, for pay and allowances of medical and sanitary personnel, including medical and hospital supplies, necessary clerical help, printing, and rent needed in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, transportation, freight, travel, and such other expenses as may be necessary for the relief and prevention of disease and the protection of the health of the industrial forces and civil population and prevention of the interstate spread of diseases.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, a very serious epidemic has broken out in this country in the shape of influenza, not unlike grippe, which develops into pneumonia, and is exceedingly destructive of life. There are 10,000 men in Camp Devens, in Massachusetts, sick as a result of this epidemic. Hundreds and thousands, tens of thousands, of the people of New England are in more or less distress resulting from it. The hospitals are full to overflowing. There are no nurses obtainable. The doctors are worked as nearly 24 hours a day as men can work. There never has been in New England, so far as I know, such a condition as exists there now. The Public Health Service inform me that this condition is spreading to other parts of the country, and that they must have additional assistance in order to cope with the situation. The Public Health Service, the Red Cross, the medical branches of the Army and the Navy are cooperating to prepare to check this epidemic, but they must have additional funds in order to carry out their propaganda.

I should like immediate consideration of the joint resolution. I have consulted with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He thinks that the joint resolution should go to the Committee on Appropriations. If he does not change his mind on the subject, I will ask that it be referred to that committee, with the understanding that it shall receive the immediate attention of the committee and be reported back, because this matter ought not to be delayed a day or an hour.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am fully in accord with the Senator from Massachusetts as to the vital importance of this matter. I think, however, as I stated to him, that a million dollars ought not to be appropriated from the Treasury until there is more careful investigation than can possibly be had in a mere discussion on the floor of the Senate. I think the joint resolution should go to the Committee on Appropriations, and I can assure the Senator that it will have prompt attention by that committee.

Mr. WEEKS. I will say that I introduced the joint resolution after consultation with the various health officials in charge of such matters in Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That Senator KIRBY be assigned to the chairmanship of the Committee on Patents, and that he, on his own request, be relieved from further service as chairman and from membership of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture; that Senator MARTIN of Kentucky be assigned to the chairmanship of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture; that Senator GERRY be assigned to membership on the Committee on Rules; and that Senator ASHURST be assigned to membership on the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate on the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, from the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and from the Committee on Public Lands the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, morning business is closed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Guion	Martin, Ky.	Sherman
Bankhead	Hale	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Beckham	Harding	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Benet	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Henderson	New	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sterling
Colt	Kellogg	Owen	Thomas
Culberson	Kendrick	Page	Thompson
Cummins	Kenyon	Penrose	Trammell
Curtis	King	Phelan	Underwood
Dillingham	Kirby	Pittman	Vardaman
Drew	Knox	Poindexter	Walsh
Fall	Lenroot	Pomerene	Warren
Fernald	Lewis	Ransdell	Watson
Fletcher	Lodge	Reed	Weeks
France	McCumber	Robinson	Wilfley
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Saulsbury	Williams
Goff	McLean	Shafroth	Wolcott
Gronna	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] is detained on official business.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is detained by illness in his family and that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained on official business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to have the RECORD show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent on account of an important engagement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, but I have been associated with members of that committee during the last several weeks in the effort to bring this matter to a vote and pass it, and I am intimately acquainted with what took place.

I want to say now, as an opening statement, that for weeks—yes, for months—the Woman's Party, an organization which openly supported every Republican candidate during the last campaign for the Senate and the House of Representatives, have constantly charged the Woman Suffrage Committee of the Senate with attempting to obstruct a vote on this measure. They have gone further than that. They have, in their campaigns throughout the suffrage States, used the argument not only that the committee, a majority of whom are Democrats, were obstructing this vote, but that the President of the United States himself was responsible for the obstruction of it. To a country not familiar with the circumstances that argument was exceedingly appealing. I confess now that it was having its effect as a campaign argument.

Why did not the committee bring in this joint resolution? Because the Democratic members of the committee had only one object in view, and that was to pass the suffrage amendment; and there were some others in this body who had only a political object in view. On one side the Democrats have been fighting for the passage of the joint resolution, saying nothing through the press, and having no adjuncts through the country to do politics, while on the other side there has been an adjunct to the Republican Party doing politics.

Now, what is the situation here? The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], as chairman of this committee, on three separate occasions was induced to bring this resolution before the Senate under the belief, and the reasonable belief, that there would be sufficient votes to pass it. He brought the resolution before this body and then found out that there were not sufficient votes to pass it and that, if it came to a vote, it would be dead in this Congress. He did what any sincere advocate of this measure would do. He took the first opportunity to withdraw it from its defeat. That is a fact.

What else happened? The Republican Party—that is, the Members in the Senate—on the 24th day of August, I believe the date was, held a caucus, according to the report in the Suffragist. The Suffragist is a paper run by the Woman's Party. It is supporting the Republican Party throughout the equal-suffrage States and supported it during the last campaign.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the woman's party the party that has been conducting the picketing here in Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the party. There is a National American Woman's Suffrage Association, which was headed by Dr. Shaw and is now led by Mrs. Catt. That association has never mixed in politics. It is not a party, it is an association, and it has never interfered in politics. It has the confidence, I know, of both sides of this Chamber. Every lady in it enjoys that confidence. It is composed of Democrats and Republicans. I do not know what the politics of any of them are, but I know that they have conducted their campaign in a ladylike, modest, and intelligent way, in wide contradiction to the method adopted by the adjunct of the Republican Party.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe, Mr. President, that the Senator from Nevada is in favor of woman suffrage. I do not think he is making any headway in securing the passage of the joint resolution by trying to inject politics into the question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am trying to get it out of the question.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I do not think he is doing it, the way he is undertaking it. The Senator knows very well that every vote on this side of the Chamber with the exception of 12 votes is going to be for the resolution. He can not say that much for his own party.

I wish to say to the Senator also that the Republican Party is not responsible in any way for the picketing, and members of the Republican Party upon the floor of the Senate have condemned it just as strongly as any Senator upon the other side of the Chamber.

It is poor business, it seems to me, to try to inject politics in any way into this question, and if I wanted to play politics I could repeat what Mrs. Catt has said about the President's attitude and what he has done for suffrage and what the Democratic Party is doing and claim she was assisting the Democratic Party. I am not going to do it. What I want to do is to secure the passage of the resolution, and the proper way to pass it is not to inject politics at this time.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am delighted that the Senator from Utah wants to see the joint resolution passed. I am going to talk along a line now that will assist him and some other members of his party.

The Republicans held a caucus, according to the Suffragist, which, I say, is an adjunct of the Republican Party, and in that caucus they adopted a resolution which I will read. It is reported in the Suffragist of August 31, on page 6, and reads as follows:

SUFFRAGE VOTE MAY BE NEAR AS RESULT OF ACTION OF REPUBLICAN CAUCUS.

Responsibility for further delay in the passage of the Federal suffrage amendment has again been clearly placed on the Democratic Party by action of the Republican caucus on Saturday, August 24.

On that day the Republicans unanimously adopted a resolution urging a vote at the earliest possible moment on the suffrage amendment and pledged themselves to insist upon the consideration of the amendment after the disposition of the war-time prohibition bill, now unfinished business in the Senate.

The resolution was denounced by Senator WADSWORTH, of New York, and passed after the election of Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE to succeed the late Senator Gallinger as Republican floor leader. These two "anti" Senators take the ground that they are pledged by the resolution only to support early consideration of suffrage and not to favor the amendment itself.

The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Republican Members of the United States Senate in conference urge that the consideration of House joint resolution 200, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, should be proceeded with at the earliest possible moment; be it further

"Resolved, That we shall insist upon such consideration immediately after disposition of the pending unfinished business (the prohibition bill), with all amendments thereto, and shall also insist upon a final vote on House joint resolution 200 and all amendments pending or to be offered thereto at the earliest possible moment.

"Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed as in any way binding the action or vote of any Member of the Senate upon the merits of the said woman suffrage amendment."

Now, a little later on——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from New York——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield for a question but not for a speech.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator does not want to give a wrong impression in regard to the Senator from New York.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am only reading what the adjunct of your party said.

Mr. SMOOT. But reading it for the purpose of impressing upon the mind of the Senate a condition——

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Utah can draw his own conclusions about it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] did not say one word in opposition to the resolution and did not oppose it. He was there at that conference and acted as secretary of the conference. Of course, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is here and can speak for himself. The Senator from New York is not well to-day and is not in the Chamber.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to say that I presided at that conference and that there was no opposition to the resolution whatever. It passed unanimously.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will simply say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have not commented on it. I simply read the report from the Suffragist.

Mr. LODGE. It was all published, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and I simply read the report. If the report is not correct, of course it can be corrected.

Now, almost immediately following that, we find this in the Washington Post of September 17:

"SUFFS" BURN SPEECH—APPLY TORCH TO WILSON'S WORDS DURING DEMONSTRATION—SYMBOL OF "INDIGNATION"—THRONGS WITNESSING DOINGS IN LAFAYETTE SQUARE ORDERLY AND CONTRIBUTE TO FUND—PRESIDENT RECEIVES DELEGATION OF AMERICAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION WOMEN.

As a climax of their demonstration yesterday, the National Woman's Party—

That is the publisher of the Suffragist. That is the party that is campaigning against the Democrats throughout the country to-day—burned President Wilson's words on suffrage at the base of the statue of Lafayette, opposite the White House. With a blazing torch in her hand, Miss Lucy Branham set fire to a scrap of paper containing words the President is reported to have made to a delegation of women earlier in the afternoon. The statement read:

"I am, as I think you know, heartily in sympathy with you. I have endeavored to assist you in every way in my power, and I shall continue to do so. I shall do all that I can to urge the passage of the amendment by an early vote."

That is the statement of the President of the United States, that these women said was but a scrap of paper and which they burned at the foot of the statue of Lafayette. Those are the women to-day who are campaigning the suffragist States not on behalf of anybody but against every Democratic candidate for Congress and for the United States Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not understand that they are confining their campaign exclusively to Democrats?

Mr. PITTMAN. I never knew them to fight a Republican in any State, and if they are fighting the distinguished Senator from Idaho as severely as they have fought him in the past it will not be a very hard fight, will it?

Mr. BORAH. I simply wish the Senator to understand that they are not confining their efforts entirely to the Democrats nor to Idaho either.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, during the campaign of 1916 they were very definite in their fight. Let me finish reading this article.

In burning the President's message they say this:

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TORCH.

"The torch which I hold," Miss Branham said, "symbolizes the burning indignation of women who for a hundred years have been given words without action. In the spring our hopes were raised by words much like these from President Wilson, yet they were permitted to be followed by a filibuster against our amendment on the part of Democratic Senate leaders.

"To-day the chairman of the Rules Committee of the Senate, a spokesman of the administration, stated that suffrage was not on the program for this session, and that the Senate was hoping to recess in a few days for the autumn election campaigns without taking up the measure. To-day the chairman of the Woman Suffrage Committee in the Senate, another spokesman of the administration, announced that he would not even call the Suffrage Committee together to consider taking a vote. This session is nearing its close and the President and his party refuse to take any effective step toward the passage of the suffrage measure.

Now, again, I want to read something from the Suffragist. On the editorial page of September 21, 1918, it says:

The National Woman's Party will campaign against the Democratic Party in those suffrage States in which there are senatorial contests, unless the suffrage amendment to the Constitution of the United States has been disposed of in the Senate before the fall elections. This was decided at a meeting of the executive committee of the National Woman's Party, held at the national headquarters in Washington on Friday, September 13, 1918.

It was decided to call a conference in Washington at the end of September, to be made up of members of the national advisory council, the national committee of State chairmen, and all State executive committees, to plan the launching of this campaign which will be conducted in seven suffrage States—Oregon, Colorado, Idaho, Wyoming, Kansas, Nevada, and Montana.

It is planned to send a "prison special" through these seven States during the month of October as part of this campaign against Democratic candidates to the Senate. Among the women who will speak on this trip are Mrs. Abby Scott Barker, of Washington, D. C.; Mrs. John Winters Brannan, of New York; Dr. Caroline Spencer, of Colorado; Miss Vida Milholland, of New York; and Mrs. Agnes H. Morey, of Brookline, Mass.

It will be noted that Idaho, Senator BORAH's State, is included.

These ladies themselves state who they are fighting. That answers the question of the Senator from Idaho.

On the same editorial page we find the following:

In some of the Western States, points out this warning bulletin, the contest this fall will be extremely close, and the Democratic supremacy in Congress may rest on the poitical capital which can be made of the party attitude toward the Federal suffrage amendment.

On the President's treatment of suffrage at this time may rest the fate of the Democratic Party in the Sixty-sixth Congress. However politely, the Federal suffrage amendment is very definitely being "put up to" the President himself by his conservative supporters as well as by the more "militant."

The woman's party's attitude is being followed in all the campaigns to-day throughout the West. It is not a fight of any kind except a fight against the Democrats. Take any of the speeches to-day of the woman's party on the individual candidates in the political campaign that have been published, and I defy you to find a single word against any Republican candidate in that State. I have not found it. Here is something I want you to hear:

This is from the Chicago daily Tribune, September 16, 1918. It says:

SAYS DEMOCRATS BLOCK SUFFRAGE VOTE IN SENATE.

Mrs. Medill McCormick, newly appointed chairman of the Republican woman's national executive committee, in an interview yesterday said:

"Women must be conscious that the vote on the suffrage amendment is being blocked by the Democrats in the United States Senate. The Democratic Senators are in the majority. Republican Senators, including even those who are opposed to the amendment, have formally and unanimously agreed to vote on the suffrage amendment at any time that Democratic Senators will permit it. A great majority of the Republicans, broadly speaking, are for suffrage and half the Democrats opposed to it.

That is simply read to illustrate the character of the campaign. Now, let me ask you this: Would the Republican Party be better off with this resolution passed and out of the way or would it be better off if it was defeated? That is a matter that you can answer in your own conscience. But I want to say this to you: The character of statements made by Mrs. Medill McCormick are being made by women in every suffrage State, and they are being backed by unlimited means in that fight, and their fight is being waged so strongly that political prophets such as Col. Harvey have predicted that this body will go into the Republican ranks as well as the House of Representatives. Undoubtedly, it is predicted, and I want to say too, that if that can be accomplished which, in my opinion some Republicans in this body desire to accomplish, the prophecy undoubtedly will become true. But it will not be accomplished. Twice the chairman of this committee and the Democratic members of it were deceived into bringing this question before this body. The Republican caucus is in favor of a vote. They are in favor of a vote to-day when we have not enough votes to pass it, and we who are sincere in the matter are not in favor of a vote to-day when we can not pass it, because our object is to pass it. A third time after the passage of the resolution——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator says "we" are not in favor of a vote to-day because we can not pass the resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is right.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whom does he mean by "we"? Does he mean the Democratic Members who are opposed to woman suffrage and opposed to the amendment? Are they trying to postpone it in order that votes enough may be had to pass it?

Mr. PITTMAN. I mean those who are in favor of the suffrage question on this side and members of the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it not true—the Senator has no doubt carefully examined the poll of the Senate—that a larger proportion of Republican Senators are in favor of the amendment than there are of Democratic Senators in favor of it? And that there are a larger number of Republican Senators in favor of it than there are Democratic Senators in favor of it?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like the Senator, so long as he is discussing the action of the pickets, to explain to the Senate whether or not it is the action of the pickets and the militant branch of the woman's party that caused the President to change his attitude on the subject. Was he coerced into supporting this measure—after he had for years opposed it—because he was picketed? When did the President change his attitude? If it was not because he was picketed, will the Senator explain what was the cause of the change of the President's attitude?

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator think there is any effectiveness in picketing?

Mr. POINDEXTER. My opinion is——

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like the Senator to answer that question so that I can go on with my speech.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will answer the question. I can only speak for myself. So far as the effect upon me is concerned it would tend to antagonize me. I am not in favor of militancy in politics, nor of attempting to coerce an independent body into the support of any measure. I do not think that, generally speaking, such methods tend toward a favorable result; but I am asking the Senator whether or not it had that effect upon the President. My recollection is that the President did change his attitude, and I am very glad he changed it, he deserves credit for changing it, and for the position which he now occupies; but so long as the Senator is going into an analysis of the political history of this proceeding, I should like him to complete it, and explain to us, in view of the partisan issue which he has injected into this question, just the motives that have brought about the change of attitude on the part of the leader of the Democratic Party.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will do that with a great deal of pleasure, of course, because nothing is pleasanter than to defend a man who needs no defense. I asked the question of the Senator whether he thought the picketing was effective, knowing him to be an intelligent man, knowing him to be a fearless man. His answer is that it would antagonize him and have no effect upon him unless it would have a reverse effect.

I leave it to him that very probably the President of the United States is just as intelligent and as fearless as is the Senator from Washington.

Now, let me proceed a little further in the matter. The President of the United States has publicly stated why he considers the passage of this amendment of so grave importance during this time of war. He has taken the same grounds that have been taken in England. In conservative old England, where they fought equal suffrage most tenaciously, it came in a flash; it came almost unanimously; and it came by reason of the abnormal conditions that demanded at the time that there be universal equality of mind and of action, that the women of England, who had taken the men's places in England while the men fought in France, should have all of the rights and privileges of the men. The President has taken the same ground. He has taken the ground that war has made it absolutely necessary to pass this amendment. But I am getting off the subject a little bit.

The Senator from Washington says a larger majority on the other side are in favor of this measure than on the Democratic side. Yes; but they have not the obstacles in their ranks that we have in our ranks. The Members on the Republican side have not the sentimental nor the social conditions meeting them in their States that are meeting some of our Members on this side. They have the power to give their full vote if they want to. There never was a time when the leaders of that party, if they had wanted to pass the joint resolution, could not have given 35 or 40 votes for it, and that without affecting them in any way whatever.

But what happened? Why is this resolution before this body at the present time in this critical condition? It is in a critical condition; there is no disguising the fact; and yet the leaders on the Republican side have this day said to those in charge of the joint resolution on this side, "If we are going to be beaten anyway, we might as well vote to-day and be beaten." When that assertion was made I happened to be present, and I said, "It will not be beaten; we shall not vote on it to-day if we are going to lose it to-day." No. I am not that kind of a suffragist; I have not that kind of sincerity. I shall not pledge myself to bring it to a vote knowing at the time, from the poll I have in my possession, that when it is brought to a vote it will be killed.

That was a magnificent resolution of the Republican caucus that they would do everything to bring this joint resolution to a vote immediately, knowing from the poll, as I said before, that it would be killed when they brought it up. Why did you pass the resolution? Why did you want to bring it up and defeat it? What would be the result of that defeat? The campaign that the adjunct of your party is making through the suffrage States would be confirmed. That is what would happen. You would give your 32 votes; you would give half of your two-thirds; and you would hold your hand on high and say, "We gave you the necessary votes, but the Democrats did not do it." We know that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I am utterly surprised at what the Senator says.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thought the Senator from Utah would be.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to make a proposition to the Senator: There are 44 Republican Senators and there are 52 Democratic Senators. If the Senator wants a vote to-day, to-morrow, or on any other day he may desire, the Republicans will, out of the 44 Republicans, cast 32 votes to-day or on any other day——

Mr. PITTMAN. That is just what I am getting at.

Mr. SMOOT. If you will give the 32 votes out of 52 Democrats. We can then vote, and we shall then have 64 votes. I want to say to the Senator that he is doing an absolute injustice to the men who have been fighting for years and years for woman suffrage on the Republican side when he says that. There is no intention whatever of forcing this joint resolution to a vote. I ask the Senator who has the joint resolution in charge——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I object to being interrupted in my speech by the Senator asking questions of other Senators.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will do it in my own time.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall be very glad if the Senator from Utah will take all of the time that he wants; but he will have to take a lot of it before he gets through with this. I am, however, very happy that the Senator has now definitely settled one question in our minds—that the Republican Party are only going to give us 32 votes. Do Senators know why the Republicans will only give 32 votes? It is because 32 are just half of 64—just half of two-thirds—and the Republicans clear their skirts when they know that this side has but 31 votes. Let me tell you something else, for that is not all——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Nevada is not bragging about the fact that his side has only 31 votes in favor of this joint resolution, is he?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not bragging about anything today, not even about the Republican Party; I do not think there is any ground for bragging. Between you and me, I will say to the Senator from Washington I do not think it is a matter of very much levity. It is rather a good joke to those who thoroughly enjoy it; it is a magnificent joke upon the leading suffrage women of the country who depended on you; it is a splendid joke on them. Why, you have done wonders! You have brought the joint resolution forward for defeat!

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To whom is the Senator from Nevada referring when he says, "You have brought the joint resolution forward for defeat"?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am referring to the proceedings of the Republican caucus, as published in the adjunct of the Republican Party, The Suffragist.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if the Republican caucus brought the joint resolution forward to defeat?

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, I will prove in a few minutes that they did. I am going to do you the credit of proving that you brought it forward.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the Woman Suffrage Committee, a member of the Republican caucus?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; that is obvious.

Mr. POINDEXTER. He is not a member of the Republican caucus, but my understanding is that he brought the resolution forward.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I am going to give you all the credit.

Mr. POINDEXTER. He told us some time ago that he would bring it forth; and if the Senator from Nevada, who now seems to be so much exercised over the action of bringing this amendment forward for a vote, has ever been opposed heretofore to bringing it forward for a vote no one has ever known of his attitude in that regard. The Senator from Nevada has been in the city; he has been in the Senate; and if he were opposed to bringing this amendment forward to a vote, as a friend of woman suffrage it was his duty to raise his voice in opposition to it, and he has failed to do so.

Mr. PITTMAN I will explain that also.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My opinion now is that the Senator from Nevada himself, not only in the past but to-day, while he is standing now upon the floor, and fully advised, is in favor of keeping this amendment before the Senate for a vote and bringing if to a vote before any other business is taken up.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, my charges as to the efforts of the Republican Members of this body to bring this joint resolution to an immediate vote are based upon their caucus resolution; are based upon the brags made by the woman's party with regard to the resolution; are based upon the picketing of the White House and the burning of the President's message; are based upon the speech of Mrs. Medill McCormick in Chicago; are based upon the speeches of Miss Ann Martin, of Nevada; and are based upon the statements of Miss RANKIN, of Montana. It would be impossible for us to take the credit away from the Republican Party of bringing this joint resolution to a vote.

But the Senator from Washington asks a question, the answer to which is obvious, as to whether or not the chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage is a Republican. That is a question Senators, will understand, that answers itself. But remember we are fighting now not to let the joint resolution come to a vote to-day, because we shall lose it. There are some on the other side who have suggested that it come to a vote to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. In order to settle this question, I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that the chairman of the committee has it in his power to say whether we shall adjourn to-day; whether we shall adjourn until Monday; whether the joint resolution be laid aside; or whether it shall be taken up. I tell the Senator now that, whatever motion Senator JONES makes, whatever he thinks is the best policy, whether to carry this resolution to a vote or to delay it, he shall be furnished with more votes upon this side to follow his program than he can get on his own side.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; but——

Mr. SMOOT. That is the situation exactly as it exists. Nobody on this side wants to vote upon the amendment and to defeat it. I say that with all sincerity, and I am surprised that the Senator from Nevada should even have made such an intimation as he has made.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not see anything in that to answer, so I will go on. Some of the Republicans, candidates for the House and for the Senate, evidently see a political asset in the defeat of the suffrage amendment. I do not know whether or not any of the Senators on the other side see it, but all of the members of the National Woman's Party see an asset in the defeat of this amendment.

Now, let me say this—I wish the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], but as he is not in the Chamber I will wait because I want him here when I make this announcement. In the meantime I want to read you something from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 17, from a speech by the Representative from Idaho, Mr. ADDISON T. SMITH. Mr. SMITH, in the course of his remarks, said:

THE PARTY FOR THE WOMEN; THE WOMEN FOR THE PARTY.

It is just such a party that women with high ideals and splendid energies need to make them effective for the public good; and it is just such women that the party needs to bring new views to sound experience.

Living parties are like living rivers, continually taking on new strength from many sources. New waters keep the river strong and pure to nourish life in the valleys, to turn wheels of power for industry, to bear cargoes of freight for distant needs. But without a guiding channel the purest waters in the world would become diffused waste or destructive flood. Party organization is the channel through which human intelligence and energy become effective in affairs of state.

REPUBLICAN MEASURES AND POLICIES TOUCHING WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

A few concrete examples of Republican acts and measures touching women and children are eloquent evidence of the guiding power and sound policy of the Republican Party.

Republicans established the Children's Bureau under the administration of President Taft and appointed Miss Julia Lathrop chief of the bureau, the first woman ever made chief of a Government bureau.

Republicans sent the first woman to Congress, the Hon. JEANNETTE RANKIN, of Montana.

Then follows a list of votes on various woman-suffrage proposals. He states facts but minimizes the conclusion. His presentation is effective in a suffrage State, and will be more effective in a suffrage State if he can add to that parallel column the defeat of the suffrage amendment in this body. Why? Because the Republicans will say, "We gave our half of the two-thirds vote, but the Democrats were not able to furnish their half." Did not the Senator from Utah know the number of votes the Democrats on this side had polled for the suffrage amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator from Utah knew that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course the Senator from Utah knew; and the Senator from Utah knows to-day how the poll stands on the Democratic side.

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator says he does. Then he knows that if he gave us the 32 votes and we voted to-day we would lose this amendment; and yet the Senator from Utah in conference with us this morning said it had been suggested that we vote to-day, and that if we were going to be beaten we might as well be beaten now.

Mr. SMOOT. That suggestion came from a Democratic leader on this floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. But the Senator said the suggestion had been made.

Mr. SMOOT. I did; and I say now that it was made, and that it came from a Democratic leader.

Mr. PITTMAN. I never heard that it came from anyone except the Senator from Utah. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] was with him at the time, and I made this statement. I said, "I will never agree to a vote on this joint resolution when we lack the requisite number unless there is every fair opportunity to get those in favor of it here."

Mr. SMOOT. Why does not the Senator state what the Senator from Utah did say? If he is going to try to tell the conversation the Senator should tell it all. I will tell the Senate what I said, and I will ask the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] if it is not true. I said, "I have always taken the position that I would not attempt to force a vote until I knew there were enough votes to carry the joint resolution," and I stated that what I wanted was to secure all the time possible to see if we could get enough votes to carry the proposed constitutional amendment through before a vote was taken.

Mr. PITTMAN The Senator did say that after he had said what I did say he said, and after I said what I have stated.

Now, let me go on a little further. How does it happen that this matter is now before the Senate for consideration? I will tell you how it happened. Listen to this:

The Senator from Utah, who has told us that the Republican side has but 32 votes and that he knows what the poll on this side is, tells us that he knows the joint resolution will be defeated if brought to a vote at this time. Let me tell you what the Senator from Utah knows further than that. He knows why this matter is here to-day; he knows why the Members on the Democratic side of the Senate who are in favor of suffrage are in embarrassment to-day. Nobody understands it better. Why? Because he knew just how many votes it would be necessary to have on the Republican side to carry this joint resolution through at all times, and he told Miss Hay, a member of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association, who served on a committee to discuss suffrage with the Republican Members of this body, that they would give them 33 votes; and then that association, headed by Mrs. Catt, invited the Democratic members of the Suffrage Committee of this body, together with one or two other Senators, to confer with them. They then urged upon the chairman that he bring the suffrage amendment before the Senate. The chairman said:

I have brought it twice before the Senate under misinformation; I have twice subjected it to defeat on account of misinformation. We have not the votes to pass the amendment, and it is a crime to bring it up to kill it. We may get the votes later, but we have no right, after the joint resolution has passed the House, to kill it in the Senate so long as there is a chance to save it. I will not bring it up until I believe I can carry it; and I do not care how many attacks the Woman's Party make on me; that does not concern me. I am for passing this amendment and not for killing it.

It was then——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Wait until I finish this statement. I do not want to be interrupted now.

It was then, by reason of the statement of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], that those ladies stated, "If we can assure you 33 Republican votes, will you bring the joint resolution up?" We replied, "Yes." Why? Because, although we had not enough with the 33, we believed that we might get 2 more votes. They said then, "We feel at liberty to say to you that Senator SMOOT, on behalf of the Republican Senators, has come to our committee through Miss Hay and assured us that the Republicans are ready to deliver 33 votes. We then asked for the names, to give us the poll, but they said they would not give us the poll; they said, 'Leave that to us, and we will deliver the 33 votes.'"

That is the way we left it; and under that assurance we brought this amendment before this body. Then, after we had been deceived into bringing it before this body, after we had been led into the trap, the distinguished Senator from Utah goes to the same people to whom he promised 33 votes and says, "We can get only 32." Why did he do that? Why did he promise 33? Because the 33 votes, with the votes that the Democrats then had, would still defeat the amendment. Why did he come down to 32 votes? Because we gained enough with the 33 to pass the amendment. What other conclusion is there to be drawn?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator is stating supposed facts that I have never heard of before. I know nothing about them; and I want to say to the Senator now that, as far as the 33 votes are concerned, there was always a question of doubt as to 1 vote, and it has been always so understood by me, and I have never made a statement to the contrary. If the Senator wants to know the doubtful vote, I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. DREW] will object to my stating the facts. I want to say that the Senator from New Hampshire has never promised me that he would vote for the amendment, and, as far as that is concerned, I want to say now that I do not believe he promised anyone that he would vote for or against it. I will say, however, that, as far as I am concerned, he never promised me that he would vote for it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator who has just taken his seat——

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator pleases, I can not yield. I will take my seat in five minutes, and then the Senator can talk all he wants to. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Missouri, but I want to get through.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Utah may have had doubt in his mind with regard to the Senator from New Hampshire. Undoubtedly, however, the women who induced us to bring this matter to a vote did not have any doubt about the doubt of the Senator from Utah, or they would have expressed the doubt to us. As a matter of fact, one of the ladies charged the Senator from Utah in the Marble Room yesterday with having pledged 33 votes and not giving them a poll so that they could use their own judgment, and the Senator from Utah said at the time he made the promise he thought he had them.

Now, then, if the Senator had any doubt about the Senator from New Hampshire, and he was going to a great suffrage association in this country through one of their committees, he had no right to make the assurance in a positive manner, and if the Senator with regard to whom he had the doubt, who was necessary to make up the 33, was in his mind, he should have submitted that name to the ladies and said, "This is the only doubtful one of the 33," and let them make their own investigations concerning him. But he did not do that. He did not give them the poll. He did not tell them who they were. You, Senator SMOOT, pledged them 33 votes, so that they would induce the Democratic members of the committee to get this bill on the floor and you could kill it, and then you could make campaign material out of it in the Western States. You knew that through that action you could carry Montana and Colorado and that you could probably carry the Senate. You know that. You, from a suffrage State, know that if you kill this amendment by a Democratic vote, giving one-half of the two-thirds yourselves and one less than half of two-thirds on this side, you will sweep those States with the women's votes. Do you want to do it? What would you do to do it? How much would you give, politically, to do it? Would you rather do that, or pass this amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, since the Senator is asking me, I will say that I would not act as has the Senator from Nevada to-day to accomplish a political advantage if I had it in my power, and the Senator has made some statements that I can truthfully say that he is mistaken.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know what the statements are in which I am mistaken. If any particular ones are pointed out, I will adduce proof in substantiation of them. All I have to say is that I was deceived with that committee. I know that those ladies did not intend to deceive us. They are too high class for that. They understood our position. They knew that we would not bring the matter here until we had a certainty of 33 votes on the Republican side, and they gave us that assurance, and stated that they got that assurance from the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants this resolution put back in just the same position that it was and does not want a vote upon it, all he has to do is to move to refer it back to the committee, and it will carry. It will not be considered at all or a vote taken upon it until the chairman of the committee wants it done; and it seems to me that this camouflage that the Senator is trying to put over on the Senate and the country is unwise and uncalled for.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and then if we should move to refer it back to the committee the Senator from Utah would say again, "The Democrats are obstructing the passage of this amendment. They will not let me consider it, but refer it back to a committee. We told you all the time they wanted to kill it. When they pretty nearly had it won they referred it back to the committee." When we want to postpone it a day he says, "If it is going to be beaten, why, let it be beaten to-day."

Oh, the whole thing is as plain as day. It is absolutely plain. The facts are here. They dovetail into each other. The written statements demonstrate everything in this case, and I, for one, wanted it known on my behalf that I have been deceived by somebody, and I have stated the facts of the deception. Let them trace where they will. I would not have voted to bring this matter on the floor in the circumstances in which it is now here, and I do not want anyone in my State to say that I was a party to the murder of this suffrage amendment. I wanted them to know the facts, and know them well, and I am telling them here so that the country may know. It is an effort to kill the Democratic Party in the suffrage States of this country.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Do I understand the Senator's position to be, then, that rather than have this joint resolution referred back to the committee he would prefer a vote, either to-morrow or Monday, and its defeat, because a reference back to the committee would hurt his party?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; the Senator does not understand that. He did not understand it when he asked the question. The Senator knows that I am sincerely in favor of suffrage, as much as he is, and he knows that the only thing that is moving the Senator from Nevada here is the critical condition in which this joint resolution now is.

If we refer it back to the committee, then we will be charged, as we have been all the time in the suffrage States, with trying to prevent a vote on it, and still the Woman's Party campaign will go on as it is going on now; and if we vote on it they will say: "We told you the Democrats would kill it, because the President would not make 32 on his side vote for it."

What you have accomplished is this: You have got this joint resolution before the Senate through a deception, and you have got the Democratic Party in an embarrassing position, no matter how it goes; but I, for one, am not willing to give up. I am not willing to vote to-day, when I know we are beaten. I am not willing to refer the joint resolution back to the committee when there is hope of winning the fight to-morrow, and I am not willing to-morow to refer it back to the committee or to have it killed. I believe that when the country knows and understand that this is politics—pure, cold-blooded politics—they will realize that their views on suffrage are insignificant in comparison to the importance of meeting such a subterfuge by a united Democratic Party.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Nevada expresses vehement indignation because he has been imposed upon and deceived. I should like the Senator, before he takes his seat, to tell the Senate when he found out that he was deceived and how he got the information which he now has as to how the vote stands. He said that the Senator from Utah misled him. I should like to know who disillusioned him and whether or not he has any information or any means of information as to the vote on this measure now that he did not have at all times heretofere.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator for asking the question. None of the committee knew anything about the change until yesterday. Not one of them, until after this matter had been debated here on the floor, knew a word about it. The same ladies who were used to deceive us felt it their duty to come and undeceive us; that is all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator, then, as I understand, charges that some of the women leaders of the suffrage movement were used as tools and go-betweens to misrepresent the situation to the Senator from Nevada and deceive him.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, that would be the appearance of things. I can not see any other light it is in, but that is the way it looks.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I just asked the question in order that there might not be any doubt or mistake as to the attitude of the Senator from Nevada. I think the country ought to know just what position he takes in regard to it.

Another thing that I should like the Senator to answer, if he will allow me to ask him one more question, is whether or not he thinks that the injection of this political issue here is going to help the adoption of this amendment?

The Senator claims to be a sincere friend of the amendment. He knows that there are a number of votes in doubt on both sides of the Chamber. He now has aligned this matter upon a partisan basis. Does he think that that will tend to bring these doubtful Republican votes or doubtful Democratic votes to a support of this measure? Does he think that he is aiding the cause of suffrage by the speech he is making?

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Nevada thinks he is aiding this movement. Although I would have a right, on the ground of personal privilege, to explain my connection with bringing this matter before the Senate, that would not have induced me to do so. I believe that there are Democrats on this side of the Chamber, who are opposed to the whole theory involved in this joint resolution, who will not stand idly by and see a political trick perpetrated on their party, especially to such an extent that it may turn over the control of this body to another party. They know how important it is for the President of the United States to be in perfect harmony with both bodies of Congress. I know that you gentlemen are loyal. Nobody is charging disloyalty on your part. You are just as loyal as we are; but there is not a man here who does not know that a divided Government is not as strong as a united Government. There is none of you but that knows that you can not have the same independent leadership unless every branch of the Government is in absolute accord, both mentally and politically, with the chief. You have got to have united command in government during war, just the same as in your Army. We have it in the army on the west front. We have it to-day in the United States. In fact, we have it to-day in the world, because the President of the United States is the united commander of the Governments of the world that are fighting this war. That is the reason of it. We are going to keep this Government united behind the President until this war is over, at least; and when we see a trick—a trick that may defeat that end—it is our duty as Senators on this floor to expose that trick, and I have done it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say one word with regard to this controversy.

Of course I am very sorry that there is discord among the advocates of this reform. I am wondering which faction will first mobilize at the foot of the monument and burn the other side's speeches.

I had supposed, until the last few minutes, that, in the minds of those who advocate it, this was a great fundamental reform movement, having to do with "the structure of our Government" and the rights—"the sacred rights"—of "one-half of the human family residing in America." But now it is charged by one of the chief advocates of the joint resolution that it is offered for political considerations; that what we are really trying to do is to get the votes of certain Western States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. I would not like the Senator to misquote my attitude. I do contend that the bringing of this amendment before the Senate at this time was for political purposes, and I do contend that it was brought here with the belief that it would be defeated. I do not contend, however, that the Senators on the other side who are advocating suffrage are not still in favor of suffrage. I think they are very sincerely in favor of suffrage. I think that they hope to have the credit of passing it at some future time, when they shall have control of this body, and when they will get all of the credit for it.

Mr. REED. Well, just let the differentiation stand without note or comment. It would appear, then, that at least the Republican Members regard political ascendancy as of more importance—these wicked Republican suffragists—than the adoption of this amendment. There is an old sporting phrase that covers the situation. By the charge made, we "pass the buck" to the Republican side.

Is it possible that the holy cause of woman suffrage is being employed as a political pawn; that "woman's hopes, ambitions, and rights" are to be sacrificed in this cold and brutal way by the advocates of her cause? Is it true that the leading advocates of woman suffrage are so insincere that in order to carry one or two Western States they will play fast and loose with the cause they have so often declared to be the holiest of the holy. Yet the confession is made. It but confirms what many have all along believed, that much of the support woman suffrage is receiving in the Senate to-day is purely and absolutely political. At last the cat is out of the bag and the string was cut by a very ardent suffragist. The animal appears to be a political waif, the ownership of which seems to be in grave doubt.

The question Republican and Democratic statesmen seem to be asking is, How many votes can we get in Western States? How can we play this game so that we will get votes? In one breath we are told with great vehemence, in a breath that rises to the shriek of a tornado, that "this is a question of winning the war." The next instant we are told that our Republican friends are playing politics with it, disregarding, of course, the war. The next moment we are informed that the Republicans are entirely patriotic.

If it be true that woman suffrage is necessary to the winning of the war, and if it be true that the Republican Party would postpone the winning of the war one moment in order to gain a political advantage, then the Republican Party stands indicted before the world as a traitorous organization. But if it be true that the Republican Party is patriotic and yet is willing to play politics with the suffrage amendment, it follows that the amendment has nothing to do with winning the war. Again, if it be true that the Republican Party is patriotic and also perfectly sincere in this matter and also that it has brought all the votes it can to its support, then I wonder whether it is very virtuous politics or entirely kindly—I will not mention the word patriotic—to charge that the Republican Party has been playing politics with a matter that, according to its advocates, concerns vitally the winning of the war.

I am sorry that that issue has been raised. The fact, as everybody knows, is that the adoption of this resolution has nothing to do with the winning of the war. The truth of the matter, as has just been confessed, is that this is a political question, and men are voting for it here because they think that it will help their political fortunes. Some are voting for it, in addition to that, because they believe it is right and just, and they believe in it; but that the suffrage question has been bandied about here as a political pawn there is no doubt in the mind of any candid man who knows the facts. What man will say otherwise on the floor of the Senate? What man here but knows the political argument has been put forward by the advocates of this measure, both in and out of the Senate. You all, in all human probability, know what I know, namely, that covertly or directly Congressmen have been threatened with political annihilation if they do not support the measure. You know, or at least I know, that the advocates of this measure have gone about declaring upon the one hand that if the Democratic Party does not support it the women of the country will rise up and smite the Democratic Party and annihilate it, and that if the Republican Party does not likewise obey orders it will meet with an even worse fate. That threat has been bandied about this Capitol until, if these walls could have made phonographic records and we could bid them speak, there would arise a chorus of threats that would shake the very dome above our heads.

It has been part and parcel of the campaign throughout, and there is no use in any human being denying it. Your friends are sent to you by this lobby with the message that "you are too great a man to suffer political annihilation by standing any longer against this movement." "It is going to win, anyway." "Get in line." Who will deny that statements like that have been persistently made?

But I rose intending to speak upon another matter. The burden of the charge just made by the Senator fram Nevada is that the leader of the suffrage Senators on each side took a poll of his votes and dutifully carried the result to the chief female lobbyists, at the same time promising these lobbyists the delivery of the votes as disclosed by the poll; that thereupon the chief lobbyist or lobbyists concluded the time had arrived for the Senate to vote, and accordingly gave orders for the resolution to be reported for action. If that was not a disgraceful proceeding, so far as it affected the Senate of the United States, then I have no knowledge of what could bring disgrace upon this body.

This, sir, is presumed to be a deliberative body, where Members settle questions according to conscience and judgment. It is further presumed that on this floor we debate bills and resolutions for the purpose of gaining all the light possible.

If we were invariably to await the test of debate before even arriving at a conclusion, we would be acting in a manner consistent with the responsibilities of the high positions intrusted to our keeping. What, then, shall I say of Senators who go about pledging votes and then delivering the pledges to some lobbyist, male or female? What shall be said of Senators who consent that a lobbyist from outside this Chamber shall direct the fight upon the floor and shall give orders to the leaders on each side when to report a bill, when to bring on the fight, once it has begun to conduct the battle?

Is it not a strange charge to hear upon the floor of the United States Senate that faith has been broken because a pledge of a certain number of votes, made to a female lobbyist, was not carried out? What right has anybody to make pledges to female lobbyists or male lobbyists or any lobbyist, whether in petticoats or pantaloons? All are alike obnoxious. Is it not a fine state of affairs that the generalissimo of a lobby can from her headquarters summon Republican suffrage Senators as a military chief might summon so many orderly sergeants to demand reports?

And if one of these poor sergeants or, peradventure, lieutenants, shall make a miscount of a single vote, shall he be charged with base perfidy? Shall he be held to have betrayed the State because he did not state the exact facts to the female general? At the same time, are Democratic suffrage leaders to be likewise summoned forth and asked for their reports? And after the lobby chief has taken an account from all parts of the field, has surveyed the scene of action, has examined the war map, inspected the gallery to discover whether her heavy artillery is planted in the north gallery, her seventy-sevens stationed in the south gallery, her machine guns located in the east gallery, and the lady patriot who burns up presidential speeches is properly ensconced in the diplomatic gallery, is the lobby chief to give the orders to the Senate of the United States, "You may now proceed to the consideration of the bill; I command it"? Is it not a contemptible position in which we find ourselves?

The strongest argument I have ever heard in favor of woman suffrage is that men charged with our high responsibilities will sink to so base and ignominious a level. The fact is almost conclusive evidence of the incapacity of man to hold great positions of public trust. Consider the Senate of the United States with a female boss outside or a male boss outside or any boss outside except the people of the United States, and I include in that every officer of this Government. I include in that the Cabinet. I include in that the President. The President has, of course, the constitutional authority and right and is under the high duty of sending to the Senate his suggestions, whatever they may be. It is our duty to receive them with respect, to consider them solemnly, and give to them all due and proper weight. That is his prerogative; it is his duty. But, outside of the President himself, no man has any authority to dictate to this body except the aggregate and consummate man, to wit, the voters of this country, representing as they do sovereignty within themselves.

The less interference there is with legislative bodies the better for our country. Suffrage may be a very sacred thing in the minds of some people, a very essential thing. I do not intend to discuss that phase of the question; but this much I say to the women of the country, suffragettes and nonsuffragettes, that this country is a free Republic. Their very right to demand a change in our Constitution is a part of that freedom; and this country is a free Republic because the people of the United States have retained the right to elect their servants and because in addition to that they have set up three independent branches of the Government, each a check upon the other, each essential to the perpetuity of our liberties, and each of them sacred from interference.

I have said before on this floor, and say again, that the man who would undertake to interfere with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States would be as bad an enemy of this Republic as an anarchist, because he would strike at the very citadel of human liberty; he would tear out one of the great pillars that sustain it; that pillar torn out the entire structure will fall. So also the man who undertakes to destroy the proper independence of the Executive will in like manner tear out another of the great pillars, without which the edifice of liberty can not stand. Equally true it is that the man who belittles and drags down and seeks to destroy the independence of the legislative branch of the Government is doing a work more insidious and quite as vile as ever was plotted behind the locked doors of an anarchist hall. We might as well face the truth that when a body voluntarily disgraces itself it is even more contemptible than when it submits to overmastering force.

If it be true that the Senate has sunk to such a level that the leaders upon either side of this movement, covering in the aggregate nearly two-thirds of the Senate's membership, can be ordered to bring forward a bill or withhold a bill, and those orders come from a lobby outside, whether the lobbyists be white or black, male or female, the Senate of the United States is in disgrace.

Let us see what becomes of our deliberations when Members are pledged up in advance in order that that pledge may be carried out to an outsider: "How will you vote, you Senator from a sovereign State? I want to carry the word to our boss outside." Is it not a shame? Is it not a disgrace? What would you think if the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, before waiting for the arguments to be made and before consultation among the members, were to permit themselves to be buttonholed by the advocates of either side and were to individually pledge themselves? What would become of that court? Yet this body has been supposed to be the highest deliberative body in the world. That has been its boast for many years.

Here matters are thrashed out. In this crucible the dross is frequently burned away and the pure gold extracted. While we may talk long, while we may talk sometimes without much purpose, in the end the debates here clarify questions and bring about better results than would otherwise obtain.

But now we find a petticoat brigade awaits outside, and Senate leaders, like little boys, like pages, trek back and forth for orders. If you accept that office, Senators, then put on cap and bells and paint your cheeks like clowns, as did the court fools of the middle centuries, and do your truckling in a proper garb.

Oh, shades of Webster, I summon you to look upon this scene, and Calhoun, with your master mind, come forth, and Clay, with wondrous tongue and mighty brain. Out of the past I call for the great dead that they may come and look upon this craven thing we do. As eagles might look down upon degenerate offspring molting in a nest befouled, so these departed spirits that once walked the highest plains of earth would look upon to-day's sad spectacle. Faith broken, if you please, and with whom? With some fair damsel of uncertain age, who stood outside to poll the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, the gorge rises, the tongue refuses to do the office of expressing those thoughts that must surge within the brain of every man who loves his country and respects its governmental institutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I trust my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will find it agreeable to remain on the floor for a moment.

I do not rise, Mr. President, to address myself to the principal question of the main amendment pending for consideration at this time. As the Chair has very tersely stated, the real question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], addressed to the constitutional amendment now before the body, providing that only white persons vote under the amendment.

I desire to give a moment's consideration to the impeachment by the distinguished Senator from Missouri which has come flashing from his genius in his usual characteristic way, inflamed with accusation, accompanied with denunciations, enshrouded in all those evils which destroy the dragon that I fear his imagination created to terrorize the thing that he fancied was around him.

My eminent friend from Missouri, I fear, exaggerates the thing he calls lobby. He finds it agreeable to pass a condemnation without qualification, stricture without mercy, upon a situation that has no existence but which must go down as long as anyone remembers these little ephemeral events as an indictment from a Senator of this body upon a class of people whose only offense confessedly is an endeavor to protect themselves.

I have heard my distinguished friend, for whom I have an entertaining affection, characterize these women managers as though they were enemies of the Government filling the lobbies of the Senate, as though these leaders were criminals of the country hiding in the purlieus of the Capitol. Indeed, as though they were vicious agents seeking to poison the avenues of legislation. I fear the Senator has conceived them in the image of some inhuman monster that was seeking to disgrace the Republic.

What is this particular thing to which the eminent Senator from Missouri has addressed his anathemas? It appears from a statement as I heard it—I have no knowledge of the facts—that a Senator from Utah, representing one state of thought upon this amendment, and a Senator from Nevada, representing another, seem to have been approached by representatives of women respecting the number of voters in the Senate which could be depended upon in the support of a measure or those which opposed it.

I am not able to see the offense which my eminent friend from Missouri conjures up in the mere fact that these women, whether they are for this amendment or against the amendment, have taken the precaution to ascertain the status of the thing on which each of them feels her liberties or rights depend.

Will it be urged by my eminent friend that there is an offense on the part of women who call out their public representatives, their public servants, to ascertain from them where they stand in respect to their personal rights? Shall it be said they become criminals because they have assumed to say to their public servants the thing which they feel is their right and solicit of them the support of the thing which they feel is their justice?

Has it come that a distinguished Senator can on the floor indict these women for coming about and seeking to protect their rights, when every railroad lobbyist in America in the past could with freedom haunt this Capitol when a bill is before the body looking to the guardianship of the Republic, who would intercept the course of government for the uses of their private fortunes, when there was not a word to condemn them or their emissaries, however guilty has been their object and criminal has been their design through the long years of senatorial legislation?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. I must decline to yield to the Senator. I will yield later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield for the moment.

Mr. LEWIS. Can it be possible, Mr. President, that certain heads of the great telegraph companies and the telephone companies can be found in every corner of the Capitol at a time when we seek to convert these agencies to the welfare of the Republic, assuming to obstruct it by every mode they could command, and to this there could come no voice that condemns? Can it be said if these are honestly protecting their rights that they are all of a virtue and the women who merely seek to obtain a thing they feel is their liberty are all of a vice? I can not behold it so.

On the other hand, if these women are here seeking to protect themselves in what they deem is their right as to themselves, are they to be condemned and held before the world as unworthy of citizenship and dishonoring its privileges? Would the eminent Senator from Missouri have condemned them when they were likewise in the lobby day after day, season after season, seeking to have passed a bill for the protection of little children, when they sought to prevent child labor from withering the young, degrading the youth, the weakening and the deadening of the citizenship of the land? I say no. He praised their efforts. Surely the eminent Senator would not condemn that; and yet they were then as active as they are now. That such was their privilege none of us in this body deny.

When the seaman's bill was before this body and there were efforts made to remedy the unhappy condition of those poor mariners who face death with the wash of every wave, and send up their prayer for the salvation of their children with the sparkle of every star in the silent skies above them, oftentimes without bed or bread, hungry and suffering, and yet maintaining the dignity of the land upon the torrential waves—these women came here in large numbers; they gave their aid, their voice to this humane undertaking. Surely there is no Senator who will impeach them in that for an offense against government, a violation of morals.

The eminent Senator from Missouri, I am sure, spoke without the reflection that usually characterizes his utterances and laid condemnation on a holy order of womankind in which, in after days, he will deplore out of the heart, which we all know is in him, of love and friendship.

What offense have these women committed when they come to this body and with their aid and voice seek to ascertain from their public servant his stand upon that measure in which they say their liberties are involved? What offense to morality do they commit by ascertaining the status before they risk that which they claim is their all in citizenship of the life which they live? Has there been a measure here from the War Department looking to the change of the status of the soldiers when the Secretary of War and his aids have not first ascertained from us the condition of the measure and the stand of the Senate and the probabilities of the passage of the bill? Did we bring the draft act before the body and dare to submit it, without realizing the forces about it that would either sustain or oppose it? Has a measure ever come from the Secretary of the Treasury as to a financial bill in this body in the hands of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency or that of the Finance Committee, without first ascertaining about where the Senators stand, their relative views upon the question, that it may not be risked to a defeat? Surely the eminent Senator from Missouri has failed to take time to reflect that after all the only thing that these women seem to have done, if anything at all, is in the line of all of that which has been the course and order of legislation every hour since the distinguished Senator and myself have been honored by seats in this body. And, sir, such conduct transpired in the shade of Webster, which my eminent friend summons from the gloomy places of the dead, and, too, when the voice of Calhoun resounded in the assemblies and the pristine glory of this body lighted the civilization about. In all the past for which we are renowned there was still the same situation, the same order of procedure.

For they were women, I tell my distinguished friend, who surrounded the lobbies of this Senate about Mr. Webster, to sustain him in the fight for the liberties of the black, and they, the women themselves, now strike for the liberties of the white and the black, male and female; yet I am unable to see where the foundations are upon which an eloquent and eminent Senator, powerful in himself, as is this distinguished representative from Missouri, can find to base a discrimination between all the events and history of those times of legislation and that which prevails, upon the confession of the Senator from Utah and of the Senator from Nevada, as to this particular measure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I declined to yield to the Senator from Missouri a moment ago, to whom I owe a first yielding when I get to a point where I should yield, and then I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. It is only a question of personal privilege to which I ask the Senator to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the word "lobby" became a reprehensible term. Rightfully applied it remains so when we have seen a class of men come about this Capitol for years and hold Senators to account and threaten them with dire results at home, or take other measures that might induce the weak, and dare assume those agencies which seduce the corrupt—under such circumstances the word "lobby" has a place, a meaning, and an application, fitting and reprehensible.

But it can be said earnestly by a Senator when there is a measure here that relates to a class of people such as these women, when they are the direct objects of the proposed law, when they are to be the direct victims of the defeat of the measure, when, from their viewpoint, their fate and fortune swing in the balance, that they are not to be heard; and if they dare express their views here to Senators in the shadow of the Capitol, they are to be ranged within that range of criminals of Government whom heretofore we have known as corrupt and guilty lobbyists? I protest against such and call the able Senator to reflection that he may do justice later to whom he has done injustice in the haste of speech.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Surely the Senator from Missouri can not mean that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. If the Senator does not yield, I shall call him to order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. Because I want to correct the Senator's statement. He has repeated it now fifteen or twenty times, and I ask him to permit me to correct it.

Mr. LEWIS. I then yield to the Senator. If his object is now to correct anything he has done, I am anxious for that very purpose.

Mr. REED. The Senator has said that I have made charges against these ladies; that I reflected upon these ladies. The charge that I made was that the Senate, by submitting to their dictation, had reflected upon itself. I cast no reflection whatsoever upon the ladies, and the record of what I have said will clearly demonstrate that. I am making this statement now for the Senator's benefit. If he desires to pursue his present course of misrepresentation, I shall be content to reply to him in proper time; but I very much mistake his character if he persists in it, in view of my correction.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, whatever may be my shortcomings in many respects, I think there is no Member of this body who from his association with me will charge me with having an intent to wrong any man. If I have misjudged my friend, it is because his remarks gave that conclusion to any human being of intelligence who heard them.

Mr. REED. Then you repeat your charge?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. If the observations of the Senator from Missouri had not the purpose of making accusation against the women as lobbyists, then I misunderstood his purpose; and, of course, my criticism in that respect could not apply to a thing which he says he did not intend to say. If said as I understood it—whether through lack of intention or deliberation—and I fancy those all around me must have understood, that his object was a malediction against women for their participation as lobbyists. I gathered that all the more from my eminent friend as he allowed himself in an unreflecting moment to characterize them as "a petticoat brigade" and to draw the figure of military and martial movement by referring to a feminine general, who gave her orders to her "colonel" or her "captain," who then brought them in as a messenger to the Senator and he besought them hereafter that if they should repeat this "disgusting performance" they should wear the cap and bells of the clown, or like a painted harlequin tremblingly crouch at the seat of her master.

The able Senator may have intended no such thing. There is no man in this body who will gratify himself with more pleasure than I in saying that a more valorous gentleman, a more chivalrous one, a more tender-hearted man, with courtesy ever to women, than the Senator from Missouri does not exist. It may be that I mistook his observations as applying to the women, thinking that he meant them when he meant, as he says now, not so to do at all, but that he merely meant to apply the strictures to the Senate, of which my eminent friend is a Member. That is a matter for himself. I am not here with any express authority to defend the Senate as its representative or ambassador. I fancy there is no man in this body who can not speak for himself; but since my eminent friend has now made withdrawal, or seeks now such qualification of his utterances that leave them no longer the utterance of impeachment against those who are just and who mean only to do what is necessary to protect their just rights, then I say that I am willing to withdraw, therefore, the condemnations I have made of those things which the Senator says were not intended by him. I am delighted to qualify my strictures to this extent. As he did not intend them and did not mean them, I hope when I take my seat he will find it agreeable to wholly withdraw them from the body and likewise from the RECORD.

Therefore, Mr. President, the eminent Senator, I fancy, having no other purpose than to characterize the confessions or the attitude of Senators, that is a matter which no one has a right to deny to him. He has a right to his own opinion, and he will, no doubt, express it to whatever he chooses, and in a manner in which no man need amend in order to give it strength or character.

Mr. President, I have but one conclusion as to this feature to which I am addressing myself. If there ever was a time in history when, from my viewpoint, a woman had a right to step within this Capitol, or into any other body in the world, to speak to her servant as to the things she feels are to her interest, it is in this hour. Whatever might have been her political errors—and they have been many; from my viewpoint the whole political management at times has been filled with errors, amounting sometimes, on the one hand, to the extreme of nonsense and, on the other hand, to the extreme of offense; but that was from my viewpoint, and I am not able to say that others would indulge that with me—I, for myself, sir, blind my eyes to it all, deafen my ears to every discordant speech coming from any of them, and lend whatever there is of indulgence and charity in my nature to mantle it. I say that if there ever was an hour in which any conduct of theirs should be condoned by all humanity, it is this, when to death they give every child, to their country every son, and to the hour of struggle and suffering every sacrifice. Surely if all things be as the eminent Senator from Missouri led me to conclude he thought they were—they are yet so insignificant compared to what these women have given of life and blood, and all they are yet to give and suffer—I could not bring myself to utter one word of criticism, far less condemnation, upon them. It may be that the measures they took might not meet the approval of the delectable and the exquisite, measured by the standards of legislative ethics, but at a time like this "it is not meet that each deed have its nice comment." As to this measure, as I see it, there is but one phase for serious consideration: Are they sincere? That they are my eminent friend and myself agree.

At a time like this do they believe that this amendment they ask is their right? They do. Is there any other place in the world for them to go for it than to the legislative body? None. Where would they come, and to whom, if it be not to ourselves? Then if the fortunes of the past have not educated them as to the methods, sir, of all form and caution of political movement, has it not rather been due to the misfortune of their surroundings and the lack of opportunity for political education?

For myself, sir, I want you to know, Mr. President, that I speak frankly when I say I have nothing to gain by this amendment. With my eminent colleague, Mr. SHERMAN, I participated in getting through the measure in Illinois for suffrage in that State, and became an advocate of it all through this country, as I had been in another State which once I was honored by representing in the Congress of the United States, the State of Washington. All over this country I preached the wisdom of having these measures passed by the States. I, sir, did not favor the theory of government that gave this privilege by national constitutional amendment; and had this war not come on and hastened the necessity of giving to these women this privilege and their rights by the quickest method at hand I would still have been opposing it because of my theory of local home rule; but at a time like this I feel, sir, that every little line of demarcation of government could well be wiped out if in the final result only justice and humanity were secured to those who have given so much for the very little they ask.

Sir, I repeat, I lose more than any man I know of on this floor, for if this amendment should pass now in my State the majority of women overwhelmingly would vote against me for any office to which I undertook to aspire.

There are two reasons for that: One because from a party point of view they are overwhelmingly against the party for which I have stood and which heretofore we spoke of as "Democratic," and the other, to be equally frank, is that it is my misfortune where I live, sir, to be regarded by the women generally, in matters of politics, as a mystery or as an impostor. The opinions of some of them in that respect I have not paused to analyze or to oppose; I have merely endured them, and I fancy I will continue to endure them without protest or defense. I merely remark upon it now to demonstrate to everybody around me that I have no personal fortunes in the success of this measure; but all the more will I be found to advocate it because of the justice it represents to humanity, and, in an hour like this, for the godly virtue there is in the grant these agents of government shall give to those who are the mothers of the saviors of the Republic.

Mr. President, there is but one question; let us meet it—and with it I shall have disposed of my participation in this debate. Eminent Senators have indulged at great length upon the constitutional distinctions of government. There is great foundation for those distinctions; there is great precedent to sustain them; but they are of the past. Sir, as I view this measure to-day and the issue involved the question is not, Can you give the women the suffrage, but will you? The minds of men may haunt the dusty tomes of the past to find some devious method or ponderous reason as their excuse and justification for the denial, but to the popular mind of humanity there will still remain the plain fact that we could do it and did not. If the answer be that we did not because there is a constitutional distinction between the local State government and its privileges and the Federal Government and its powers, I reply to the eminent Senators that such obstruction has all been repealed.

It may not have been repealed by a specific act called a constitutional amendment, submitted to the people; but, Mr. President, there are two constitutions in America. One, that which has been written by the hand of the framers and the other the unwritten constitution made by the conduct of the citizens. In the unwritten constitution of our country, made since the Civil War, these distinctions urged by Senators as objection to this measure have been wiped out wherever necessity arose to do so for the benefit of the Nation and welfare of the people.

Would it be said, sir, in connection with the law regulating child labor that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States by so small a fragment of majority does not specifically point out where this particular legislation is wholly justified? When we came to elect Senators by direct vote of the people it was, sir, an abrogation of the older system. When we levied an income tax, it was an abrogation of the older system. I appeal to the eminent Senators here in this body to recall the laws we have passed for the preservation of the Republic. Under the older system we could not have merged the State militia in the National Army without a constitutional amendment; but, because of the needs of the Republic, we did not hesitate, sir, wholly to ignore the fatuous distinctions of constitutional construction which had so long presented themselves as obstacles at every opportunity when men wished to invoke them, and by national legislation we accomplished every purpose which the welfare of the Republic demanded.

For myself, sir, I am unable to accept the constitutional distinctions urged by eminent Senators, however sincere they may be, as justification for their position. Mr. President, for myself I think there comes a time in all governments when the emergencies of justice repeal the influence of precedent, and when the demands of right invoke the ignoring of obstructions born purely of sentiment and created under conditions which themselves have no longer reason for their existence.

As to the amendment, then, sir, I not only support it because of the justice that is within it, but I deny the justice of the contentions that are urged against it. I can not, however, Mr. President, deny that natural sense of equity which Senators from certain States of the Union feel as to their own citizenship, nor can I impeach the sincerity of those eminent Senators in their desire to avoid a repetition or multiplication of the unfortunate burdens their States have suffered.

As I conclude, I reply to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] for a moment. The Senator from Mississippi, I dare say, voices the real reason of his opposition to the proposed constitutional amendment as well as of his support of his own amendment to the joint resolution. The Senator from Mississippi speaks of the effect that the proposed constitutional amendment would have on the women vote in Mississippi. He says it would increase the black ignorant vote. The eminent junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], in a very full and unanswerable argument, demonstrated that in point of fact there were no such dangers; but I answer this to say I will admit the danger for the purpose of the argument; I admit the condition for the purpose of the discussion; and this I reply, that under amendments now existing as laws the black man has the right to vote. "Yes," they say. Well, the people have passed local laws in their respective localities to protect themselves against the imposition of the improper black vote? The answer is, "Yes." Well, those very same laws that apply and protect from the male equally will apply to the female. So why any longer abound in these pretensions which are preposterous before the public mind and which will convince American sentiment that they are presented for the purposes of defeating a just measure with the hope of advancing some local prejudice?

Mr. President, I support the amendment, and I sincerely hope that it will pass. I am anxious that it will be early submitted to popular vote or to a vote of the legislatures, and that it may become a part of the fundamental law. But, sir, as I do so, I concede that there is honest objection born of the differences that men entertain as to the theories of our Government. So far as I am permitted, it is but to ask that they shall pause and consider the surroundings and recognize the eventful hour that is about us and give to these women, although denied as a war measure yet admit it as a human measure, and for this give every opportunity, and the quickest, that the women may cast their vote everywhere and in every particular for the welfare of their boys in the field, who are giving their lives and their all. I ask the measure as a support and strength of the mother who has been compelled to surrender her family, and of the child who holds her hand and looks into her face as its last and only hope it may have in all the days to come. For these at such a time as this I plead that we reject all distinctions of ancient government and in the present hour cry forth our doctrine in the words of Lord Mansfield, "Let justice be done; aye, tho the heavens fall." I thank the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I endeavored to halt the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] in his mad career in order to correct a fundamental error into which he had fallen, but he was so infatuated with the sublimity of his own thought and was so engulfed in the ocean of his words that he could not pause to allow a correction. I simply desired to have him understand, if indeed he did not already understand, that nothing I had said had reflected upon the character of any lady advocating the cause of woman suffrage and that any attempt to put that sort of construction upon my words would be unworthy even a verbal juggler.

I did state that there was a lobby, and who denies the existence of a lobby? And the lobby has not only been in the corridors of this Capitol, but it has had its ramifications in every State in the Union.

Mr. McKELLAR rose.

Mr. REED. In a moment. It has had its suborganizations in every county and in every township of every State. Its literature makes plain the fact that they have gone to the extent of learning the family history of Members of Congress and of examining into their financial standing, to the end that influence may be applied. All this is an open book and the evidence of it is conclusive. But I do not charge this to be a corrupt lobby; and when the Senator from Illinois undertook to say that there had been a corrupt lobby of the railroads in this Capitol and that I had uttered no protest against it, he came very near charging me with being a servant of that lobby. It was at that point I rose and asked to interrupt him, but the Senator, swept on by the tides of his emotion, refused me that privilege.

I feel some hesitancy about replying to the Senator. The fact is that his methods of attack are always confusing. When a man comes at you with doubled-up fists and with the glare of battle in his eyes, you know what to do; but when you catch a flutter of lace, and your nostrils are intoxicated with a delicate perfume, you do not know whether you ought to resort to blows or embraces. [Laughter.]

For one thing I apologize: I tried to get the distinguished Senator to acknowledge that I had made no attack upon these ladies. He did so in this wise—"if the Senator says he did not attack the ladies, of course, he could not have attacked the ladies, although everybody knew perfectly well he did in fact attack the ladies."

I apologize for ever trying to corner the Senator. I ought to have known better, after the advertisement that appears in the morning paper of the big liberty-loan rally. I read:

> Senator J. HAMILTON LEWIS, just back from France, speaker of the evening. Senator LEWIS is just back from an extensive trip over the entire American battle front. He saw the boys at Chateau-Thierry. He talked with French and American staff officers.

That will be conceded.

> He dodged 75's in a motor car.

Senators, I can not in a colloquy, by any verbal barrage or otherwise, corner any man who can dodge .75 shells in a motor car. [Laughter.] That is a degree of physical alacrity which is only equaled by the mental gymnastics you have just witnessed.

I do not know what the Senator expects to gain or lose by this gallant defense of ladies who have not been assailed, this refutation of charges that have not been made, except that possibly he hopes, in some way or other, to take himself out of that classification wherein he says the ladies have him catalogued "either as a mystery or an impostor." I do not know whether it was intended by this speech that he should convince them that he was a mystery, and leave that question free from all doubt, or whether he hoped to convert them to the doctrine that they were altogether mistaken when they applied the other and wholly unrepeatable term, because, whatever else the Senator may be, I am sure that he is not an impostor, for the word "impostor" implies that you shall impose upon somebody, and it is not yet written that the Senator has even attempted that. He is too honorable a gentleman. So I think I shall have to refer the ladies who are in doubt to the question of mystery and ask them to solve that in their own way; and as, according to the Senator's theory, they are possessed of all intelligence and are vastly superior to men, it is entirely possible that some feminine genius may, at some period of the world's history, lift the mystic veil and disclose to us the wonders it conceals.

The Senator tells us there are two constitutions. I welcome that statement from him and applaud it, because it is not many weeks since he practically told us we did not have one Constitution.

Time and again he has said upon this floor that the Constitution is, to all intents, abolished, at least for the present. But now that we have "two constitutions" we may find solace in the fact that when we get tired of using one we may switch to the other; and when the old written Constitution becomes irksome to us we may drift over into that hazy field which is occupied by the unwritten constitution and construe our acts and rectify our conduct according to that mysterious unwritten document.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care to pursue the theme further. I did not say, as the Senator asserts, that these women painted their faces like harlots.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator must surely realize that no such remark was ever made by anybody.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Illinois used the expression "harlot."

Mr. LEWIS. Never.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; the RECORD will show it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator's vocabulary does not draw the distinction between the words "harlequin" and "harlot." With one of those I have acquaintance; with the other, I have none—I mean, with the words in the Senate. I make no profession of virtue.

Mr. REED. The RECORD will show which one was in the Senator's mind, if he disclaims knowledge of the other.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not wish to have the Senator understand that I wished in debate to make the application of that word to any Senator in person. I meant just what I said—that the word "harlequin" was used by me. I made use of that word in the Senate; I did not use the other; and I meant to say that the other word did not figure in any expression of mine. I want to have the Senator understand that the word was not used; that in the debate I did not know that word; it was not in mind.

Mr. REED. See how much more generous I am. I let the Senator explain. I understood the Senator to use the term I did, and to assert that I had applied it to these women. I said—and this is my language—that Members of the Senate who subjected themselves to the disgraceful position which I was discussing would better paint their faces like court clowns. I said nothing suggestive of the other word, which, it seems, just came from the Senator's brain. I did use the word "mountebank," but I assure the Senator I did not do it in a personal sense.

Mr. President, we have had this lobby here, but that is not the thing I especially complained of; it is this truckling to a lobby. Let us see. Every railroad in the United States has the right to send a representative to a committee in Congress to argue any question in a proper way before that committee. Then it is the business of that gentleman to go home.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. When I get to the close of a paragraph, I will. Every woolen manufacturer has a right to send his representative to a committee of Congress and ask for a hearing and present his case and then go home. The brewers have the right to come before a committee of Congress and present their case and then go home. The Anti-Saloon League has a right to come to Washington and present its case, and then it ought to go home. The woman suffragists have the right to come to Washington and present their case fully and completely, and then they ought to go home. That is not, in my opinion, a right that can be denied to any American nor to any interest. But when organizations are formed having for their purpose the coercion of votes, and when organizations—whether they be brewers or suffragists, or whatever they may be—post their sentinels outside this Hall, and when leaders in the Senate upon either side report to that lobby, and when, having reported, the lobby leader tells these Senators when the measure should be brought to a vote and when it should be postponed, that constitutes a taking of control of the legislative Hall by a body outside the Hall, and it is indefensible. That is the thing I criticize, and the reading of my speech, which will go in the RECORD without the change of a word, will show that that is what I criticized.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I simply wish to remind the Senator that the antisuffrage branch of womanhood also has its permanent organization here and its lobby.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Very well, sir; I just as much denounce that. I just as much denounce anything in the nature of a permanent lobby upon one side as I do upon the other. But the difference I make is this: The startling difference was disclosed this morning upon the floor of the Senate, when the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] publicly stated and charged that one Senator representing the minority side had misled the majority by pledging to one of the woman-suffrage leaders 33 votes upon that side when in fact there was only 32, and that, relying upon that promise, this female director of affairs had ordered the vote to go on. That was not the exact language, but that is the exact meaning of it. It was that I criticized——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. In just a second I will yield to the Senator. It was that I criticised, and it is that I am criticising now, and it is that I shall continue to criticise; and I said, in addition, that threats had been made by these organizations.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he believes that the women who have been about the Capitol as he has described have broken any law, or have not been peaceable?

Mr. REED. Why, yes; I believe they have not been peaceable in Washington. I believe they have been peaceable right here in the Capitol.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if the Senator believes that, how will the Senator make his criticism accord with the first amendment to our Constitution, which I shall read:

> Congress shall make no law * * * abridging * * * the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is quite the most crushing thing that ever was hurled at my devoted head. [Laughter.] I say, since the Senator desires to open that door, that a good many things have happened that it would have been better if they had not happened; and here I make a distinction. I do not by any means charge this to all women, to all suffragists. When I read this language from the press under date of September 17, I ask you if, at a time like this, it is not most remarkable and startling conduct?

> Suffragists burn Wilson "idle words"—
>
> Great Washington crowd cheers demonstration at White House by National Woman's Party.
>
> Money instead of jeers greets marchers and unique protest against withholding of vote.
>
> (By Universal Service.)
>
> WASHINGTON, September 16.
>
> With a great crowd cheering them for the first time instead of jeering them, and throwing to them rolled bills and change, the suffrage demonstrants of the National Woman's Party burned on the plinth of the Lafayette Statue, opposite the White House, this afternoon the words President Wilson uttered to another group of suffragists earlier in the day.
>
> Holding a scrap of paper containing the President's statement to a blaze from a bronze flambeau and letting it burn to the last ash at her finger tips, Miss Lucy Branham, of Baltimore, protested inaction, concluding:
>
> "We therefore take these empty words and consign them to the flames."
>
> The message the President had given earlier in the day to a delegation from the National Woman Suffrage Association was:
>
> "I am, as I think you know, heartily in sympathy with you. I have endeavored to assist you in every way in my power, and I shall continue to do so. I will do all I can to urge the passage of this amendment by an early vote."
>
> Miss Branham, speaking of the message as she burned it, said:
>
> "President Wilson still refuses any real support to the movement for political freedom of women. This afternoon he again expresses interest in their freedom, but does not take the necessary steps to see that freedom becomes an established fact. His expressions of interest, therefore, are merely empty words.
>
> "To-day the chairman of the Rules Committee of the Senate, spokesman of the administration, stated that suffrage was not on the program for this session and that the Senate was hoping to recess in a few days for the autumn election campaigns."

There is more of it.

I hold in my hand, and ask to have printed, a special dispatch to the New York World:

> APPLY TORCH TO PRESIDENT'S WORDS—PROMISE TO URGE PASSAGE OF AMENDMENT NOT DEFINITE ENOUGH FOR MILITANTS.
>
> WASHINGTON, September 16.
>
> While President Wilson was assuring a delegation from the National Woman Suffrage Association this afternoon that he is "heartily in sympathy" with suffrage, members of the National Woman's Party later on burned his words at a "demonstration" held at the base of the Lafayette statue, opposite the White House.
>
> To his callers to-day the President said: "I shall do all that I can to urge the passage of the amendment by an early vote." But the militant "suffs" were not satisfied with this expression. They asserted that it contained no definite assurance of action.
>
> So it remained for Miss Lucy Branham, of Baltimore, who headed a parade of some forty women, to place a torch to the words of the President's latest suffrage statement, a copy of which had been secured from the White House callers.
>
> "The torch which I hold," she declared, "symbolizes the burning indignation of women who for a hundred years have been given words without action."
>
> In view of the fact that the militants had obtained permission from the military authorities for their meeting to-day there was no attempt made to interfere.

Here is an article from the Washington Star to the same effect:

> [From the Washington Star, Sept. 17, 1918.]
>
> INSULT THE PRESIDENT—WOMAN'S PARTY MEMBERS PUBLICLY BURN HIS STATEMENT.
>
> Characterizing President Wilson's promise to assist them in their efforts to obtain nation-wide suffrage as empty and insincere, the National Woman's Party burned his statement in front of the Lafayette Monument facing the White House yesterday afternoon. Miss Lucy Branham performed the incinerating ceremony. She applied a torch to a piece of paper on which was printed the President's statement declaring himself in complete sympathy with the cause.
>
> The women were aroused over the report that the chairman of the Rules Committee of the Senate had announced that suffrage was not on the program for this session of Congress.

> [From the Washington Post, Tuesday, Sept. 17, 1918.]
>
> "SUFFS" BURN SPEECH—APPLY TORCH TO WILSON'S WORDS DURING DEMONSTRATION—SYMBOL OF "INDIGNATION"—THRONGS WITNESSING DOINGS IN LAFAYETTE SQUARE ORDERLY AND CONTRIBUTE TO FUND—PRESIDENT RECEIVES DELEGATION OF AMERICAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION WOMEN.
>
> As a climax of their demonstration yesterday, the National Woman's Party burned President Wilson's words on suffrage at the base of the statue of Lafayette opposite the White House. With a blazing torch in her hand, Miss Lucy Branham set fire to a scrap of paper containing words the President is reported to have made to a delegation of women earlier in the afternoon. The statement read:
>
> "I am, as I think you know, heartily in sympathy with you. I have endeavored to assist you in every way in my power and I shall continue to do so. I shall do all that I can to urge the passage of the amendment by an early vote."
>
> SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TORCH.
>
> "The torch which I hold," Miss Branham said, "symbolizes the burning indignation of women who for a hundred years have been given words without action. In the spring our hopes were raised by words much like these from President Wilson, yet they were permitted to be followed by a filibuster against our amendment on the part of Democratic Senate leaders.
>
> "To-day the chairman of the Rules Committee of the Senate, a spokesman of the administration, stated that suffrage was not on the program for this session, and that the Senate was hoping to recess in a few days for the autumn election campaigns without taking up the measure. To-day the chairman of the Woman Suffrage Committee in the Senate, another spokesman of the administration, announced that he would not even call the Suffrage Committee together to consider taking a vote. This session is nearing its close, and the President and his party refuse to take any effective step toward the passage of the suffrage measure.
>
> CROWD'S MONEY FILLS HAT.
>
> Mrs. Grace Frost, wife of Lieut. Frost, of this city, carrying the American flag, led the procession of 40 banner bearers, while members of the police force cleared the way. The demonstration began with an appeal to Lafayette, written by Mrs. Richard Wainwright, wife of Rear Admiral Wainwright, and read by Miss Bertha Arnold. Mrs. Jessie Hardy MacKaye, of this city, and Mrs. Bertha Moller, of Minneapolis, made speeches.
>
> In response to the addresses the crowd began passing up dollar bills and finally a hat nearly full of silver coins for the party fund. From the start of the demonstration with its parade to the march back to headquarters in Jackson Place the crowd was orderly.
>
> WILSON "GOOD LISTENER."
>
> Several hours before the National Woman's Party demonstration a group of Democratic women from the South and West waited on President Wilson, asking him to use his influence to bring about a vote on the suffrage amendment. The interview was arranged by the National American Woman Suffrage Association and lasted 15 minutes.
>
> Mrs. Minnie Fisher Cunningham, of Texas, who headed the delegation, said:

"The President is a wonderful listener. He gives the closest attention to the matter presented, and you have his entire interest for the period of the interview. That is real democracy—to be able to get to the head of the Nation with the problems of the people."

BALTIMORE SUFFRAGIST BURNS WILSON'S PROMISE.

BUREAU OF THE BALTIMORE AMERICAN,
Washington, September 16.

A Baltimore suffragist, Miss Lucy Branham, took a spectacular part in a demonstration held by the National Woman's Party this afternoon to show the indignation of the radical element at President Wilson's answer to the delegation of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, who had called on him earlier in the afternoon. Standing at the base of the Lafayette Statue, opposite the White House, she burned with a torch the words of the President's latest suffrage statement.

Holding a scrap of paper with the President's message to the blaze from a bronze flambeau and letting it burn to the last ash at her finger tips, Miss Branham said:

"We take these empty words and consign them to the flames."

The message the President had given earlier in the day to the delegation was:

"I am, as I think you know, heartily in sympathy with you. I have endeavored to assist you in every way in my power, and I shall continue to do so. I will do all I can to urge the passage of this amendment by an early vote."

Miss Branham, speaking of the message as she burned it, said:

"We want action," she cried. "The torch which I hold symbolizes the burning indignation of women who for a hundred years have been given words without action. In the spring our hopes were raised by words much like these from President Wilson, yet they were permitted to be followed by a filibuster against our amendment on the part of the Democratic Senate leaders.

"To-day the chairman of the Rules Committee of the Senate, a spokesman for the administration, stated that suffrage was not on the program for this session. To-day the chairman of the Woman Suffrage Committee in the Senate, another spokesman for the administration, announced that he would not even call the Suffrage Committee together to consider taking a vote.

"For five years women appealed to this President and his party. The President has given words and words and words. We announce to the President and the whole world to-day by this act our determination that words shall no longer be the only reply given to American women."

Members of the local police force politely cleared away bystanders so that the suffragists might have ample room for their demonstration.

Miss Marguerite Rosett and a number of other Baltimore suffragists took part in the demonstration. Miss Julia Emory was a torchbearer.

Now let us see what the effect of such conduct and such publicity is.

We are told that there was a great crowd present, so that it was not a single woman's affair, and that great crowd which sympathized, and that great crowd which cheered, that great crowd which cast money before these women, rolls of bills, must have been a crowd of suffragists. They could not have been antisuffragists; so that you identify with this woman's act the general conduct of a large part of these people. The crowd, I take it, was not assembled here from Washington. Its leader was from Baltimore. The permission to hold the meeting was gained by a branch of this organization. That evidently is a branch of the organization which the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] this morning described as acting in harmony with the Republican Party.

Now, I do not know whether they are acting with the Republican Party or not. I am not charging that. I have not made a partisan speech in the Senate since this war began, and I will tell you what I think of you Republicans.

I think you are mistaken about a lot of political questions; but I think, when it comes to standing by this Government, that the Democratic boy and the Republican boy are dying in the same trenches, and that their blood, mingling in one common stream, is a rebaptism of American patriotism; and I have not a word to say to you in criticism. God bless you! You have stood like men, and you will so stand to the end. And while you are standing that way, though you be bitter partisans trained, trained to the business of partisanship; though you have fought partisan battles until you are covered all over with scars; though you have in political campaigns worn out your throats and lungs denouncing the party of the President, yet at a time like this no word of criticism comes from your lips. You stand back of him and back of this war, and manfully cry: "On, and all together as we go on!" While you are doing that, these women are in the public parks burning the President's speeches, and their assembled cohorts are casting money before them and cheering them; and the pleasant word goes to Germany that in the very shadows of the Capitol, in the very front yard of the White House, these women gain applause as they heap obloquy upon the Chief Magistrate of the Republic!

Can you send a message to the Germans that will please them better than that? If, sirs, we were to pick up to-night's paper and were to read that a surging mob upon the steps of the imperial palace in Berlin had burned the last address of the Kaiser and had denounced him and that the action of those who burned his speech was so much in accord with German sentiment that a large crowd assembled and cheered until the vaulted heavens rocked and cast money before the mob, would it give to us encouragement or would it bring to us sorrow and pain? Would it not, if we believed it to be true, hearten us all? Would it not make us gird up our loins for the fray? Would it not be to us a welcome voice out of the night of this war—a voice calling us on to triumph and to victory? And yet, sirs, this thing is done in America; and it is charged upon the floor of the Senate that that part of the woman-suffrage organization which thus defiled the public park, thus disgraced it that like conduct by men would have met with instant punishment, is a large and important element in this fight!

Senators, I lay this down as a truism: No one who will not obey a law has the right to ask to make a law. No party, whether it be composed of men or women, has the right to seek place in the halls of the lawgiver until its members are willing themselves to respect the law. No anarchist, who denies the existence and right of law, has any right to ask to be permitted to write a law for others to obey. That which he defames and he debases and he breaks he can not ask others to honor. No set of women have a right to ask for suffrage while they denounce the laws of their country. Neither have they the right to help to select a President so long as they hurl anathema and insult upon the Chief Magistrate of the Nation.

When you find these ladies at a time like this publicly burning the speech of the President of the United States in the Capital of the Nation, that conduct is almost the equivalent of insulting the American flag.

I do not mean that we must accept everything the President says and submit our judgment to it, but I do say that to take his speech and burn it in public is almost the equivalent of burning him in effigy in public and almost the equivalent of degrading the flag; and these things have been done. Moreover, they have paraded the streets of Washington, they have carried their banners in front of the White House, they have carried on a campaign here not of persuasion, but have attempted to carry on a campaign of coercion. This has not been confined to Washington alone. It is said that it is confined to one branch of the suffragettes.

Mr. President, that is not all. In England, where they had an outbreak of militancy which finally found its expression in acts of arson, in the destruction of property, in the breaking of wonderful statuary, in the desecration of pictures that were miracles of human genius, yet even in England when the war cloud enveloped the land the suffragette relaxed her efforts to stir up public discontent. But in this country, even while the boys are marching to the front, these women—this part of these women whom my friend from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] says are the Republican part—have not hesitated at acts which can not fail to bring aid and comfort to the enemy. What a spectacle it is!

We are told that women should be permitted to vote because their boys have gone to the front. Ah, yes; God bless them! The women of the country are not represented by acts like those I have described. The woman at home who gave to her first born a final kiss, who closed her eyes that she might keep back the unbidden tears, and gripped by a mother's heart so that her lips could say, "Go, and God bless you all the way." That kind of a woman needs no defense from me; she requires no encomium. Her crown of glory is gemmed with the love of the world. Her holy mission has been recognized ever since there was such a thing as mother's love and manhood's reverence for a mother's sweet divinity.

Back of the turmoil of this Capital where discontented women march and flaunt their banners and burn the speeches of the man who has been described as the foremost figure of the world, there still is that innumerable host of mothers whose souls are so exalted that they can sacrifice even their first born upon the altar of their country, whose trembling hands bind on the uniforms of their brave boys, and who, even while their hearts are breaking, can send them forth with words of courage to inspire them as they march to fields of danger and of death. I speak for these mothers and women whose nimble fingers in myriads of places weave into sweaters and stockings and stitch into handkerchiefs and bandages the love that will warm the hearts of soldiers who charge across the blood-stained fields or soothe the pain of those who writhe beneath the surgeon's knife.

So if I have spoken severely of the particular methods that have been employed by certain suffragettes, let me say, and I do it out of respect for womanhood, out of respect for that great galaxy of women who have stood by the men and helped men keep the home, who rear the children, and upbuilt the church, who have made life a song of love and the future a dream of bliss, for these women I speak, and they have not been heard. As for the others they are just now more interested in voting than in the conduct of the war. They propose to vote come what may, cost what it may. This is an attempt to trample the constitutions of sovereign States, aye, to do it legally, it is true, but still to trample on them.

I hold here the constitution of my own State. There is written by the people themselves in their organic law what the qualifications of a voter are. It is further declared that that sacred constitution shall not be changed save by the votes of the people of the State.

But when you pass this joint resolution, if it shall be adopted, then the Legislature of the State of Missouri shall have, in effect, transferred to it the power which otherwise is vested in the people, and when the legislatures of 36 States, some 2,000 men in all, shall have cast their votes, the majority of them in favor of this measure, it will become a law, aye, though nine-tenths of all the people of my State should will it otherwise. It is, of course, the method of amending the Constitution. It is within our power, but because it is within our power it does not follow that we should do it. It is within our legal power to submit an amendment to the Constitution that would set up a hereditary aristocracy in this land. It is within our power to amend the Constitution of the United States so that the office of Senator would be perpetual. Aye, it is within our power to submit an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that would destroy private property. But if we did these things we would run counter to every fundamental principle of right.

So when it was proposed by the Constitution that amendments should be submitted to the people only after two-thirds of each body of Congress had so voted it was intended that both branches of Congress should exercise their solemn judgment and put the stamp of their solemn approval on the act. After that was done, after that safeguard had been passed, then the measure could be turned over to the action of the legislatures of the several States. This was in lieu of the provision which otherwise would doubtless have been written requiring a vote by the people themselves.

I have spoken of the constitution of the State of Missouri. I have but hastily examined the books. Yet I find that in a large number of States the people have declared that there shall be no change as to the qualifications of their voters unless the people by vote shall make that change. All the people of those States will be deprived of the right they thus carefully reserved to themselves.

You will substitute for it the vote of State legislatures, and you do it because you dare not submit this question to the votes of the people of the States. You do it to deprive them of their votes. Your action in the report referred to is about on a par with your present performance. You sit here with almost a two-thirds majority declaring, "We will vote on such-and-such a day," and then when that day comes, if you are not ready, you refuse to vote on that day; and still you always stand ready if a man upon the other side shall sicken or shall die or shall be away, to take advantage of that fact and force a vote at once. Thus, you coerce with your power, to the end that you may override the constitution of sovereign States by placing it in the power of the legislatures to annul their respective constitutions.

Why do you not come to the issue and face this matter in the open arena, where all men shall have a right to vote? This is the people's country. It is not a country that ought in any way to be controlled by any influence or power on earth save that of the people. The nearer you get to the people, to use the common expression, the closer you get to the grass roots, the nearer you have a just and a fair government. Why is it that this method has been taken?

I have here literature of the leaders of the moderate class of suffragettes in which they say they propose to take the present outlined course "because they can get at the legislatures," and that they do not want to take the course of going to the people lest they should be defeated there. In my own State we have had the issue. It was a perfectly fair contest.

One hundred and forty-five thousand majority was rolled up against a suffrage amendment. Do you tell me, then, or if you tell me, I ask you by what right these ladies who burn Presidents' messages or this other class of ladies who resort to the more pleasant form of approach, who resort to argument and speech and an occasional threat of political annihilation—I ask you by what right they say they represent the women of Missouri? How do they get their badge of authority? What convention of the women of Missouri has been called to ask them to speak? There are, of course, some women in Missouri for this measure. There are some people everywhere in favor of almost every vagary in government that ever has been conceived. Who has authority to speak for the women of Missouri? I have had petitions from a few.

I have had remonstrances from many. I simply speak what I believe when I say that if this measure were referred to the people of my State, and if the women were allowed to vote, and not a single man, I believe they would defeat it. They would defeat it, why? They would defeat it very much for the reason that these ladies, speaking of them by and large, have no ambition to try and be the head of the household, and by parity of reasoning they have no ambition to try and be the head of the State. Most of them are content, disgraceful as it may appear in this age of the world's history, to recognize in their fathers the head of the family, or in their husbands the head of the family—the head of the family for the purpose of going out and doing battle in the world; the head of the family for the purpose of bringing home sustenance; the head of the family for the purpose of standing at the door of the household and protecting it; the head of the family for the purpose of defending the honor of wife and of child, if need be, with life; while they have claimed for themselves the right to be the head of the family in the sense that they mother the children, they rear the children, they keep the home, they teach the divine principles of religion, they keep the holy precepts of human love, and in that sphere they are supreme. In that sphere they are sublime, and no one would try to take it from them.

These women in my State believe in the old-fashioned doctrine that men should fight the battles on the red line; that men should stand and bare their bosoms to the iron hail; and that back of them, if need be, there shall be women who may bind up the wounds and whose tender hands may rest upon the brow of the valiant soldier who has gone down in the fight.

But, sir, that is woman's work, and it has been woman's work always. There never was a time, from the days of the stone age, when the man went forth to battle with wild beasts and came home torn and rent, but the woman of his cave bound up his wounds. There never was a time, either, when he would not stand at the door of that cave and fight the wild beasts and protect the woman as she crouched behind with her brood. It is manhood upon one side and womanhood upon the other.

What is it that these ladies are to gain? Why should we have this period of agitation just now? This is the worst time in the history of the world for agitation of this sort. Do you tell me that it will help win the war? I venture to dissent from that statement, no matter from what authority it may come. Help you win the war! Why? I heard some one say that it would be a certificate of our democracy to other lands. Let us analyze that thought for just a moment. Shall we certify to our democracy for the benefit of the Germans or Austrians or Turks? These people live under absolute monarchy, and despise, most of them, the very name of democracy. If they had loved democracy they would have had democracy, for every government is but the reflection of the souls of the people, save where you find a conquered race crushed by the iron heel of power.

Outside of that, government is the reflection of the soul of people. The reason for having a Kaiser in Germany is because there is a little Kaiser in the heart of every Prussian. The reason for having a monarch in Turkey—I have forgotten what you call the scoundrel—a Sultan—is because the people believe in Sultans; the reason for having harems in Turkey is because the people believe in harems. Shall we, then, make apology because we are not sufficiently democratic to these monstrous Governments and these people who have been so long taught, and misled by their teachings, that they are part and parcel of the scheme of government? Shall we do that? Well, then, pray where shall we go to apologize? Shall it be to Russia? Why, Russia abolished vodka and introduced woman suffrage; and, if that be an example, it is upon the wrong side, for Russia is now an intellectual and moral waste where the wild beasts of passion prey upon the weak and where cruelty draws back the lips of vengeance from the white fangs of hate and sinks them into the hearts of the helpless.

Shall we then go to France, which for but some 40 or 50 years has been a republic, and take lessons from her? Oh, splendid, glorious France, whose sons charge over bloody battle fields and die with cheers upon their lips—glorious, splendid France! But France has not adopted woman suffrage, and the women of France who bind up the wounds, the women of France who work in the fields, the women of France whose tireless fingers are making cartridges for the Huns and bandages for their brave Frenchmen at the front—these women are satisfied with the democracy of France and are praying God that America may help them preserve the democracy they have, and they are welcoming the Yankee boys with kisses and with flowers. We do not need to apologize to France.

Shall we then go to England? Why, sir, do we need to apologize to any government that, much as we respect and even love her, yet has a king upon a throne; which has an hereditary aristocracy; which has a House of Lords whose members hold their seats by virtue of ancestral blood? Shall we find it necessary to apologize for American democracy to that country, however great and splendid it may be—that country which once put chains upon us, which were broken by the stout swords of Washington and Lafayette?

Well, then, where shall we apologize for our democracy? Shall it be to Italy—a country that in modern times set up a kingdom; that even now has a king upon his throne; who sent us here as its representative in this democratic hall a prince, to be introduced by his title and to wear the insignia of his royal blood? Do we need to apologize to Italy, whose very front to-day we help to hold; whose wall of flesh and blood along the Austrian front finds some of its chief pillars in the Yankee troops who fight to save the soil of Italy from trembling beneath the tread of Austrian foemen?

Who challenges our democracy? None but a Bolshevik, some creature who denies all government. Shall we yield to them? Why, sir, this democracy of ours is the proudest thing in all the world. Its foundation stones were laid by the mightiest builders of all times.

The men who sat and looked back through the ages of the past and read the story of mankind's struggles and woes and then sat down to plan a citadel of liberty so mighty that it could never be overthrown—the men who sat about that council chamber were the master spirits of the world. To them we might now offer almost our very prayers if it were not impiety to pray to any but Almighty God. There was Jefferson, in whose great brain was pictured the evils and the wrongs of all the past; Madison and Washington and Hamilton and all the immortals who here wisely planned and laid the foundations of the great temple of our liberty. When they thus planned and builded, sirs, they knew the danger of concentrated power; they knew that authority feeds upon itself and, like a monster, grows from its own flesh until it will destroy the liberties of all. So they declared that there should be no powerful central government; that each State should keep complete and absolute sovereignty, save as it might yield certain limited rights for certain common purposes and ends.

They left to the several States the absolute right to frame their own governments, only stipulating that they should be of republican form; they left to the States the right to say who should vote and how the affairs of the people should be conducted; they left to the States every right save the few rights that were delegated and which were essential to the stability of the Central Government. The first great infringement on that right was during the late war, when, because of the negro question then involved, Congress passed the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments; but those amendments were intended at that time only to reach that question. Always it had been conceded that Kansas might settle for herself the question of the suffrage of her citizens; that Arizona might settle for herself the question as to who should vote there; that South Carolina should have the same privilege; and that all the other States in unison should have similar rights and privileges. Now it is proposed to deny this right.

I oppose this joint resolution because it is violative not of the Constitution, for, as I have said, you may change the Constitution, but because it is violative of the spirit of our institutions. I oppose it because it seems to me the unjustest thing on earth to undertake to fix the qualifications of voters in my State, and for those qualifications to be fixed by men and women who never set foot upon our soil, and who know nothing of the institutions of our State. I do not want to undertake to tell Arizona who shall vote in the State of Arizona; I have no right to do so, because the people of Arizona know their own affairs, and are capable of controlling them. I do not want to interfere in Colorado, for the people of Colorado know their own affairs. It would be an act of the grossest temerity if I should undertake to tell the people of Virginia, or the people of Georgia, how they should control their affairs.

Mr. President, this is a matter that belongs to the States; it has heretofore remained with the States. Under this system of government that has grown up we have prospered. If it were proposed to-morrow to amend the Constitution of the United States so that the women of Arizona could not vote, I should vote against doing so, because that is the business of Arizona. If it were proposed to amend the Constitution so that the women of Wyoming could not vote, I should vote against doing so, because that is the business of Wyoming, and so of every other suffrage State. I would not vote to interfere with their right to let women vote; but I insist that they should not interfere with the right of other States to settle their own affairs.

Why is it that at a time like this we should have this question thrust upon us? This is the second time it has been here. It has been present all this session. The minds of Senators have been diverted and drawn away from the work of this war by this eternal question constantly coming up.

We were ready to vote upon it weeks ago; men were brought here from every quarter of the country; pairs were refused; everything was in readiness; but the matter was delayed because there was not a two-thirds majority for the proposition. Again we were notified to be here on Thursday; that there would be a vote on Thursday. I honor the Senator in charge of the bill for giving us the notice. He did not try to take snap judgment. Senators have traveled thousands of miles to be here, and yet we are not permitted to vote, and we do not know whether we are going to be permitted to vote on this resolution next Saturday or not. In the meantime, there is a dispute whether we ought or ought not to be permitted to vote, because the lobbyists may have been deceived as to the exact number of Republicans pledged to vote for the measure.

Mr. President, why do we need this? I have said that the fathers have laid the foundations of this country wisely; and how wisely did they lay them. The tides of our civilization have swept from the Atlantic coast to the golden shore. Where there were 3,000,000 people there are now 104,000,000; we have bound this country together with bands of steel; we have erected the finest cities that have ever graced the world; we have builded churches upon every hillside and schoolhouses in every valley; we have covered the land with myriads of homes where women are protected and where love sets up its holy shrine, and rising from this country like a stream of light has been its glorious influence.

All around the world the oppressed of every land have turned toward our shores. I had thought that England's Government had been liberalized by the influence of this country; I had thought that in sweet France the people had caught an inspiration from the example of America; I had believed that in all the far-off lands of the world, wherever men have turned their eyes toward that beacon light, they have dreamed of enjoying the liberty enjoyed beneath our flag. Until recently our democracy has never been challenged. It is challenged now during this war by those who burn its Chief Magistrate's speeches in the public place, and who heap obloquy upon the name of the Republic. For myself I refuse to join those who traduce the Republic. I decline to apologize for American democracy.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for a moment to the Senator for a question.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the measure a question, if I may, with reference to a possible vote upon the joint resolution. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the measure, in view of the fact that I am almost compelled to be away for a day, if it can be understood that there will be no vote upon this measure until Monday?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, so far as I have information, I know of no reason why a vote should be deferred until Monday. I do not know to what extent the debate upon the measure may be drawn out, but I do know that there are several Senators who desire to get away from Washington at the earliest practicable moment. I do not believe that it would be possible to get a vote to-day, but I hope it will be possible to get a vote at some time to-morrow; and, while I realize that it would be an inconvenience to the Senator from Idaho, there are several other Senators who would be inconvenienced by having the matter go over until Monday. I, therefore, hope the Senator from Idaho will find a way to stay with us until we come to a vote.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am supposed to be in Virginia to-morrow and in North Carolina the next day, in connection with the liberty loan campaign, and I think I shall go. These dates were rearranged in order to accommodate this particular situation, and, as the meetings have been arranged for, I shall undoubtedly attend them; but I would much prefer to be here and vote, and I rather suspect that I will be back in time to vote upon this measure.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Colorado if I may make a brief statement?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for a question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to make a brief statement with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, not in answer particularly to his inquiry, but in the nature of information.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that, in assisting the chairman of the committee, I have made inquiry on this side among those who desire to speak, and, while there are several who wish to address the Senate, I am informed that none of them will take over 10, 15, 20, or perhaps 30 minutes. With that information from this side as to those who favor the measure, the Senator might be able to form some opinion with regard to the matter. Of course, so far as those who oppose the measure are concerned, we have no way of ascertaining how long they may desire to speak; but, so far as those on this side are concerned who favor this measure, I am satisfied that they will take a very short time to-morrow, and there is no reason why we can not get a vote.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I am unwilling to yield to a constant run of questions. I want to accommodate my colleagues, however, and certainly I yield to the Senator from Virginia for a moment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I thank the Senator. I simply desire to make a very brief statement. In the first place, Mr. President, I have been assured by the Senator in charge of the joint resolution that he had no idea of calling for a vote until a certain Senator who is absent from the city returns, and that he can not possibly return until 4.30 o'clock on Saturday. That Senator is coming from the Pacific slope, and there is not one chance in a hundred that a train from the Pacific slope that is due to arrive here at 4.30 o'clock on Saturday evening will be here in time for a vote of Saturday. The Senator from New Mexico, I repeat, informed me that he had not the slightest idea of having a vote until that Senator arrived.

In view of this fact, it seems to me a very great injustice to hold the Senate in session here and cut off Senators from important engagements in the public service, such as the engagement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who is billed to deliver liberty loan addresses at two places, one in Virginia and one in North Carolina. That is a patriotic purpose, a purpose of immense importance to the country, and no man can render a greater service in that connection than can the Senator from Idaho. He wishes to discharge that duty to the country, and I think that it is a very poor measure of justice and reason which would debar Senators from performing that sort of service by compelling them to stay here, in view of the fact that there is no idea of allowing a vote until the absent Senator, who can not possibly arrive until 4.30 on Saturday, shall have returned. Now, I appeal to the Senator from New Mexico to agree to an adjournment over until Monday, as it will deprive him of no advantage and no right, and it will be a great convenience to Senators who are anxious to render a patriotic service to the country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Just one moment, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator from New Mexico will answer that he is unwilling under these circumstances to adjourn over until Monday, I will have one more statement to make.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will my colleague allow me a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think that Monday will be here before I ever get an opportunity to address the Senate, unless Senators will allow me to proceed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. As the Senator is impatient of further interruptions, I will not ask him to yield further.

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment, Mr. President. I will cheerfully yield to the Senator having charge of the joint resolution, who has been asked a question by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in answer to the statement of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], I wish to say that I do not know of a more important measure which has been brought before the Senate since I have been a Member of it than the pending joint resolution, at least in view of the measures which are likely to come before the Senate in the near future. I know that there are a number of Senators who want to leave the city for the purpose of entering into the liberty-loan campaign; they wish to leave here for the purpose of staying in that campaign and seeing that it is made a great success; and every day that this matter is delayed we are delaying not only one Senator who wants to enter into that campaign but several other Senators. It may be true that the train on to-morrow may be late, but the hours will still go by, and I see no reason why, on an important measure of this kind, we should not remain here not until 4.30 or 5.30, but until 12.30 a. m., or even 12 the next day in order to come to a vote.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator from New Mexico that I do not underrate the importance of this measure; I am as anxious as he is to reach a final vote on it; but I desire, in perfect kindness and good will, to notify him that there will be no vote on this measure befroe Monday. If the Senate stays in session all day and all night from now until Monday, there will be no vote on this measure, because I do not intend to pursue any course that will debar the Senator from Idaho or any other Senator from going out to make patriotic addresses for the liberty-loan campaign when it is absolutely unnecessary for them to remain here.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, Mr. President, if that shall occur, I am sure the country will relieve me of the responsibility of any postponement.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not afraid of the country in this emergency misjudging such action as the Senate may take to enable Senators to go out and make these addresses, so that they are back here on Monday; and I can assure them that there will be no vote before that time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a second?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THOMAS. I take pleasure in yielding to the Senator from Massachusetts for one second.

Mr. LODGE. I can say all I have to say in a moment. I only desire to say that I agree with the Senator from Virginia. This proposed amendment to the Constitution is too important a question to be gotten through in a thin Senate or to be passed through absenteeism or through juggling with pairs. There is more than a third of the Senate against it at this moment, and when we vote we will have a full vote, with every Senator represented or voting.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had intended during the course of the discussion upon the proposed constitutional amendment to occupy the attention of the Senate for about five minutes with a written statement. Inasmuch, however, as the debate as it has progressed during the course of the day has focused itself upon some local conditons, I feel constrained to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments with some brief remarks upon the subject matter of our deliberations.

I had hoped, Mr. President, that when this proposed amendment to the Constitution was reached in the order of business it would be submitted substantially without debate. I do not believe that the discussion in which we have indulged and the discussion which will follow will change the vote of a single Senator. I believe that every Member of this body knows, and has known for a long time, just what his vote will be. I say that because this question, in my judgment, has long ago passed the stage of controversy. It was once said that every great question involving human affairs must undergo three successive stages—ridicule, argument, and persuasion. Such has been the course of the movement for equal suffrage. It encountered ridicule and contumely for years, and passed successfully through that ordeal. It has met its opponents in high and honorable debate for years, and public opinion has been finally convinced of its justice. It will soon be a part of the accepted policy of the American Union, whether the vote soon to be taken upon the proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be successful or unsuccesful. All has been said for it that can be urged in its behalf; all has been said against it that the ingenuity of man and of woman can devise. There is nothing new in this discussion; it is merely the statement and restatement, many times repeated, of arguments and statements for and against the movement, which have been worn threadbare for the last 25 years, to my certain knowledge. Hence, Mr. President, I had hoped that, recognizing that fact, there would be but little delay in coming to a vote upon the subject; but my colleagues have seen fit to take another course, and argument, vituperation, the display of feeling and of sentiment exhibit themselves in the same old way and for the same old purposes.

I have never been a sentimentalist upon the subject of equal suffrage, and I may say, Mr. President, that so long as it occupied the emotional stage it was unpopular. The same may be said of prohibition. When it occupied the field of morals exclusively, and appeals were made to the emotions only in its behalf, it made but little progress and advancement toward final success. So with the woman-suffrage movement. It has been retarded by much maudlin sentiment, by the display of emotion, and by indulgence in arguments or prophecies regarding the uplift in human affairs and in human nature which would follow its adoption.

I have been a suffragist, Mr. President, for entirely different reasons, practical ones, reasons which in my judgment are conclusive of the subject, provided my premises be accepted.

Upon the close of the war the people of the United States founded their policy and their institutions upon the principle of universal suffrage. An amendment was crystallized into the Constitution having for its purpose the extension of that suffrage to all men, regardless of color or previous condition. No man denies that. No man can deny it. But while professing universal suffrage this country has failed miserably in its practice, because it has denied that principle to one-half of our population. The man, whether native or naturalized, whether a patriot or a traitor, black or white, Jew or gentile, in love with the institutions of his country or in opposition to them, has been given the right to vote and to assist in molding the laws of his country, even to improper purposes, while the woman of intelligence and refinement has been denied that right.

I never have been able to perceive any justice or argument for or reason in an arbitrary division upon the line of sex in the application of a universal principle of national policy. That is a practical argument, as I understand it; and it is upon that principle, and that principle mainly, that I never have been able to deny the justice of the claim of the woman who wants to vote that under the institutions of her country she should have the right to do so. They are quite as intelligent, quite as capable—more capable, in fact—than many native-born American citizens, to say nothing of those who are not, who enjoy this privilege as a matter of course, and who have much to do—perhaps more than the average business man and farmer—with molding the legislation and shaping the destinies of the Republic.

A great many women object to the grant of universal suffrage to the extent demanded by the pending joint resolution. They do not care to exercise the right, but that should not interfere with or operate as an obstacle to the right to vote of the woman who does desire to exercise it. Hence I am concerned with the main proposition, to wit, that inasmuch as we have proclaimed universality in the exercise of the franchise, we are both illogical and unjust so long as we confine its operation to one-half of the American people.

Mr. President, that being the case, and assuming the basis of this contention, how puerile becomes the objection founded upon the conduct of a few women or the statements or actions of a few women, a very small proportion, notwithstanding their claims to the contrary, of the vast body of womanhood devoted to the cause of universal suffrage. I deplore as much as any man can the scenes and the conduct that have disgraced and disfigured the events of this city during the past 18 months. I am unable to understand those mental processes which can in any wise commend or condone them. I agree that they leave a disagreeable sentiment behind them, a feeling that people guilty of such conduct by that very fact exhibit their incompetency to exercise the right of suffrage. But unfortunately, Mr. President, we have a great many men in this country who do precisely the same thing. Not within the last 18 months, but for the last 25 or 30 years, we have had slackers in America in abundance—traitors, if you please—and yet these men may exercise the right to determine, in my State and in yours, whether you and I shall further represent the States which have sent us here or whether some one else shall be selected in our places. In other words, if the right to vote depends upon the individual, a very large percentage of American citizens ought to be disfranchised this moment, and there is not an argument based upon individual conduct as applied to women that ought not to be applied to men.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], in his very eloquent discussion of this subject, said that no man who breaks the laws should be permitted to make the laws. I agree to that sentiment absolutely; but they do. Every lawbreaker in the United States who has not been convicted of a felony, and for that reason becomes disfranchised, does assist by casting his vote in making the laws. So the Senator's statement is either too broad or else it is not applicable at all; and no man can deny the fact that no course of human misconduct in man of any character or description deprives him of the right of suffrage, except he be convicted thereof and duly punished. In other words, until he becomes a convicted felon, whatever his conduct, the right to vote remains with him. We do not, therefore, practice what we preach; or, if we do, it is in those sections of the country with whose laws and practices I am not acquainted.

The Senator gave us a very attractive description of the burning of the President's message a few days ago by a congregation of neurotic women in one of the public parks. There is nothing which the Senator said regarding that disgraceful episode that I do not most heartily approve; but the Senator, after his lurid and eloquent description of this piece of misconduct, declared that the women of the country were not responsible for acts like that.

I agree with that also; and yet, if the Senator be logical, he would punish the large body of women who are not responsible for acts like this, because such acts were actually committed within the shadow of the dome of the Capitol. Of course they were not responsible; they repudiated it. Every good woman in the United States in her heart repudiated it, whether she be for suffrage or against it; and I am here—and that is why I took the floor—to protest against the position occupied by the Senator from Missouri and others, which would hold all womankind in America responsible for the misconduct of a mere handful in the Capital of the United States. That is not justice; it is not equity; it is not manly; and I am satisfied that whatever motives may actuate Senators in voting upon this question, that will not have a controlling influence.

Mr. President, a good deal has been said this afternoon regarding the existence of women lobbies in the Capitol. I do not like to see them here. I do not like to see lobbies anywhere. But let me ask those who denounce the women for lobbying in the Capitol, Who set them the example? We lords of creation, who for a hundred years have beset the Capitol of the United States in the interest of or against certain measures of legislation; and if we who alone are competent to exercise the franchise indulge in conduct like that, in God's name why hold the poor women responsible for imitating our example?

Why, Mr. President, there are more lobbyists—I was going to say—in Washington than there are officeholders, but perhaps that would be stretching it a little bit since war was declared. The American Federation of Labor has a lobby here. The employees of the Government have organized and they have a lobby. The papers announced yesterday that the House had enacted a measure providing for a minimum wage of $3 per day, and that the lobby, composed of the members of this organization, would soon appear before the Senate committee in its behalf. Why, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States is, in its last analysis, a lobby—and I am using the term in a respectful sense. The sugar people had a lobby here for years. The manufacturers have a lobby here now. I can not conceive of a single important interest that is not represented here, and represented nearly all the time.

Some lobbies are more pestiferous than others; some lobbies are more dishonorable than others; some lobbies are more reprehensible than others; but they are all lobbies, Mr. President, just the same. I am satisfied that some of the lady lobbyists here overplayed the game, if I may use a common expression. There is such a thing as bedeviling the life out of a legislator, and a few of us have had reason to experience something of that sort since the time this measure has been active and prominent in the public mind. They are wrong in principle, provided they exceed those arts of legitimate persuasion to which every man and every woman is entitled. But why condemn those unacquainted with the refinements and the ethics of political life, who have been banished from the halls of political enfranchisement all their lives, if, forsooth, beholding their brethern accomplishing many things and defeating many things through organized movements, in their weak way they see fit to imitate us and to carry on the same sort of work? If, because the women have lobbies in the city of Washington, this amendment should be defeated, then by the same line of reasoning 90 per cent of the legislation enacted at every session of this Congress should also be defeated.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I notice that the Senator from Colorado does not seem to agree with the President——

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, the President and I differ in a great many things.

Mr. WEEKS. Who, if my recollection is correct, stated that as a result of the lobby investigation which took place a few years ago the lobbyists betook themselves out of the Capitol like rats out of a sinking ship.

Mr. THOMAS. They did; but, like rats, they came back again as soon as the ship was pumped out. [Laughter.] They did. Why, Mr. President, every train leaving the city of Washington was crowded to the guards with lobbyists, some of them on the tenders of the engines, as I understand, and on the roofs of the cars; but when the hurricane passed they came back again.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not notice their absence, and therefore I asked the question.

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps the Senator did not, and perhaps it may be true that my statement is too broad. Possibly a great many of them did stay, but I am pretty sure they remained under cover for a little while.

So much, then, for this argument or charge concerning the lobbyists. The Senator has reminded us that this eternal question is constantly coming up, and he is right. Eternal questions always come up until they are properly disposed of. An idea taking root in that vast soil that we call public conscience and public opinion, slowly extending its roots and its fibers, ultimately exercises a force that will overturn capitols and uplift palaces. The great principle of democracy itself required centuries for its development, and it was an eternal question until the conscience of mankind accepted it as a political rule of conduct and based their governments upon its foundations. It is still an eternal question, for autocracy is to-day challenging its right and its existence upon the field of battle. It is an eternal fight, either in the halls of legislation, in the policies of government, or upon the battle field; and I make the prediction that if it be true, as claimed, that a bare constitutional majority exists in this body against this amendment, it will return for consideration before six months have passed over our heads, and will continue to do so until the American Congress shall respond to the sentiment and act accordingly.

Nobody questions our power to enact this amendment, but only its expediency; and I may say here that, in my judgment, the only remaining argument of any force whatever that can be urged against this mighty question is whether we should make it effective by engrafting an amendment in the Constitution of the United States, or whether it should be relegated to the States, each of them to determine it for its own purposes and according to its own way. That is a debatable question, and, of course, I honor those who differ with me upon that subject.

Their opinions are doubtless the result of their conscientious beliefs, and they will cast their votes accordingly. But if the argument that is made here be good—that is to say that a two-thirds majority of the States have no right to force their views upon the other States dissenting—then every amendment that we have adopted since the ratification of the Constitution should not have been enacted. I know of none which was not opposed. Even the first amendment, offered and insisted upon by Jefferson himself, was opposed. They were opposed upon the general ground that they were wholly unnecessary; that the Constitution itself was sufficiently broad, inasmuch as the powers reserved to the States involved the counter-proposition that only those powers expressly granted by the Constitution passed to the General Government. Consequently, Mr. President, I am constrained to believe that the great majority of those Senators who cast their votes against this amendment will do so because of their conviction that this is a matter belonging wholly and exclusively to the States, and that it should not be made the subject of national legislation; and in saying that I have no desire to impose my view upon the people of other States, except in so far as I regard the question calling for my vote a national one.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] knows more about the women of his State than I pretend to know. Doubtless it may be true—it is true, because the Senator says so, and his statements, so far as I know, are generally accurate—that the majority of the women of Missouri have no desire to be the head of the household. In that respect, however, they differ from the women in my section of the country and in my own household, where the women have been the head ever since "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, the minority of women in Missouri, under the application of the principle of universal suffrage, ought not to be denied the right to vote because a majority of the women of that great State entertain convictions opposed to the general proposition of suffrage. The very moment we recognize the right of a majority to deny the right of suffrage to the minority where universal suffrage is the accepted principle, that moment, in my judgment, calls for interference by the National Government in the shape of a constitutional amendment.

Mr. President, as I say, I had not intended to discuss this proposition at length. I am ready to vote on it. I want to vote on it. I am ready for a roll call now, whether the result be in accord with my own convictions upon this subject or against them. I have been defeated a good many times in my life. I have managed to survive those defeats so far, and I can bear the consequences of this with that philosophy which I have always enlisted when disappointment has been my lot; and I am strengthened in that situation by the certain conviction that if I live to be 12 months older than I am, I will live to see this amendment a part of the Constitution of the United States, in so far as the action of the two Houses of Congress is concerned.

I leave the question, therefore, and will append to my remarks the one thing that I intended to say in this discussion.

I can not permit this occasion to pass without offering my tribute of appreciation to the National American Woman Suffrage Association, the official custodian of the cause now commanding our attention. It had its beginning nearly two generations ago. Then

> To side with truth was noble
> When you shared its bitter crust,
> Ere its cause brought fame and honor
> And 'twas prosperous to be just.

Its founders were the despised but courageous crusaders in a cause whose advocacy provoked contumely and derision. They fought against the weapons of contempt and of ridicule. They consecrated their lives and fortunes to the establishment of their conceptions of political justice. Their persistence wrought but little change in public sentiment for many years. Here and there they gained a convert or captured an outpost, but the road was thorny and the goal far away. Though "hope deferred made the heart sick," they plodded painfully on, and, falling, passed the work to worthy hands. These kept the colors flying and the campaign active as the weary years swept by. They triumphed over ridicule, met argument with argument, overthrew prejudice, and finally established their cause through the compelling force of a reluctant but converted public opinion.

From its birth to this hour the association has been officered wisely and well. Its presidents have possessed the talent of leadership and control. Their policies have been sane, aggressive, and vigorous. They have used the weapons of argument and discussion. They have appealed to man's reason and sense of justice. They have disdained resort to the arts of the demagogue seeking notoriety by arousing prejudice and inflaming passion. Dignity and decency have attended the stately procession of their cause from its low estate to its commanding eminence.

As were the leaders, so has been the organization. Its escutcheon is unstained by mob methods or appeals to violence. It has neither counseled nor tolerated disorder. It has neither picketed Presidents nor populated prisons. It has been political, but never partisan. It is a stranger to personal villification. Its patriotism is without a blemish. No word dishonoring the flag ever fell from the lips of its members. It has carried no banners flaunting insults to the Executive. It has never assailed its friends nor sought to encompass their political destruction. It has never endangered its cause by resort to epithet and calumny. Its contests have been waged in deadly earnest, but in the open. When it has won it will deserve all the glory that comes with victory honorably achieved.

Not until it had won campaigns and compelled respect for its cause was its leadership ever challenged. If success wins applause it also begets rivalry. These have appeared in due season to retard and scandalize the mission of the national association. They have sought to thrust aside the old guard and crowd its leaders to the rear. They flaunt banners disfigured with offensive legends. They indulge in much tumult and vociferous braying, all for notoriety's sake, enabling the enemies of equal suffrage, whose arguments have failed, to use them as terrible examples. But I counsel the national association not to lose courage nor yet be faint-hearted. Even this handicap to their labors will be overcome and time will vindicate their cause by giving its approbation to their manner of its promotion.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday.

Mr. PITTMAN. Will the Senator withhold that motiton for just a second?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; for a second.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is the only opportunity I will have to explain the vote I shall cast against the motion, and it is the first time I have ever voted against a motion of the leader of this side of the Chamber to adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senator is not going to make an argument on the constitutional amendment. I did not yield for that purpose.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I am not. I am going to appeal to the Senator for this reason: I am satisfied that those on this side want a vote on Saturday, and will vote as soon as their next vote gets here. They have not any right to allow it to come to a vote before, but they will vote sometime to-morrow during the day, I am pretty sure. Now, why should the measure go over when the chairman of the committee having charge of it desires simply an adjournment until to-morrow?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Because the difference between 4.30 o'clock to-morrow afternoon and Monday at 12 o'clock is infinitesimal, and a number of Senators have been compelled to leave the city. They left with the assurance that no vote would be had on this measure before 12 o'clock on Monday.

and I can assure the Senator that no vote will be had until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. In just a second. The Senator having charge of the joint resolution, as is customary, should be consulted with regard to when the joint resolution shall be taken up again.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have seen and consulted with the Senator in charge and made what I consider a most reasonable suggestion—that the joint resolution go over until Monday. He told me he could not possibly get it up before the arrival of a man due on the train at 4.30 Saturday. The only difference is waiting until 12 o'clock noon on Monday, and that will meet the necessities of some Senators who had to leave the city. I gave them the assurance that there would be no vote on this matter before 12 o'clock noon on Monday, and there will be none. You may take that as absolutely final.

Mr. PITTMAN. There have been assurances given by the Senator in charge of the joint resolution, and I think under the custom and courtesy of this body the Senator having charge of the bill, particularly the chairman of the committee, should be allowed to use his discretion in regard to the conduct of the measure.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator is mistaken. There is no such rule in the Senate. I make the motion that the Senate now adjourn until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday.

Mr. PITTMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I can not yield any further.

Mr. SHAFROTH. On Monday more Senators may be away——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is no use, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has moved that the Senate adjourn until Monday. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate do now adjourn, which motion takes precedence over the motion of the Senator from Virginia. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 27, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for the widespread generosity which obtains among the American people in their sacrifices, from the children even to the aged and infirm, in pouring out their substance to alleviate the suffering of those who have fallen victims to the cruel and vicious warfare of our enemies, who have sought to terrorize the world and make them victims to their evil purposes.

We pray that our people may continue their sacrifices; that those who have been deprived of food, clothing, and shelter may be upheld and sustained until the war shall cease and peace once more bring happiness and plenty to a suffering world. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DEWALT, for one week, on account of important business; and

To Mr. FULLER of Illinois, for two weeks, to engage in the liberty-loan campaign.

STATUS OF NOMINEES TO THE NAVAL AND MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk a letter from Provost Marshal General Crowder in regard to the status of young men between the ages of 18 and 21 who have been appointed to West Point and Annapolis.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to have read a letter from the Provost Marshal General in regard to the eligibility of young men nominated for the Naval Academy and West Point. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL,
Washington, September 17, 1918.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. RAKER: I have your letter of September 13, inquiring as to the status of young men between 18 and 21 who have been nominated for admission to the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

This office is informed that the Secretary of War has directed "that all students, when properly inducted into the Students' Army Training Corps and who have been nominated as candidates for examination for admission to the Naval and Military Academies, be held as members of the Students' Army Training Corps until such examination, and if successful, until entrance into the United States Military Academy or the United States Naval Academy, at which date they will be discharged from the service of the United States for the purpose of entrance into said academies."

I think the above quoted order gives you just the information that you desire.

E. H. CROWDER,
Provost Marshal General.
FREDERIC C. WOODWARD,
Major, Judge Advocate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on revenue subjects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on revenue subjects. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EMERGENCY POWER BILL.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12776.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HOUSTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12776, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12776) to provide further for the national security and defense and for the more effective prosecution of the war by furnishing means for the better utilization of the existing sources of electrical and mechanical power and for the development of new sources of such power, and for other purposes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the committee amendment contained at the bottom of page 1 of the bill was up at the time we adjourned. I have inspected the original amendment offered by me in committee, and find that the word "therewith" was omitted after the word "connection," line 8. I move to insert the word "therewith" after the word "connection" in line 8, page 1, so as to have the amendment as adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "connection" in the committee amendment, insert the word "therewith."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose that amendment.

Mr. SIMS. What appears in italics on pages 1 and 2 as a committee amendment was adopted by a majority of the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is opposed to it, and while it is usual for the affirmative to discuss the matter first, I have no objection whatever to the gentleman from New York making his speech in opposition to it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment. I would like to ask, in the first place, of the chairman of the committee just what that amendment means in connection with the definition of a war power plant?

Mr. SIMS. To be perfectly candid with the gentleman, I opposed the amendment in committee, and I am opposed to it now. I can not see that it is of any benefit to the bill. The amendment is really the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], and I do not know that I violate any confidence of the committee by so stating. The same identical language is used in section 2, where it is applicable and proper, and as far as I am concerned I can not give the gentleman any reason on earth why it should be put in this section.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I can.

Mr. SNELL. I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] to explain what it means and why it is necessary here.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is the statement on page 4, where they provide for building plants, and it is afterwards in the original bill submitted to us as referring to the products of any plant of that sort.

Mr. SNELL. What could be more comprehensive than the language that follows in the same section, page 2, where it says "together with all lines transmitting or distributing power in connection therewith, and all other property the ownership, use, or occupancy of which may be appropriate to or useful in connection with the maintenance and operation thereof."

It seems to me that covers everything possible to have in connection with power plants, and as this is the definition of a power plant it seems to me not to be necessary.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will notice on top of page 7, it provides for combining the facilities or power of two or more such plants, or of better utilizing the gas, power, or product generated by them. That applies to all plants, and, as gentlemen know, a great many existing plants, private plants, make gas and run electric cars in addition to furnishing power.

Mr. SNELL. Would not that appear to be governed by the language that I have just read?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That does not include the products of toluol and the various coal-tar products useful in making powder and defined as useful for making high explosives. And wherever a power plant had annexed to it gas works of that sort which could make these products, it was worth while to use the language in the section. I had intended to strike out the words on page 4 in reference to this because the gas and coke works, mentioned in line 11, page 4, are just as much used with plants not constructed by the Government as with plants constructed by the Government and the definition of power plant ought to include those subordinate works and subordinate products wherever they are only subordinate. You will notice it is not to construct such works by themselves, but if in power plants that distribute electric or mechanical power, and in connection therewith they use coal and lignite to produce products made through coking and combustion which are war products, these coal-product works ought to be used with any power plant. At the present such use is limited by clause (1) of section 2, page 4, to plants built by the United States, and the other plants could not make these coal products at all.

Mr. SNELL. My position is that has nothing to do with the term here defining power plants, and I can not see it yet.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Because many existing plants incidentally make these other products, we must change the definition so as to apply to all plants in all sections of the bill or else insert the words contained on page 4 in each one of these subordinate clauses, and I think we had better do it in the definition so as to apply wherever they had existing works in connection with war products than to do so only in plants constructed by the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question? As I understand the amendment, this would permit a power plant which the Government may take over, in which there may be by-products such as outlined by the gentleman, to permit the Government to make use of them. We all know, for instance, that from coal and lignite we get certain products which are very useful in making war munitions, so it is the intention of the gentleman's amendment, I take it, for the Government to utilize those products. Now, may I ask the gentleman if there is any other place in the bill in his judgment where it would provide they might make use of those by-products they make from the combustion of coal?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There is no other place in the bill, except in clause 1, section 2, page 4, which only applies to plants constructed by the Government, and this right ought to apply to those that are taken over as well as those constructed.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask this question with reference to the language: Does not the gentleman think there ought to be——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The word "therewith" has already been inserted. We just inserted the word "therewith," "and in connection therewith the products made," and so forth.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand it, it is the intention of the gentleman by this amendment only to permit the Government to take over those plants, and when they do so to utilize the products that would be otherwise wasted?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is exactly what I desire, because it says at the top of page 7 they can use the gas power or products generated, and therefore the definition ought to include such productions.

Mr. FOSTER. So without you have some provision it is the gentleman's opinion none of these waste products or by-products of these plants could be utilized?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am afraid they could not.

Mr. FOSTER. If there are no products, then this would be inoperative anyhow?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Exactly so.

Mr. SNELL. I could not understand from the reading what it meant. It was very blind to my mind.

Mr. FOSTER. The way I took it was that the plant as defined meant a plant equipped for and employed or intended to be employed in generating, developing, transmitting, or distributing electrical or mechanical power, and in connection therewith the products made through or in connection with coke, and so forth. That simply gives that definition so as to describe what the plant was to be. I do not know; I am a little like the gentleman as to just the meaning; it is not very clear what might be done, but I take it the intention was that the plant that had these by-products, that could be one part of the plant, and so defined as one part of the plant, so as to utilize these by-products?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. And manufacture them. It says generate and develop these things.

Mr. FOSTER. We know from the coke ovens come a large amount of by-products. If that should be the construction so these by-products could be utilized, and nowadays nobody ought to be permitted, no corporation ought to be permitted, the Government ought not to permit coke and coal to be used except with a construction of those ovens that will utilize all these by-products. Now, we are short, for instance, and we were before the war, some 70,000 tons of ammonia, and we import that amount of ammonia, which is used in the refrigerating plants of the country and for other industrial purposes, and they could get this product from these plants.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman understand they could take this gas that could be purified and create power, make power from that gas?

Mr. FOSTER. By burning it; certainly.

Mr. SNELL. That is the intention?

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I took it to be when I read the provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this, of course, is a committee amendment, but the gentleman from New Jersey has just announced something that does not appear in the amendment, and that is if his amendment remains in here he expects then to offer an amendment on page 4 which will very materially affect section 1.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It will not do any harm.

Mr. SIMS. Now, in view of the fact that the gentleman is only laying his groundwork to attack the bill in another part——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am not going to attack the bill in another part. The trouble about the thing on page 4 is that it is limited to plants erected by the Government.

Mr. SIMS. Paragraph (a) is a mere definition of the physical parts of a power plant.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. SIMS. Let me make my statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I was going to ask the gentleman from New Jersey right in that connection if that would not embrace part of the plant which was used for saving these by-products?

Mr. SIMS. One of the objects of this bill is to secure the by-products of coal. If the gentleman will let me get through he will understand my position, I think. I am trying to make it clear. Subsection (a), on page 1 of this bill, simply defines what a power plant is; that is, what are its constituent parts and purposes. It says:

The term "power plant" means a plant equipped for and employed or intended to be employed in generating, developing, transmitting, or distributing electrical or mechanical power, and includes all machinery and appliances therein contained, together with all lines transmitting or distributing power in connection therewith and all other property the ownership, use, or occupance of which may be appropriate to or useful in connection with the maintenance and operation thereof.

Now, that is what a power plant is, leaving out the committee amendment. The committee amendment does not do anything except confuse.

Now turn to page 4, part of section 2. Section 2 begins:

That the President is hereby authorized and empowered within the limits of appropriations herein or hereafter made—

To do what?—

to construct at any place or places within the boundaries of the United States such power plant or power plants as he may deem necessary, and in connection therewith to construct within such boundaries plants for the production of gas, coke, toluol, benzol, coal-tar products, and any other useful products that may be produced through or in connection with the coking of coal or lignite or through or in connection with the combustion of any fuel.

Now, the President has unlimited power to do that. Of course, one of the objects and purposes of the bill is that the valuable by-products of coal may be utilized and saved.

Now, as to the definition of a plant, it is not necessary in defining what a power plant is to put in every detail of manufacture and what it may be used for. We can use only general terms.

And this section was drawn by experts of the War Department, the Navy Department, the Shipping Board, the War Industries Board, and had the best engineering help. I think it is a mistake to load it down with a confusing, almost muddling, amendment that adds nothing to it, when it does not detract anything by leaving it out. I think I have been called fifty times over the telephone to explain this amendment, and why it is in there, and I am utterly unable to see any use or need for it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], a man conversant with power plants and what they are, and of how they are constituted——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time may be extended for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, the gentleman refers us to section 2, which does not have anything to do with this other provision at all according to my way of reading it, because this applies to plants, first, which the Government is going to take over, and, second, to those plants which the Government may construct. If you are going to say that as to the power plants the Government may construct, why not say that as to those that are to be taken over?

Mr. SIMS. I can answer that in a minute. Right below, in subsection 1 of section 2, he is also authorized—for the purpose of increasing the capacity or productivity of any power plant within the boundaries of the United States to install in any such plant any structure, machinery, or appliances that he may deem useful to that end—

And so forth. It is identically the same thing.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know where that affects it at all, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. SIMS. How does this relate to a definition? The powers of the President are not contained in this definition.

Mr. FOSTER. This is speaking about plants which may be used for utilizing these by-products, but I can not see for the life of me why we would not say so, so that it would be clear that it was the intention of Congress to give the power to utilize these by-products in the plants taken over.

Mr. SIMS. It can not be clearer than stated in the section.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman may be right.

Mr. SIMS. It even confuses the experts who drew the section.

Mr. FOSTER. The experts do not always know all things.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for five minutes to support the amendment.

Under the bill as it is drawn the United States can construct power plants and take over power plants or can add to the facilities of power plants or can aid their extension.

It is provided on page 4, in clause (1) of section 2—and I wish the chairman would listen to this—as to power plants which the Government constructs, that they may produce these by-products. It is not provided anywhere in the bill that it can install anything except the machinery for making power. It is not provided that it can lend for anything except making power. It omits this important part of the power plant in each section, except where the Government actually constructs the plant. And I thought it was better, therefore, that the definition of the power plant should include not only plants that produce power but plants which in connection with the production of power produce these other materials. And then it would not be necessary to repeat this language in each particular section, as it will be necessary if you leave the definition as it is now, because as the bill stands, if that amendment is left out, the Government can not take over a gas works annexed to a power plant at all, because they can only take over a plant for the production of power.

I wanted to help the bill, and I therefore put the amendment in form. It does not apply to anything, as I say, except the power plants that have these gas works in connection therewith.

Mr SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. With pleasure.

Mr. SNELL. What does this language mean, "and all other property the ownership, use, or occupancy of which may be appropriate to or useful in connection with the maintenance and operation thereof"? That seems to me to mean exactly gas works or anything else in connection with the power plants.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It covers only the machinery, such as is necessary for the production of power and not for the production of gas. I was trying to help the bill. I do not care whether this amendemnt passes or not, except for the benefit of the Government. Wherever the Government takes over a plant it ought to have the right to run the ancillary works to produce gas as well as these other products.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If a power plant produced power in this city, and the Government wanted to take it over, and the power plant happened to own a street railway, could the Government take over that street railway?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. They can help the street railway, but they can not take it over. I have thought of that. They can not take over the street railway. They can only take over the power plant and help the street railway.

Mr. SNELL. Would you not consider the street railway in connection with the power plant as "property the ownership, use, or occupancy of which would be appropriate to or useful in connection with the maintenance and operation thereof"? It seems to me that is a part of the power plant really.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is a dangerous question.

Mr. SNELL. But that is not defined here. If the committee does not know, how do you expect the average man to know?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not think it is. I say that the production of the power is separate from the running of the railroad, but I do not think that it is essential to the production of the power that the railroad should be run. It is essential to the use of the power, but I do not think you can make gas in any particular plant where the Government has not built the plant but taken it over under the bill as it stands without this amendment, and the President ought to have the power to take over such ancillary plants. That is my contention.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate in five minutes, and will let the gentleman have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes, the five minutes to be used by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the importance of this bill is so great that there ought to be a quorum of the House present during its consideration. It involves a very large expenditure of public money. It puts the Government of the United States into new activities. It is a departure from the ordinary precedents of business. It enters into so many ramifications of the business life of the country that it seems to me, in order that it may be considered with that care which its importance justifies, we should have a quorum present. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-one Members are present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Copley	Estopinal	Griffin
Ashbrook	Costello	Fairchild, B. L.	Hamill
Aswell	Cramton	Fairchild, G. W.	Hamilton, N. Y.
Bacharach	Crisp	Farr	Hardy
Baer	Currie, Mich.	Ferris	Harrison, Miss.
Barkley	Curry, Cal.	Fields	Haskell
Bell	Dale, N. Y.	Flood	Haugen
Borland	Dale, Vt.	Flynn	Hayes
Bowers	Darrow	Focht	Heaton
Britten	Davis	Fordney	Heintz
Butler	Delaney	Foss	Holland
Caldwell	Dempsey	Francis	Hollingsworth
Campbell, Pa.	Dewalt	Fuller, Ill.	Hood
Cantrill	Dickinson	Fuller, Mass.	Howard
Caraway	Dies	Gallivan	Humphreys
Carew	Dill	Gard	Husted
Carlin	Dominick	Glass	Hutchinson
Carter, Okla.	Dooling	Glynn	Jacoway
Cary	Doremus	Godwin, N. C.	Johnson, S. Dak.
Chandler, Okla.	Doughton	Goodall	Johnson, Wash.
Church	Drukker	Graham, Ill.	Jones
Clark, Pa.	Dyer	Graham, Pa.	Kahn
Classon	Eagan	Gray, Ala.	Kearns
Connally, Tex.	Edmonds	Gray, N. J.	Kelley, Mich.
Cooper, Ohio	Ellsworth	Greene, Mass.	Kennedy, R. I.
Cooper, W. Va.	Elston	Gregg	Kettner
Cooper, Wis.	Emerson	Griest	Key, Ohio

Kiess, Pa.	Moore, Pa.	Rowland	Sweet
King	Morin	Russell	Swift
Kitchin	Mott	Sabath	Switzer
Kreider	Mudd	Sanders, Ind.	Tague
La Follette	Neely	Sanders, La.	Talbott
LaGuardia	Nelson	Sanford	Templeton
Larsen	Oliver, Ala.	Saunders, Va.	Thomas
Lea, Cal.	Oliver, N. Y.	Scott, Iowa	Thompson
Lehlbach	Olney	Scott, Pa.	Tillman
Lever	O'Shaunessy	Scully	Tilson
Linthicum	Paige	Shackleford	Tinkham
Littlepage	Peters	Sherley	Treadway
London	Phelan	Sherwood	Van Dyke
Lufkin	Platt	Shouse	Vare
Lundeen	Porter	Siegel	Vinson
McArthur	Powers	Slemp	Walton
McClintic	Pratt	Small	Ward
McCormick	Purnell	Smith, C. B.	Watson, Va.
McFadden	Ragsdale	Smith, T. F.	Weaver
McKenzie	Rainey, H. T.	Snyder	Welling
McKinley	Rainey, J. W.	Stafford	White, Me.
Maher	Randall	Steele	White, Ohio
Mann	Rankin	Steenerson	Wilson, Ill.
Martin	Riordan	Sterling, Ill.	Winslow
Mays	Roberts	Sterling, Pa.	Wise
Meeker	Robinson	Stevenson	Wood, Ind.
Merritt	Rogers	Stiness	Woodyard
Miller, Minn.	Rowe	Sullivan

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 12776, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, when 219 Members answered to their names, and he reported a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall whether the request for unanimous consent to close the debate in five minutes was agreed to or not.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman would let this run along. This is an important section, and there seems to be considerable doubt as to what the powers are conferred by the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Does this relate to the section or only to this amendment?

Mr. SIMS. To this definition amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to agree with the chairman of the committee that the committee amendment at the bottom of page 1 and the top of page 2 adds nothing to the bill, but, on the other hand, tends to confusion. This is a power bill and proposes to give the President large authority and control and jurisdiction over the development of power, and the bill very properly contains certain definitions.

The paragraph we are now considering is the one which contains the definition of power. It is definite and clear, it seems to me, as it stands. The language added, instead of clarifying, has the effect of confusing the matter.

The gentleman from New Jersey suggests that this is necessary on account of language on page 4. I can not agree with that view. It is true that on page 4 additional authority is conferred on the President with regard to subsidiary operations in connection with the power plant. That does not make them power plants. To attempt to link up power and authority granted in section 4 with the definition of what constitutes power plants simply confuses the matter and possibly adds authority at this point which the bill does not otherwise contain.

In this connection let me call attention to the fact that even experts in drawing bills do not always understand the details of the matters their bills refer to.

I call attention to the fact that this language is used in the amendment as it is drawn and also on page 4:

that may be produced through or in connection with the coking of coal or lignite, or through or in connection with the combustion of any fuel.

I do not know as it is tremendously important as affecting the bill, but anyone familiar with the subject of power production should know that lignite is coal, and therefore the term "coal" includes lignites. Secondly, lignite coal does not coke, and therefore it is extraordinary that an expert in these matters should have referred to the coking of lignite. The words "or lignite" should be stricken out even if the amendment is retained, and also in the provision in the amendment on page 4. In my opinion, this committee amendment should go out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey) there were 8 ayes and 29 noes.

So the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to get some more information as to paragraph (a) under the committee amendment. There seems to be a division of opinion as to how far and what the meaning of the balance of the paragraph is. It seems to me if it means anything at all it means that you can take over the machinery in connection with the power plant. I do not know where you would draw the dividing line. It seems to me a power plant not only means the generator but the transmission lines, everything in connection with the generator and the distribution of power. If it does, it would certainly seem to me under the provisions of this paragraph that they would have the right to take over a public utility that was directly connected up with the power plant. What I want to know is—there seems to be a division of opinion, even among the committee, as to what powers are conferred in this paragraph, and I ask the chairman of the committee what he understands can be done?

Mr. SIMS. My answer would be that section (a) is the definition of the term "power plant" and carries absolutely no authority of power whatever. In defining a power plant it means the plant equipped with what goes with it, but it carries no power at all.

Mr. SNELL. Suppose I own the power plant in the city furnishing lights to the city and the power for a street railway, where does my power plant end and where does the lighting and the street railway service begin?

Mr. SIMS. The power plant under this definition would include everything owned and operated by the owner of the plant.

Mr. SNELL. I furnish power to the utilities of the city and the street railway.

Mr. SIMS. Then under the definition that would be included.

Mr. SNELL. Then under this he can take over the public utilities by this section.

Mr. SIMS. No; not at all. This does not authorize him to do anything; it defines what a power plant is.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; but there is authority further on to take over the power plant.

Mr. SIMS. Why, when we come to that portion——

Mr. SNELL. No; it is very essential to know just what the term "power plant" means before we go further with this bill; and, as I understand it, the gentleman says a power plant means not only the place where the power is made but also everything in connection with it. That would be the street lighting system, the house lighting, the street railway proposition, or any other public utilities connected with it.

Mr. SIMS. It means under this definition exactly what is contained in section (a), no more and no less.

Mr. SNELL. Well, what is that? That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is just as capable of judging, and, perhaps, better than I am.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman a specific question. Does the gentleman believe the Government under this bill could take over the Washington street railways?

Mr. SIMS. For war purposes? I am going to answer the gentleman if I can. If the Government under the powers of this bill needs the Washington electric plant for the manufacture of munitions or war material, or for increasing or aiding it in increasing it, or if they do not do that, to take it over, it would have to be cum honore, and the Government would have still to perform the function of that plant; and if the plant was operating a street railroad company or an electric lighting plant, the Government would have to continue to do so. It could not take it over and not perform the public service which the company was then performing, and could not divert the power to the making of munitions and stop the street cars from running.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has not answered my question, which is a perfectly simple one. Does, under this definition, a power plant include the Washington Street Railway Co.? Does it or does it not?

Mr. SIMS. The language of the section——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know the language as well as the gentleman does, and I am asking him how he construes it.

Mr. SIMS. I am not an expert in the use of terms connected with these power plants, and this bill, or that section of it, has been prepared by electrical and power-plant experts, and I would not undertake to define what a technical term means in a section that has been drawn by gentlemen who are expert in their technical use.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman had nothing whatever to do with the drafting of this section?

Mr. SIMS. I did not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And does not know what it means?

Mr. SIMS. That is a matter for the gentleman to have his own opinion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman admits it.

Mr. SIMS. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think this House should pass on that until at least the committee, or what members are here, know what it means?

Mr. SIMS. What the definition means?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. If it does not mean what it says, I do not know how you will find it by delay.

Mr. SNELL. Well, we do not know whether the term "power plant" as used in this bill is broad enough to include the public utilities connected with, owned by the same people, and depend on it for power.

Mr. SIMS. When we get to the grant of a power, that portion of the bill which grants power, then we can properly discuss what power should be vested in the President. That is incident to the power, but here is a mere definition of what a plant consists of, and the gentleman wants us to discuss the whole bill and have us pass judgment on all the rest of the bill before we reach the part of the bill granting the power. This simply defines what a power plant is. I must say, and it is due him and it is credible, that the gentleman knows a great deal more about what electrical power plants are than I do and the terms used here are familiar to the gentleman and are not to me.

Mr. SNELL. It is very important to the bill to know what the definition of power plant means. This is put in the first part of the bill because it is important and essential we should know just exactly what it means, and there is certainly no one here knows what is meant or intended by its use in this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Well, if the gentleman will just read the hearings——

Mr. SNELL. I have read the hearings carefully on this subject.

Mr. SIMS. I am unable to give the gentleman any more information as to the meaning of this term than I have, and therefore this discussion is superfluous.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) The term "private power plant" means a power plant owned or operated by any person, association, corporation, or body politic, other than the United States, for the purpose of generating, developing, transmitting, or distributing such power, either for sale or for the use of the owner or operator thereof or of some other person.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee if it is in contemplation that under the provisions of this most extraordinary power provided for in this bill that municipal power plants are to be taken over or added to or in any way made a part of this general scheme of increasing power?

Mr. SIMS. They are to be aided if they ask for it and come within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Well, why should a city or municipality come in and ask the Federal Government to aid it in the operation or extension of its power plant?

Mr. SIMS. Because it may furnish power to essential war industries in meeting the war needs, as is shown in a number of instances. I will tell the gentleman I expect to offer an amendment, which I have submitted to the gentleman from Wisconsin, on page 6, line 24, after the words "United States," as follows:

Provided, That any plant owned or operated by a body politic shall be acquired without the consent of such body politic.

I expect to offer that amendment, which makes it entirely——

Mr. WALSH. Of course, that is a wonderful suggestion on the part of the chairman of the committee, to offer an amendment like that to this measure, but it seems to me that we ought not to hold over municipalities who are operating power plants the possibility of their being taken over or having their power diverted or their plants be in any way hitched up to the federalization of private concerns.

Mr. SIMS. Without their consent.

Mr. WALSH. Not even with their consent. Of course, without their consent does not mean very much.

Mr. SIMS. I mean a corporation, a body politic.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman mean without the consent of the city or without the consent of the people?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman knows how a body politic expresses its consent. The facts are a number of municipal plants are anxious to be thus aided, and to which aid is essentially necessary properly to carry on war industries in connection with their plants. They are going to want it and have been trying to get money from the Finance Corporation for that very purpose.

Mr. WALSH. Have been unable?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Have been unable to get money from the Finance Corporation?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know about that, but I have understood they have in some instances.

Mr. WALSH. Did it not appear in the hearings that the War Finance Corporation had not approved requests?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know whether it does or not, but it is undoubtedly a fact in some instances; but they could not under the law grant them the aid.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I know under what stress we are asked to consider this measure. The familiar method which has come into common practice here as a result of the action of this particular committee has been called up once more, and we have heard read a letter from the Chief Executive to the chairman of this great and important committee expressing the opinion that this measure is of capital importance and that it is a war-emergency measure.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to the situation which is presented. The distinguished chairman yesterday stated that certain corporations engaged in war activities could not secure approval from the War Finance Corporation for the financing of plans which they had made to carry out extensions or to further facilitate the production of power in connection with war manufacture because, said the War Finance Corporation, it would interfere with the sale of the bonds offered under the fourth liberty loan. And therefore they withheld their approval. But the money which will be raised from the sale of these bonds floated under the fourth liberty loan will be diverted from the Treasury of the United States and devoted to these very extensions.

The only difference will be to the extent that, instead of its being carried on under private capital or under the direction of the owners of these plants, it will be federalized, and the wastage that will occur will have to be borne by the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for three minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Has the gentleman made any motion? I thought he moved to strike out the last word, though I do not remember.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Now, this is a measure for which there may be in certain sections some need, but I do not believe that the need is so imperative as to warrant the conferring of power in such general and broad terms as is contained within this proposed bill. It seems to me that if there be certain activities in the manufacturing line which are producing munitions or other war supplies or materials, that those might be aided without saying to every power plant or every manufacturing plant which produces power or which sells it, as well as to every municipality, "We are going to confer upon the Chief Executive the power to take over your plant or to supervise the enlargement of it or the extension of it, or confer upon him the power to say it shall not be enlarged or extended." We ought not to interfere with municipalities in that way. We ought not to say to the War Finance Corporation that "You are now furnished a sufficient excuse for refusing assistance under the war-finance law to any corporation, however remotely it may be connected with war activities or however intimately it may be associated with them." There have been instances where municipalities and people have been ready to produce the money, to furnish the funds, to carry on enlargements and extensions in order that the plants may be made more efficient in connection with war work, where the War Finance Corporation have declined to permit them to do it, and they were without authority to float their bonds or to put their capital to that use.

It seems to me that it is an unwise policy for us to say to private capitalists, "You can not put your capital to that use, but we expect you to buy liberty bonds, and when you have purchased liberty bonds the United States will take the money with which you purchased those bonds and pay the entire expense of the proposition and permit the taxpayers to stand the loss."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I just want to read a short statement for the benefit of the RECORD.

Now, the Secretary of War, in his statement, says, looking to the increase of power:

We then took it up with the War Finance Corporation and found, under the limitations of its powers, that it was wholly unable to lend money to these power companies upon any terms upon which they could borrow it. There was no other recourse than the introduction of a general power bill, and that course was then followed and this bill prepared by the attorneys, as I understand it, for the War Industries Board.

Every effort was made to enable these companies to borrow money for the loaning of which they had any power to grant them. The War Finance Board's power for loaning is limited and defined. Now, nobody would be more opposed to stretching that power than the gentleman who has addressed the committee.

Now, there are companies that need this assistance or else they can not do that which is necessary for the successful prosecution of the war, and the gentleman says unless they get it through this Finance Corporation that it should not be done at all. Then it would break down. The Secretary of War has stated that every effort was made and exhausted to try to keep from resorting to general legislation. And the gentleman's criticism no doubt referred to me, though he did not call my name, about that which has become a kind of custom, in presenting letters. I want to say to the gentleman candidly—and I do not want to go into details here at this time, as they are not called for—that the last letter was not writen on my personal suggestion or upon my initiation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the activities of the Department of Agriculture during the past year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of agriculture. Is there objections? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EMERGENCY POWER BILL.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) The word "person" includes natural persons, copartnerships, joint-stock companies, voluntary associations and corporations, and the receivers and other custodians of the property of any of them.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 15, after the word "and," at the beginning of the line, insert the words "bodies politic or other."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question or two. What was intended to be taken in by this amendment? What does it include?

Mr. SIMS. My recollection is now—and I do not remember exactly how the discussion came up before the committee or what brought it up—that some member of the committee, not myself, as I now recall it, suggested that the words "bodies politic or other" should be included. I do not remember just now how the amendment came about. It was not in the bill as drawn. It was an amendment offered in the committee by a member of the committee, and I do not remember now which member brought it up or the reasons given for it. It did not seem to me it hurt anything and I did not oppose it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman from Tennessee think it is necessary?

Mr. SIMS. I did not. But I do not want to waste time on it. I am not opposed to it, however.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I find it difficult to either oppose or sustain it, because I can not find out what it means or what it includes, and nobody on the committee seems to understand it either. A body politic is not necessarily a corporation. It may be simply a body of citizens.

Mr. SIMS. Since my attention has been called to it I believe that was an amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]. I am not sure about that, however. Anyway, it struck the committee as not being objectionable.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If it means municipal corporations, I would like to be advised about that fact, and if the object and intention of the committee was to enable the President to take over plants operated by municipal corporations it seems to me we ought to use the words "municipal corporations" instead of "bodies politic."

Mr. SIMS. It does not grant any power.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield. I hope I can get some information.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, there are certain municipalities that are not corporations, but which would be bodies politic, I suppose. For instance, in New England we have towns which are not chartered and which are not corporations in the sense that a city is a corporation, having a charter granted by the legislature or under the general law. I assume that in the gentleman's section of the country there are no such bodies politic or municipalities; but it would seem that would cover a township which was not incorporated. Of course, there is no doubt but that the amendment should not be in the measure, together with a lot of the others.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. You do not have to strike out. Just vote it out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I shall not move to strike out the amendment, but I am opposed to it. It seems to include municipal plants, which ought not to be in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) The word "operator" means the owner, lessee, or other person in general control or operation of any plant, factory, or enterprise.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 18, by striking out the word "power" at the end of the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(e) The term "property" includes real and personal property of every nature and description, together with any right, interest, or easement therein or appurtenant thereto.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the chairman of the committee what the term "property" would include if this definition were not in the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know. It would probably mean just what the word "property" means generally, without limitation or application to anything here.

Mr. WALSH. Is this a limitation in the bill?

Mr. SIMS. As to power plants, I think it is a limitation.

Mr. WALSH. It says "the term 'property' includes real and personal property of every nature and description, together with any right, interest, or easement therein or appurtenant thereto." If this is a limitation——

Mr. SIMS. It is very inclusive.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is a very good lawyer——

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman for the compliment, but I can not wholly agree with him——

Mr. ANDERSON. Whether the term "property" would include a mortgage on a power plant; whether the Government under this provision could acquire an existing mortgage on a power plant?

Mr. WALSH. I think undoubtedly it could under the "limitation," as the gentleman from Tennessee says.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How does the gentleman construe in the light of the provision at the bottom of page 3—

Unless it shall be otherwise specifically provided herein the inclusion of any matter or thing within the definition of any word or term by the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be deemed to exclude therefrom any other matter or thing which under the usual construction of such word or term would fall within the meaning thereof.

Does that throw any light on the gentleman's query?

Mr. WALSH. That is very illuminating. That means if this bill does not say what it means and fails to express what the committee hoped it would mean when they reported it that it shall mean what the committee hoped it meant whether it expresses a different intention or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree with the gentleman that that is what it was intended to mean.

Mr. FOSTER. This was written by expert attorneys, who, no doubt, would have to have expert attorneys to determine what was meant.

Mr. WALSH. Experts! Heaven save the mark.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It was evidently not written by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Evidently not. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] in all seriousness that it will not aid in the interpretation of this measure or in the administration of its provisions to load it down with a definition such as is contained in subsection (e); and so, Mr. Chairman, for that reason I am going to move to strike out subsection (e).

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out all of subsection (e), which reads.
"(e) The term 'property' includes real and personal property of every nature and description, together with any right, interest, or easement therein or appurtenant thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 10.

Mr. WALSH. Well, in view of the closeness of the vote and the large attendance I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands tellers. Those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Nine gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number. No; five more gentlemen have arisen, making 14, not a sufficient number.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the other side, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a question of the other side on this proposition. It is a question of how many are required for tellers.

Mr. CANNON. How many does it take?

The CHAIRMAN. It takes 20.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think there are 20 here.

The CHAIRMAN. Not a sufficient number have arisen to demand tellers. Tellers are refused. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(f) The term "war material" means any material or commodity which, in the opinion of the President, it may at any time be necessary or important to produce or of which he may deem it necessary or important to increase the production.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 25, I move to strike out the last word, "at." On page 3, line 1, strike out the three words "at any time."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: Page 2, line 25, strike out the word "at," and one line 1, page 3, strike out the words "at any time."

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ESCH. The purpose of the amendment is to make it consonant with the other paragraphs of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a substitute for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 2, line 5, strike out "in the opinion of the President and," and in line 1, page 3, strike out the words "at any time" and insert at the end of the paragraph the following: "during the war period, in order the more effectively to carry on the war."

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that it will read how? I ask that the amendment be reported as it will read, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it as it will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Subsection (f), so that it will read, as amended, "The term 'war material' means any material or commodity which it may be necessary or important to produce or of which he may deem it necessary or important to increase the production during the war period, in order the more effectively to carry on the war."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from Minnesota modify his amendment a little further.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to strike out, in lines 1 and 2, the language "of which he may deem it" and insert in lieu thereof "which may be."

The Clerk read as follows:

Modification of the amendment by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 3, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "of which he may deem it" and insert in lieu thereof "which may be," so that as amended it will read:
"(f) The term 'war material' means any material or commodity which, in the opinion of the President, it may at any time be necessary or important to produce or which may be necessary or important to increase the production."

Mr. SIMS. Is that a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. He moved to strike out the word "at," at the bottom of page 2, and the words "any time," on the top of page 3. Does your amendment include those words?

Mr. ANDERSON. My amendment strikes out those words from the paragraph.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, if I may, I will accept the substitute.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry. Who is going to determine what is necessary war material if the substitute is adopted?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. The action of the President, which is conferred later on in the bill.

Mr. WINGO. If you are going to leave it to the discretion of the President, as you say you do later on, why strike it out here.

Mr. SIMS. I see no objection to the substitute at first blush, if I understand it.

Mr. WINGO. Suppose the substitute is adopted, who would determine what is necessary war material?

Mr. SIMS. The paragraph defines what war material is.

Mr. WINGO. The definition as reported by the committee defines war material as "any material or commodity which in the opinion of the President may at any time be necessary or important to produce," and so forth. It occurs to me that the committee has reported a proper provision to let the Commander in Chief, the President of the United States, determine whether or not any particular war material is necessary war material. If you do that, you will have no difficulty. I think the amendment destroys your bill.

Mr. SIMS. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota would give the War and Navy Departments the right to say, but the President would still determine whether it was necessary.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment. I do not suppose any of us like to vote for any such legislation, but we do it as a war necessity. I do not appreciate the suggestion continually made that you are supporting the President, and yet at every opportunity you express suspicion and doubt and try to take away from the President power that you know is necessary for him to efficiently and forcefully prosecute the war.

If you are going to back up the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, why keep away from him the right to determine what is necessary war material to enable him to conduct the war? If you give him any authority at all, it is academic to give him the authority conferred in this substitute. For that reason I am opposed to the substitute.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is what the paragraph as it now stands does not define. It does not limit it to war material to carry on the war.

Mr. WINGO. That is another question. The main purpose of the bill is a war bill, to do certain things for the primary purpose of prosecuting the war. The only justification you have for the legislation is that you want to use it for prime war necessities. We do not want to extend it beyond that, but in your definition of war materials you are defining war materials and not things we need after the war. You are defining what is to be needed for war purposes, for the prosecution of the war, and nothing else.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is what we want to do and that is what the substitute will accomplish. As it stands now, it does not limit it to war material.

Mr. WINGO. Yes, it does; it defines war material; but if you adopt the substitute you will leave no one with power or discretion to determine what is necessary in any given instance. The President would not have any authority, because you have refused to let him have the discretion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under the paragraph as it stands would "fertilizer" be war material?

Mr. WINGO. If the President held that it was necessary to prosecute the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He does not have to hold that it is necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. You had better strike it out than to say the President has no right to say as to war material.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have no objection to leaving in the words "in the opinion of the President." I do object to leaving the section as it is now, for it is so general that it includes and material, milk or pie.

Mr. FOSTER. Necessary for the war?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, to carry on the war does not mean altogether bullets and guns, but it means a lot of other things.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is no provision as to the war. I ask the gentleman to read it himself. War is not mentioned.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to have an amendment I have read at the Clerk's desk, which I think will cover what is desired, and I do not think there will be any objection on the part of the committee?

Mr. WINGO. Suppose the gentleman reads it. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SNELL. After the word "time," in line 1, insert "during the war period." Then after the word "produce" cut out the balance and say, "for the purpose of prosecuting the war." That limits the time and material entirely to the war-emergency proposition. I believe the discretion should be left in.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I may be unfortunate—I say this sincerely—in not being able to clearly state my viewpoint. The subject of the bill is to grant certain authority for more effectively prosecuting the war by furnishing certain things. It is a war bill. It is for the purpose of utilizing power and getting material for the prosecution of the war. Now, when you define the words "war material" you do not have to say "during the period of the war" and "for the purpose of prosecuting the war," because you are defining war material itself. That is their definition, and why take away discretion from the President to define what is war material? Now, to be perfectly frank, there might very easily arise a dispute; a dispute has arisen as to how much of a certain very large staple commodity of this country is necessary for war purposes. Those who produce say only from 8 to 9 per cent is necessary; the President and his advisers say we will need all of it. But we ought to let somebody settle that dispute, and when you are defining war material, what is necessary for the prosecution of the war, it looks to me like the proper person to determine that would be the Commander in Chief of the Army.

Mr. SNELL. In my amendment I leave it entirely to the President. I simply put in there "during the period of the war," and leave it to the discretion of the President exactly how to do it.

Mr. WINGO. I am not objecting to the language except as mere surplusage, because you are defining war materials to be used for the purpose of the war, during the war. That is the whole purpose of your bill.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me it ought to be limited to a certain extent.

Mr. WINGO. I agree it should be limited, but I think the very purpose of your bill, the title of the bill, the object of the bill, the material you are trying to define as war material, within itself limits it to war purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Wisconsin offered to strike out three words which looked as if it could not possibly hurt the paragraph, so I readily consented to it. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota moves as a substitute for the amendment to strike out the same three words and other words, and then to add language to the paragraph which does not appear. It struck me at first blush it did not seriously limit the power to do what is intended, but I am like the gentleman from New York and others and the gentleman from Arkansas, I think that we ought to leave in the words "which in the opinion of the President." I think that ought to stay in. The object, I understand, of the gentleman from New York is that this thing is to be confined to the war period?

Mr. SNELL. That is my only contention.

Mr. SIMS. And has no object or purpose in doing anything else. This being defined as war materials, I naturally suppose when the war is over we will not need any more war material, so I did not see anything to complain of, and I would not have consented, but business comes up so hurriedly on the floor of the House, very often I do not see what I ought to see, and therefore I can not agree to the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin agreed to accept the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, so I offer the following amendment to the substitute.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Wisconsin can not accept a substitute in the sense in which the gentleman from New York seeks; perhaps there will be a vote on the substitute in any event whether he accepts it or not.

Mr. SIMS. Will not the gentleman modify it?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the substitute.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if we can not agree on some limitation of this debate. I see four gentlemen on their feet, and I do not know how many want to speak.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, would it be proper to offer mine as an amendment to the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Then I will offer it.

Mr. ANDERSON. If it is an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 1, after the word "time," insert "during the war period," and after the word "produce"——

The CHAIRMAN. That is not an amendment to a substitute; that is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIMS. Can we agree to a limitation of debate? Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] want to discuss it further?

Mr. WALSH. I do. I want to offer an amendment to strike out this definition and insert another one.

Mr. SIMS. And the gentleman from Minnesota wants five minutes more, I suppose?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have not talked about the substitute yet at all.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] want to discuss this?

Mr. SNELL. No; not this amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that debate on this amendment and all amendments to subsection (f) be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on subsection (f) close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he included in that time five minutes for myself?

Mr. SIMS. Five minutes for the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] and five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, do I understand there will be no other opportunity to offer amendments provided the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is voted down?

The CHAIRMAN. Other amendments can be offered, but they can not be debated after the 15 minutes are exhausted.

Mr. WALSH. But, Mr. Chairman, an amendment can be offered during the 15 minutes and debated?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be an impression in the minds of gentlemen that the amendment I have offered limits the authority of the President under this bill. I do not think that is true. It seems to be assumed that where the President declares that something is essential to the prosecution of the war that that declaration is a binding and conclusive determination of the question. Of course, no such proposition as a proposition of law is tenable at all. The question of whether a thing is necessary for the prosecution of the war is a question of fact which must in the last analysis be determined by the courts, if the question is raised, and the court would not be bound at all by a declaration or a finding of the President in his discretion that the production of a certain thing was necessary to the prosecution of the war. All the amendment I have offered seeks to do is to define war material in such a way that it will consist of articles which are necessary to the prosecution of the war and which are produced for that purpose during the war period.

Now, I think anybody can name a dozen, perhaps a hundred, things, the production of which is not essential to the prosecution of the war. As a matter of fact, every day we are limiting the raw material for the production of things which are not essential to the prosecution of the war, or which are, at least, less essential than are other things.

Now, then, the question here is not whether the President shall declare something to be essential to the prosecution of the war, because it is not within his province to so declare. The question is, Is the particular article necessary for the prosecution of the war? That question, if challenged, would have to be determined in the last analysis by the courts. So that it seems to me perfectly clear that the amendment which I have offered is entirely in consonance with a proper legal theory of the bill and ought to be adopted. If adopted, this definition would read as follows:

The term "war material" means any material or commodity which it may be necessary or important to produce or of which it may be necessary or important to increase the production during the war period and in order to more effectively carry on the prosecution of the war.

Now, if there is to be any definition at all, it seems to me that this language defines war material in the only way in which it can be defined, because the definition makes war material mean exactly what it would mean and does mean in law if there was no definition in the bill at all, and neither extends nor detracts from that definition. I do not believe it is within the province of the President to add to or detract from the legal definition of war material.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield? But it is very proper for the President to determine a question of fact that is not a legal proposition. Who is going to determine the fact as to whether or not an article is necessary war material?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it is in the province of the President to determine that fact at all. I think that is a question which necessarily will eventually relate to the courts. And if some one raised the question as to whether a certain thing was war material or not, that question would have to be determined by the courts. It could not be determined by the President.

Mr. WINGO. If you left the language as it is and the question was raised, whoever attacked the validity of his determination would have the burden to show his decision wrong.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think that follows as a logical deduction or as a legal conclusion.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out subsection (f) and insert the following language, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Strike out subsection (f) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the words 'war material' as used herein shall include all articles of whatever description and any part or ingredient thereof intended for, adapted to, or suitable for the use of the United States or any associate nation in connection with the conduct of the war."

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not in order as an amendment to the section and to the substitute.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman is going to make a point of order I would like to hear it. I did not hear the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. WINGO. That it is not in order in the present parliamentary situation, with an amendment to the text pending and an amendment to that amendment pending and an amendment to the substitute pending.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, Mr. Chairman, it is not in order to vote on that amendment now, but under the limitation of debate entered into by unanimous consent it is certainly in order to offer the amendment and have it voted upon at the proper time.

Mr. WINGO. I have no objection to its being read at the desk for information. I would not want to rob the gentleman of his right to have it read, and if the Chair would hold that my point of order would rob him of his right, I will withdraw it. I do not want to rob him of his right.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this definition that is included in the amendment is the same definition, with some specific terms omitted, that was included in an act passed by the Congress last spring for the protection of war materials and war premises, and which included the definition of what constituted war premises and war materials.

Now, the definition is broad enough to include any articles or any ingredients thereof which are being manufactured for the United States or any associate nation. Now, we have already defined war materials in that former act, and it seems to me that it would be in keeping with good legislation to confine the definition, in enacting this measure, to the same terms, so that we would not say in one law that war materials means one thing and in another law that it means something else.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the gentleman overlook this fact, that the act to which he refers and from which he copied his amendment was an act defining a criminal offense, whereas the pending act is an act which does not affect the law in a judicial way, but gives authority to the administrative forces to take property? Now, then, should you not give some authority or place some discretion in somebody to determine what is necessarily war material? Would you leave them to go into the courts as in a criminal case?

Mr. WALSH. No; I would not, and it would get into the courts under the proposed definition reported in the measure just as quickly as it would under the definition proposed in my amendment. You are not going to take particularly war material. That is not what is going to be taken under the provisions of this act, but you are going to take property. Property is going to be taken for the purpose of producing war material. Now, we ought not, in setting down a definition in any law, leave it so that what the thing to be defined is to be shall rest in the discretion of anybody. The purpose of making the definition is in order to specifically set forth what such words mean when used in this act.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNOOK. I have given this bill some attention. One of the principal objects of this bill is to produce coal. Does the gentleman think his definition as a part of war material would cover coal?

Mr. WALSH. I certainly think so.

Mr. SNOOK. I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the gentleman why not?

Mr. SNOOK. I do not think it is broad enough. I thought this was simply confined to shells or ammunition, or something of that kind, that a man can be punished for interfering with.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no. I ask unanimus consent that the amendment may be read again, Mr. Chairman. No; I have it here. I will read it to the gentleman:

The words "war material" as used herein shall include all articles of every description or any part or ingredient thereof intended for, adapted, or useful for the use of the United States or any associate nation in connection with the conduct of the war.

Now, certainly coal is suitable for the use of the United States, and it seems to me if the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] will permit this definition, following so closely upon the definition in the act to punish willful injury or destruction of war materials or war premises or war utilities, would leave this term free from all doubt, because it might be said that Congress has already defined it in a previous act and has followed closely the definition of that act, and therefore the meaning of the term in the act is plain and does not rest upon the discretion of any official as to what shall be included within the term.

It seems to me, inasmuch as we have started off this great measure with practically two pages of definitions, defining the very complex term "property" and also defining what the words "to acquire" mean and the words "within the boundaries of the United States," that if it is necessary to define them you might well follow previous precedents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Massachusetts called my attention to this definition which he now embodies in an amendment which he will offer, I was very much inclined to agree with him when I first glanced over it, because it seemed to be a very comprehensive and specific definition of war material. But after I went to the Clerk's desk and got a copy of his amendment I discovered that this definition was used in a criminal statute, and it was intended by Congress to serve as a basis or guide to the courts in determining the question in a criminal prosecution.

After discovering that, I am not certain that this amendment ought to be adopted in this connection, and the reason why I take the proposition and why I am in doubt about it now is this: This power bill is seeking to confer upon somebody extraordinary power and authority on the basis and on the theory that the exigencies of the occasion require that somebody be authorized to exercise extraordinary power in order to meet the critical situation in the prosecution of the war. Now, of course, naturally the one to whom this authority ought to be given and must be given is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President. In this portion of the bill which is seeking to define the different terms used throughout the bill the committee reporting it seems to think it necessary to define "war material," and they say it means "any material or commodity which, in the opinion of the President, may be necessary," and so forth. I am inclined to believe that that clause, "in the opinion of the President," ought to be retained in the bill. Because there is a great deal of material that the average layman would not think was necessary at all, but is found by experts in the preparation of material for war purposes to be vitally necessary and important. The President will be guided in his determination of these questions by the opinion and advice and suggestions of the experts, I have no doubt.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman if, under the definition that I propose, the President has not still the widest discretion. It says, "All articles of whatever description and any part or ingredient thereof intended for, adapted to, or suitable for the use of the United States."

Mr. HAMLIN. Will it vest in him the power to determine what are "necessary materials"? If I am convinced of that fact, I will agree with you. The language of the gentleman's proposed amendment is broad. "War material shall include all articles of whatever description"—that is broad—"and any part or ingredient thereof intended for, adapted to, or suitable for the use of the United States or any associate nation in connection with the conduct of the war." This would be all right, provided the President has the right to determine the fact as to what is the necessary war material.

Mr. WALSH. Having in mind the definition I have offered and subsection 9, page 8:

In furtherance of any of the foregoing purposes, to modify, cancel, or suspend any existing or future contracts for the delivery of power to any person not engaged in the production of war material or to the extent to which he shall deem the power contracted for to be in excess of the requirements for the manufacture of war material by such persons or to which, in his opinion, it shall prevent the delivery of power which he shall deem necessary for the production of war material of greater or more immediate utility.

When he comes to apply the act he is vested with the discretion all through this act. In that discretion, with these broad terms of what is meant by "war material," he still will have just as broad power as under the original definition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. WINGO. Can we have the amendment reported?

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, strike out the word "at" at the end of the line, and strike out, on page 3, line 1, the words "any time."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, in view of the adoption of these amendments, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has submitted an amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment of the gentleman from New York tends to perfect the section, it would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. If the gentleman from New York desires to offer an amendment to perfect the section, it would have precedence.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment, line 1, page 3, strike out after the word "produce" the balance of the line, and lines 2 and 3, and substitute for that the words "for the purpose of prosecuting the war."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 1, after the word "produce," strike out the words "or of which he may deem it necessary or important to increase the production," and insert in lieu thereof the words "for the purpose of prosecuting the war."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to that amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for subsection (f): That the words "war material," as used herein, shall include all articles of whatever description, and any part or ingredient thereof, intended for, adapted to, or suitable for the use of the United States, or any associate nation, in connection with the conduct of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 13 ayes and 18 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(g) The term "to acquire" means to purchase, requisition, condemn, or take over the title to, or to lease, requisition, condemn, or take over the right to use, occupy, or operate the whole or any part of; and, unless it shall be limited by the context, includes all such acts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What does the word "condemn" mean as here used?

Mr. SIMS. I understand it means to acquire through process of condemnation if that is resorted to.

Mr. WALSH. What does the word "requisition" mean?

Mr. SIMS. The technical legal meaning of the word "requisition" is intended, as far as I know.

Mr. WALSH. Does it mean the same as "commandeer"?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know that it does.

Mr. WALSH. Well, it would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, if we are going into defining terms, they had better pick out some hard ones and define them rather than to define the term "to acquire." There is no necessity of giving a definition to the words "to acquire," but here is a definition which includes within its terms several words about which there might be some doubt if used in this connection.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman's idea is to have a subsection g½ or g-a or g-b to define such words as "requisition" and "condemn"?

Mr. WALSH. Well——

Mr. WINGO. Has not the word "requisition" a well-known meaning, clearly defined, and has been defined by the courts?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I believe it has.

Mr. WINGO. Well, the words "to acquire" have not.

Mr. WALSH. I believe the word "acquire" has, and I do not know why they pick out of the depths of antiquity——

Mr. WINGO. I was just asking for information of my friend from Massachusetts, if it is his idea to have the words "lease," "requisition," and "condemn"—in other words, all the defined words—put in one word also defined? Then you would have to define the words that defined the words, would you not?

Mr. WALSH. I think very likely.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I observe that the paragraph twice defines the term "to acquire" as "to condemn." Does the gentleman think it is necessary to do it twice?

Mr. WALSH. No; neither do I know what it means to "take over the right to use, occupy, or operate the whole or any part of." There seems to have been something left out there. If they mean to include all property, it should have been put in there; but the criticism I desire to make, if the chairman of the committee will pardon me, is that in a measure of this importance it seems to me that the gentlemen who drafted the bill spent a little too much time in endeavoring to define terms which for the proper administration of the bill require no definition. Now, it has come to pass in legislation to define terms or phrases where there may be room for doubt. Several measures have been passed of that sort, but here is one that has very simple terms, which everybody knows the meaning of, and they have taken up a page and a half to set forth definitions, and if they have peculiar meanings as applied to this act only any meaning whatever more than the ordinary use of these phrases—but in this subsection you seek to define the term "to acquire," and then you use in there two other terms, "to condemn" or "to requisition." Now, it may be that these two terms would have a well-defined meaning or they might not have a meaning which would make them a proper part of the definition of "to acquire."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman, in the water-power bill I made the same criticism to a number of definitions.

Mr. WALSH. I recall.

Mr. SIMS. That they were absolutely useless——

Mr. WALSH. I recall the gentleman's opposition at that time, and I want to say that I agreed with him then and I trust he agrees with me now.

Mr. SIMS. I do agree with the gentleman's general criticism of the definition of well-known and well-understood terms, either legal or general, but thinking this would not hurt anything and perhaps satisfy some gentlemen who might not otherwise be satisfied, it is put in in the nature of a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for just one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks that is a complete definition which says the term "to acquire" means "to purchase, requisition, condemn, or take over the title to, or to lease, requisition, condemn, or take over the right to use, occupy, or operate the whole or any part of; and, unless it shall be limited by the context, includes all such acts"? Well, now, what does this mean?

Mr. SIMS. What does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. WALSH. What I have just read.

Mr. SIMS. Meaning in what way? It means what it says. I can not give the meaning of each word, I can not go into it that far.

Mr. FOSTER. It includes all such acts above enumerated.

Mr. WALSH. I always thought that in a sentence you have to have a subject and predicate. But in here you stop short with a semicolon and say "and, unless it shall be limited by the context, includes all such acts." Now, what is it that is going to have the right to use, occupy, or operate the whole or any part of it?

Mr. SIMS. It is intended the property included in the terms of the bill and purposes of it, for the plants, parts of plants, transmission lines, distributing plants, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I should like to ask what, if any, changes were made by the committee outside of these committee amendments, all of which have so far been beaten, in the bill as originally sent from the department?

Mr. SIMS. The bill as introduced, I would say, is not the original one; there have been several bills discussed—the bill as introduced, the committee amendments shown in the bill itself and printed are all the committee agreed on. Other amendments were suggested afterwards, and I submitted them to Mr. ESCH and Judge DEWALT. I tried to get a full meeting of the committee but could not get it, but the gentlemen agreed it would be a benefit to the bill to offer the amendment of which I have a copy here, which I would be glad to give the gentleman, and while these are not committee amendments, Mr. ESCH, myself, and some others have gone over them and think they will benefit the bill.

And we are going to offer those, but not, of course, with the statement that the committee as a whole have passed on them. One of them I read to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] awhile ago.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is not quite the question I asked. What I want to know is whether the committee made any change in the bill outside of the committee amendments?

Mr. SIMS. Not at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman mean to say there never has been a quorum of the committee present in considering this bill?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no. A quorum was present when these committee amendments were considered. These amendments here that I have in my hand, that we are going to propose, were not considered by a quorum of the committee, but they were gotten up and suggested after the bill was reported, and they will, I believe, benefit the bill and will be generally so considered. But they are not technically committee amendments, although Mr. ESCH and Mr. DEWALT, and myself went over them, and I do not know how many others. But I will not claim that they are committee amendments, because a majority of the committee did not consider them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. All the amendments were written in the departments?

Mr. SIMS. And studied and considered and considered.

Mr. LONGWORTH. By everybody but the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, while this controversy was going on about the definition of the word "acquired" I took the opportunity of going to the dictionary and writing down what it says about it. And it defines the word "acquire" as follows:

To obtain by search, endeavor, practice, or purchase; get one's own; receive or gain in whatever manner; come to have; as the clouds acquire new tints at sunset; to acquire a collection of coins.

Then, outside the definition, the dictionary goes on to say:

Men are apt to acquire peculiarities continually ascribed to them. No man of power can do himself a greater wrong than to make an attempt to acquire the style of another man.

And this statement, which I found in the dictionary, becomes peculiarly significant at this time, for it is evident that this great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House has done itself the great injustice of acquiring the style of the writer of the bill and paying no attention whatever to the acquisition of terms written in the bill on its own account. It seems to me that the bill is of such far-reaching importance that it would justify the research by the committee for the proper words to use and that they might accept for original terms.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think that in view of the importance of this bill it might be well to acquire a quorum of the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. I suggested that at an early stage of the proceedings, but I hope the gentleman will not raise it while I am making these few scattering remarks. When I am through I shall be perfectly willing to adopt the suggestion, though I doubt very much that anything I may say will add any light to the wisdom that has already been displayed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the formulation of this bill, written by two embryonic lawyers, I understand, down in the War Trade Board and the War-Risk Insurance Board.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I observed in the last division of the House that there were 31 gentlemen present, and there has been a substantial exodus since then. I think gentlemen ought to be present to acquire information from what the gentleman is saying.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman thinks it is of sufficient importance to get the gentlemen who are on the street and elsewhere to come in to hear what I am saying, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I listened to the gentleman's recital of the definition of the term in controversy. I would like to ask if that is from a dictionary of standing and approved by the department, and has it passed the official censor or the head of the publicity bureau?

Mr. MADDEN. The dictionary I consulted is the one that is usually sought by those who wish to acquire definite and reliable information.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it one that has been taken over by the administration and, therefore, made official?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, it may not be considered as a war measure, and hence the necessity of taking it over has not been given due consideration.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it war material or, if not, a war measure?

Mr. MADDEN. It might be in case you find difficulty in describing words. Now, for example, "as the clouds acquire new tints at sunset," we seem to have reached the sunset of consideration of important measures in the production of this bill that is pending before us. The men who drafted the bill certainly could have had no knowledge of the terms to be used in such an important measure. If they had, they would have been definite and certain in the terms employed. They have been as indefinite and uncertain as it is possible for a mind to be. Of course I realize that lawyers as a rule attempt to complicate the language of a bill so that it will enable them to get business in the courts. Not being a lawyer, I can not understand why that is done. I am in favor of going direct to the point that I hope to reach; but this bill goes as indirectly as it is possible for a thing to go. It gives an opportunity to the President, through the advice and counsel of men who, I assume, know nothing of any consequence about the thing upon which they advise the President, to take over a lot of dilapidated, worn-out, bankrupt gas plants, or any other kind of a plant that may be tottering on the ragged edge of despair and bankruptcy, gives the Government an opportunity to rehabilitate these plants, put the owners of the plants back into a prosperous business condition, enables the Government to transfer these plants to these present owners at the end of the war without much consideration, and gives such wide latitude in the expenditure of public money for the acquisition of these institutions for no serious war purpose, in my judgment, that it leads a man to doubt the wisdom of the consideration of this measure.

I am as patriotic as anybody. I want to win the war. Everybody in the United States is patriotic. They are giving their blood and their means and their time and their best efforts to win the war. But why should we not be definite and certain when we attempt to do something in the matter of legislation? I regret that this bill is so indefinite that even the dictionary can not describe it. Of course, it would not be considered as a serious defect that I am not able to describe it, because I do not pretend to be an expert in understanding the use of words; but I do understand the use of definitions after I have looked up the dictionary and found out what it says, and I find nowhere in the dictionary anything that approaches a clear understanding of the terms used in the definition that is now presented for our consideration.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. I feel a great deal as the gentleman from Illinois does about this bill and its features, but I do feel like offering one defense to the language. It is distinctly Napoleonic. That individual, great in history, was noted, in drawing his treaties, for so drawing them as to make them open to construction in the future as events might arise, and I think that characteristic appears here. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman from Nebraska should be permitted to go on with his explanation.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear something more about the Napoleonic method. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who has just taken his seat, to the fact that definitions in acts of legislative bodies simply define the meaning of words used for the purposes of the acts, and in respect to the gentleman's criticism of this definition as not coming up to the meaning as defined in the dictionaries, it is wholly inapplicable and may be facetious and funny, but that is about as far as it goes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that the dictionary is of no particular use in the construction of terms used in a legislative enactment?

Mr. SIMS. The definition here—the one just referred to—is a limitation of the words "to acquire." Now, the gentleman certainly would not want to write into this bill something that would give it the meaning that he has just given from the dictionary?

Mr. MADDEN. Then I do not see why it should be used.

Mr. SIMS. These definitions are intended only to define words with reference to the act itself where they occur.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. I notice in line 18 it is provided that—

Unless it shall be otherwise specifically provided herein the inclusion of any matter or thing within the definition of any word or term by the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be deemed to exclude therefrom any other matter or thing which under the usual construction of such word or term would fall within the meaning thereof.

After nine definitions defining words for purposes of this act, we have a clause saying that instead of those definitions the words shall have their usual meaning. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. And therefore they would include the terms of the sunset definition referred to by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMS. Of course if they should not be in there they can be stricken out.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would certainly leave out any clause saying that definitions do not mean anything.

Mr. SIMS. I do not mean to admit that the gentleman is right or that they do not mean anything.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] I may say that in the committee I raised the same question during the hearing, and a gentleman concerned in the preparation of the bill gave the committee the impression that it was merely a dragnet proposition, and he concluded by saying, "It would do no harm and might do some good." [Laughter.] So that when it comes to that section I shall move to strike it out.

Mr. SIMS. I was going to say to the gentleman that when we reach that point, as I said to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], a motion to strike out can be offered. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] proposes to do it. But if that is stricken out, it becomes absolutely necessary that these definitions should remain in the act for purposes of limitation, because general definitions are too indefinite.

Mr. SLOAN. But I would not put a limitation on and then take it off.

Mr. WALSH. Would not the gentleman from Tennessee agree to strike out all the definitions and leave that paragraph in?

Mr. SIMS. I would not want to do that.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says he is not a lawyer. I suppose that is the case with most of us, even those of us who have heretofore been lawyers and have practiced law, after we have been engaged for so long a time in politics.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us have some information. That is what I am looking for.

Mr. SIMS. I could not give the gentleman any general information that he does not already possess, but I wish to say that when the bill was being prepared——

Mr. MADDEN. Was that in the preparation of the draft law?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, if the gentleman does not mean to be respectful I will not say another word. It was submitted—this bill was submitted—to one of the ablest lawyers in the United States before it was introduced. And I wish to say that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce does not make a business of doing things half way and having a matter of importance referred to somebody in whose judgment and in whose knowledge we do not have confidence.

Now, the gentleman knows—or at least I think he knows—that in matters that require expert knowledge and with reference to these power plants and electrical terms and things of that sort, I submit that I have not expert knowledge, and I have to trust to somebody; and I would be glad, indeed, if the leadership on that side, or whoever has the power to do it, would put upon our committee the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], because one of the greatest chairmen that committee ever had was from Illinois, and I think the gentleman has had a good opportunity to be educated under the shining light of the former chairman of our committee, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MADDEN. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to sit at the gentleman's feet and worship whatever might be brought forth that was worthy of worship. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIMS. There is no pending motion before the committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, with reference to this paragraph, and I think of the whole bill, as I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], there were some engineers consulted, and I think the engineers must have drawn this particular paragraph, or the whole bill, or perhaps a blacksmith did it, as somebody near me suggests. [Laughter.] This paragraph is divided into two parts. First the term "to acquire" is said to mean "to purchase, requisition, condemn, or take over the title to." To what nobody knows.

Mr. SIMS. To what the bill applies. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The bill applies to whatever its language makes it apply. It does not apply to anything not in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. The bill refers to what is to be taken over.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What is it?

Mr. SIMS. It is in the bill. This is merely a definition, and the definitions come before the powers conferred in the bill. If the gentleman from Iowa or any other gentleman simply wants to be facetious and waste time, of course he can do it.

Mr. WALSH. This is not wasting time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The other part is "to lease, requisition, condemn, or take over the right to use, occupy, or operate the whole or any part thereof." This is also left in the air without any ground-wire attachment, the text not stating what it is to be applied to, but "the right to use, occupy, and operate" would have to be purchased just as much as the title would have to be. But the word "purchase" does not apply to the right to use, occupy, or operate the whole or any part of. So under the paragraph they have no right to purchase it.

Mr. REED. I find that the phrase "acquire" only occurs once in the bill. Why not define it there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is propounding a question that I will have to refer to the chairman of the committee. The word "acquire" is not here properly defined.

Mr. SLOAN. Not properly defined; is it defined insufficiently, too much, or too little? Is it buried in a mass of words, a congregation of polysyllabics, or words not properly arranged?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is in a mass of verbiage, and the whole paragraph ought to be rewritten.

Mr. SLOAN. In Harvey's old grammar there was a statement for correction, "Many words, they darken speech." Is that a description of this paragraph?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think that would be fairly descriptive.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman means that there are so many trees it obscures the view?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is the trouble. They obscure the meaning by the number of words. The paragraph ought to be passed over and rewritten.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. SIMS. Can not the gentleman do that just as well on the next paragraph?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I want to ask the gentleman a question about the report. If the committee did not write the bill, it probably wrote the report. Was the report written by the committee?

Mr. SIMS. No; not by the committee. I never knew a committee to write a report. It was written by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What does this sentence in the report mean?

The bill merits general support also because it permits and provides for the erection of power stations in coal districts where coal may be treated in by-product coke ovens so as to secure needed war materials to provide gas for industrial purposes, and also to develop power therefrom in a way which is not so economical or so satisfactory as to transport materials over long distances and then provide for their utilization.

Mr. SIMS. Has the gentleman read what Dr. Garfield and Mr. Stewart have said on the subject?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. There is where I got the information.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I gather from the report that the intention of the committee was to provide for that in a way not so economical——

Mr. SIMS. No; it does not mean that. It is to provide for central power stations instead of having them scattered, so that the mining of coal can be done at much less cost and with a much less consumption of coal itself.

Mr. SLOAN. This comes under the condition of reverse language.

Mr. SIMS. There may be a typographical error, but I think the meaning is clear. I got my information from the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. Garfield, and Mr. Stewart, the engineer of the power section of the Fuel Administration, and from general information on that subject.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not gather from Dr. Garfield that he wanted to provide a way of transportation not so economical or satisfactory.

Mr. SIMS. Perhaps that is an error of the stenographer. I have not looked at it since I looked at the typewritten report, and my attention has not been called to it since. I have not looked it over in print. Of course it has no such meaning as the gentleman states.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am delighted to hear that that was not the intention of the committee.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman must have seen from the report what are the objects and purposes of the bill, and that it would result in economy instead of the reverse.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is what I hoped. Then we are to consider that this sentence means directly the opposite of what it says?

Mr. SIMS. I have not looked at it; there may be an error of the kind referred to; but if so, it is so plainly apparent from the whole report and from the bill itself as to suggest to the mind of any man who has or may read the report and the bill as to call for no explanation, and can not possibly mislead any man who does not want to put a false and unwarranted construction on the bill and report as a whole.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 4 to 8, inclusive, on page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD. Strike out lines 4 to 8, inclusive, page 3.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get some agreement as to limit of debate.

Mr. GOOD. I only want three or four minutes. I think there will be no disposition to object to this. I think after the gentleman thinks about it he will be disposed to accept it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this section in five minutes, the gentleman from Iowa to have the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to close debate on subsection "g" in five minutes, the gentleman from Iowa to have the five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the language I move to strike out is the definition of the term "to acquire." There is only one place in this bill where the term appears, and here we have taken up much space in a long definition of that term. I suggest that when the gentleman comes to page 6, section 4, "to acquire any private power plant within the boundaries of the United States," add the words "by any known methods of procurement," and he has covered the entire situation.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think that that side of the House or this side will vote for that kind of a bill?

Mr. GOOD. That is exactly the language that was put in the national-defense act.

Mr. SIMS. I would not have any objection to it.

Mr. GOOD. The language you have here is so cumbersome that it ought not to be included in the bill. It is a long definition, while you only use the term once in the entire bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were 20 ayes and 14 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WINGO having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. MYERS, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EMERGENCY POWER BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

(h) The term "within the boundaries of the United States" means all lands and waters subject for any purposes to the jurisdiction of the United States of America.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words to ask the chairman a question. If this definition were not in the bill what would the term "boundaries within the United States" mean as used in the act?

Mr. SIMS. This section was discussed quite a little in the committee. There were different views given about it. If we use the language the gentleman has used, "the United States," and stop, it might not include Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. MADDEN. This would not do it either.

Mr. SIMS. It is any country where the United States has jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I will say to the gentleman we have defined the term "the United States" in several war-emergency measures that have been enacted by the Congress and in none of them has any such definition as this been enacted, and what I want to know is if we do not have this definition what will the term "United States" mean in the act?

Mr. SIMS. My own opinion is, so far as this act is concerned, that it is within the boundaries of the United States, and that would mean continental United States.

Mr. WALSH. Why did not the gentleman say that the term "United States" shall include the Philippines, Porto Rico, Alaska, Panama Canal Zone, and so forth?

Mr. SIMS. We could be specific and we would have just what we have got here, nothing more or less.

Mr. WALSH. No; you have got something entirely different.

Mr. TEMPLE. And subject for any purpose to the jurisdiction of the United States. Would that include the Republic of Haiti, which for the present is under the control of the Marine Corps of the United States?

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. TEMPLE. That is subject for military purposes.

Mr. SIMS. This is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States the ordinary way, like the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, the Canal Zone, and Porto Rico.

Mr. TEMPLE. We are in occupation by our military forces.

Mr. SIMS. It was suggested, as the gentleman knows from what has happened in the far eastern country, in Asia, that it might be necessary for the Government to do something of this sort in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WALSH. Would it not be sufficient to say within the United States or Territorial possessions?

Mr. SIMS. Any words which mean the same thing, of course, there could be no objection to. It is only a quibble over words. You can offer any amendment gentlemen may think better than the language of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. My suggestion is based on the belief the two phrases do not mean the same thing.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman, perhaps, is more accurate than I am.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he believes this in any way includes the boundary waters?

Mr. SIMS. Within the boundary?

Mr. WALDOW. Well, within the boundary.

Mr. SIMS. It would include boundary waters in so far as the United States exercising jurisdiction over it is concerned.

Mr. WALDOW. For instance, our treaty with Canada at the present time over the Niagara Falls question; would it include those waters?

Mr. SIMS. I think this gives the United States the right to do anything we have got the right to do under the treaty on the American side, and I think this definition would include any waters in the United States over which the United States has jurisdiction, by treaty or otherwise.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, if necessary, to suggest to the chairman before passing from this that he or the committee, or whoever has charge of the bill, should change the subsection indication there from (g) to (h), as we have stricken out subsection (g).

Mr. SIMS. I was going to say that is a very proper suggestion, and that is one we always do without formal action of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

(i) The term "war period" means the time to elapse until six months after the President shall, by proclamation, have declared the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government and its allies to be at an end.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 3, lines 13 to 17 inclusive, strike out the words "President shall, by proclamation, have declared the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government and its allies to be at an end" and insert in lieu thereof: "proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment. I can not understand why the committee tried to define the war period as something that is not the war period, which is plainly not the war period. If you want the time extended beyond the war period, why use this expression "after the period of the war"?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman means the committee amendment, the object of it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The committee has made a definition of the term "war period" to be not at the termination of the war, but six months after the war.

Mr. SIMS. That is the war period in the provisions of this act. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin offered this amendment and it was accepted in the committee, and I leave it to him to make a statement.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Of course, great deference is due to the gentleman from Wisconsin as far as that is concerned, but I think in writing bills we ought to avoid definitions which prescribe something which has exactly the opposite meaning of what is sought to be defined.

Mr. ESCH. That is oftentimes the object of the definition. We can say "within the limits of the United States" and we will include in that the possessions. In the trading-with-the-enemy act we defined the end of the war to be a certain period after the termination of hostilities, and yet it would not be a termination of the war, strictly speaking; and this is in the same category.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I do not mean to say the legal effect would not be all right, but it simply confuses an act and causes you to stop. It ought to be written clearly, because a person has to stop and think twice whenever a word is defined to be something which it does not mean according to the dictionary definition.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Unless it shall be otherwise specifically provided herein the inclusion of any matter or thing within the definition of any word or term by the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be deemed to exclude therefrom any other matter or thing which under the usual construction of such word or term would fall within the meaning thereof.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, strike out lines 18 to 23, inclusive.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection to this amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There might be after I get through with my speech. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to comment on this paragraph that we have before us. It is unexampled except in one instance, to my knowledge, since I have been a Member of the House, and that was in the original War Finance Corporation bill sent to the Ways and Means Committee by the Secretary of the Treasury; but that bill was entirely rewritten by the Ways and Means Committee, precisely the opposite of the case in this instance, where not a change has been made in the original draft of the bill except the committee amendments, most of which have been defeated. The bill sent to us contained this provision, which we struck out:

Provided, That the powers specifically enumerated herein shall be deemed an addition to but not limitation of any implied powers granted in this act.

That, in my mind, is the one fitting parallel for the paragraph the gentleman from Wisconsin has moved to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized and empowered, within the limits of the amounts herein authorized, or that may hereafter be authorized—

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Page 4, line 4, strike out the words "the amounts hereinafter authorized, or that may hereafter be authorized," and insert in lieu thereof "appropriations herein or hereafter made."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the committee amendment. I do not know what jurisdiction the committee has over making appropriations upon this subject. Of course, under the rules of the House a committee can not report out a bill carrying an appropriation—that is, as I understand the rules of the House—carrying an appropriation under this particular class of legislation.

Now, it would seem to me that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had better grant the authorty and let the matter of appropriations come from the Appropriations Committee, and not attempt to provide for $175,000,000 of a direct appropriation, and, in addition, $150,000 to defray expenses. And it would seem to me, strange though it may be, that the genius who drafted the measure got the right idea in it in the form in which the bill was presented, but which the committee have attempted to amend. And I submit to the chairman that it will not in any way delay or affect seriously this measure if the appropriation is simply authorized.

Mr. SIMS. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that portions of this bill have been drawn for quite a while—ever since May. When I was approached on the subject of introducing a bill of this kind, it was before the water-power bill had even been reported, and the question was as to whether the water-power bill could not be so amended as to give this power. It looked to me that there would have to be so many legislative provisions in connection with this act that to undertake to combine it as an amendment to the water-power bill would be unwise and bring about confusion, and might bring about the defeat or delay of the water-power bill. So I suggested that a bill simply authorizing the appropriation for this purpose be drawn up.

The sundry civil bill had not then passed. So this was done on my suggestion and with that view, as the Committee on Appropriations had no authorization for such an appropriation. I understand, too—I do not know that it is a fact, because I never talked with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the chairman of the committee—I also understand, too, that he had been consulted by Mr. Baruch or some one else about it. And that the sundry civil bill had been practically made up and he did not feel authorized to undertake to carry the appropriation without any act authorizing the committee to do so. Then, when the recess came it was discussed more and more, and finally I introduced the bill which you have now before you, without having changed the words from "authorize" to "appropriate." I think it was my distinguished colleague [Mr. ESCH] who suggested this amendment and that the committee adopted the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee this question. I notice that he provides for an amount of money here for administrative purposes. How much of a force does the gentleman contemplate will be necessary and what salaries will be paid to that force under this bill?

Mr. SIMS. Really I do not know. There is information in the hearings along that line, but it is intended to be very modest and very reasonable. Now, I was going to say that nobody can tell, nobody can know, in advance what will be necessary in the way of employing persons to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. SISSON. But you can make an inquiry as to the purpose and intention of the gentlemen who have prepared this bill and make them tell you exactly what they are going to do with this $150,000, I believe it is, for administrative purposes, and as to what force they are going to have, whether it is going to be organized under a bureau, and, if so, what the bureau chief's salary will be, what the chief clerk's salary will be, how many clerks you are going to have to begin the operation. All of that ought to be investigated.

Mr. SIMS. I do not remember now whether the hearings go into detail on that subject or not. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] remember whether that was gone into in the hearings or not?

Mr. ESCH. No. I asked one of the representatives, I think of the War Industries Board, to give us an account of the items and expenses making up the $150,000, and he said it would be presented. I have looked up the printed testimony, but I can not find it.

Mr. SIMS. It has not been presented to me.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think the gentleman ought to ask the committee to turn this over to these gentlemen unless you have some assurance as to what the salary of the bureau chief is going to be. You will turn them loose without any strings, when it is hard enough to tie them, when they give their testimony and you make a specific provision for them.

Mr. SIMS. This power will perhaps be exercised by several departments and bureaus.

Mr. SISSON. I am going to ask the gentleman another question. I notice you have $175,000,000 here, which you give virtually to some unknown person that is going to administer this bill, with an unknown salary and with an unknown organization.

Mr. SIMS. We give it to the President.

Mr. SISSON. I understand; but it is still unknown so far as the——

Mr. SIMS. I do not know who it will be.

Mr. SISSON. And we are dealing with a thing now so far as our conscience and our mind is concerned. Now, you propose to leave this $175,000,000 as a revolving fund in the hands of some one, without knowing just exactly what the organization is going to be.

Mr. SIMS. I do not understand that it is to be a revolving fund. It is intended to aid private persons or companies in construction of extensions by the use of this money. I do not understand that anything will come back until the companies or individuals that are aided begin to pay back the money advanced to them. It is not a revolving fund.

Mr. SISSON. Let us take the clause itself and analyze it, and see exactly what is provided. The paragraph reads:

(2) For the purpose of increasing the capacity or productivity of any private power plant within the boundaries of the United States to install in any such plant any structure, machinery, or appliances that he may deem useful to that end, either through agents or contractors employed by him, or by providing the operator of such plant with funds to be applied to that purpose; to lease the machinery, appliances, and structures—

And so on. And then down further it provides:

Or for such period thereafter not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period, as he may deem expedient in the interest of the United States, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable; and to enter into contracts requiring or permitting the lessee to purchase such appliances, machinery, and structures, or parts thereof, at or before the termination of such lease at their then value, or upon such other terms as he may deem equitable for the protection of the interests of the United States and of the community served by such lessee.

There you permit the contract to be made and money to be used, not to exceed in this bill $75,000,000; and unless there is a requirement of the President in a subsequent clause to have report made back to Congress, no provision is made for accounting. And even though a report of that kind is made back to Congress, it would take positive legislation to be able to control for the next two or three or four years—and this does not exceed five years—the expenditure of this money. In other words, I think after this bill goes into effect the money that is used ought to be appropriated from year to year by Congress and a strict accountability required. I do not believe you ought to turn it loose to any set of men without an accounting.

When you say the President is going to do it it is absurd, and manifestly so, because the President can only turn it over to some man and ask him to make a report of the matter. Therefore I believe, since Congress is called upon to give $175,000,000 for the administration of this law, to be used and turned over by that organization in this business from time to time until the plants get able to pay it back, there ought to be an accounting to Congress for this vast sum of money to be used for such a series of years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that the language should be stricken out, and that this bill should simply make an authorization, and that the Committee on Appropriations should go carefully into the subject and report such an appropriation as it might deem proper.

By the way, if this bill were to become a law speedily, within a few days, the subcommittee on deficiencies of the Committee on Appropriations is now in session, and I can assure you that before it comes out of that committee we will know what kind of an organization they are going to build up, and know the manner in which they are going to handle this $175,000,000. I think that Congress is entitled to that information.

Mr. SIMS. This work, if it is to be of any value whatever in winning the war, must commence just as quickly as possible, on account of climatic conditions. The increase of these different power plants must certainly be undertaken just as quickly as possible in order that the increase may be available for such purposes as are set out in the bill in time to be of substantial benefit in the prosecution of the war. Time is of the greatest importance in this matter.

Now, I do not care anything about the appropriation part of it, myself, individually. I do not want to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations. I think they do their work well, and all that kind of thing. But I would not want to consent to the proposition that the appropriation should go out of the bill.

Mr. SISSON. I have no desire, if this bill becomes a law, to delay for one moment its being put into operation; but I do not believe in the propriety of investing the particular lot of individuals who may be selected by the President with the enormous power given in this bill and with this enormous sum of money, which will not have to be accounted for except when called upon by the President. They do not have to come to Congress and make any accounting of this money until the end of these five years.

Mr. SIMS. No; it is annual.

Mr. SISSON. You are mistaken, unless the language does not mean what I think it does. They make annual reports, but the annual reports do not prevent them from continuing to use the $175,000,000.

Mr. SIMS. How would you want them to do it?

Mr. SISSON. The bill says it shall run for five years.

Mr. SIMS. That only means that the property is to be held for five years.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee ought to agree to strike out that appropriation. I think you are going a long way in asking that Congress accept a proposition of that kind.

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection to striking it out, provided we knew the bill would pass in time for the Committee on Appropriations to do what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] says it will do, and let this organization take advantage of that fund, so that the increase of power plants can be undertaken before the dead of winter comes on. But there is no question as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to make the appropriations necessary to carry into effect the objects and purposes of the bill.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that the gentleman from Tennessee himself might not object to this paragraph being stricken out; but I, as a member of the committee, do object.

Mr. SIMS. I would object to it, although I know the Committee on Appropriations would do it carefully and well.

Mr. DECKER. So far as concerns the ability of the committee to go into the details of this organization, for which we have allowed $175,000——

Mr. WALSH. One hundred and seventy-five million dollars——

Mr. DECKER. I mean $150,000—for organization and administrative purposes, I do not believe the Committee on Appropriations would have any more time to spend on that subject than we spent on it.

Mr. SISSON. But the gentleman from Tennessee gives us absolutely no information in the hearings that were had on the bill before his committee, and we get absolutely no information from anyone as to the organization which it is intended to build up or what salaries are to be paid or what is to be done with this $150,000. I am not controverting what the gentleman says, but we do not know what organization is to be built up, and we are entitled to the information.

I have no doubt you gentlemen could do it; I am not controverting that proposition. The only question is whether the committee has any information as to what organization is going to be built up.

Mr. DECKER. I want to say that if the gentleman's committee or the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce should start to work out specifically the organization that was necessary to administer this bill, I doubt if we could work it out in detail before at least half of the rest of the war is over.

Mr. TEMPLE. Somebody has got to do it.

Mr. DECKER. Somebody has got to do it, but when you get 25 men to work out an organization you will find that you can not do it. No organization of the Government could work it out in detail in that way.

Mr. SISSON. As a matter of fact, when any bureau has been created or authorized by any other committee as this is, when the appropriation committee went into the matter they have given us a tentative organization and given the House the character of the organization.

Mr. DECKER. I concur with the gentleman in a measure on that. I think some tentative organization could be worked out, but I hope the gentleman will not forget that this is an emergency measure, and time is of the essence. You say who will be responsible for the spending of this money? I say the President. You say it will be impossible for him to do it. You say we do not know who will administer the bill. I say perhaps that is true, but I think the President does, and I think it will be done under the War Industries Board. I do not think the gentleman would doubt their ability because he knows them as well or better than I do.

Mr. SISSON. I have not any doubt of the ability of anyone; it is a question of proper and orderly legislation in getting before the committee and getting before the Members of Congress exactly what is going to be done with the money that is appropriated.

Mr. DECKER. As a general proposition, for the establishment of a permanent organization, where we have the time to work it out carefully, I think the gentleman is right, as we did with the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, reported by our committee. It was worked out with as much detail as we could; it has had to be changed some since, like every other proposition. But I tell the gentleman frankly that you have to trust somebody on this.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I am glad the gentleman mentioned the War-Risk Bureau, because, as a matter of fact, you gentlemen did go into that organization and gave us a detailed report as to the character of the organization, fixing the salary of the officers. That was entirely new. Of course, the great growth of that bureau has caused many clerks and many people to be added as the Army continued to grow. That is a splendid illustration of what could be done and ought to be done here.

Mr. DECKER. The difference is that the War-Risk Bureau is one that we expect to last 50 or 100 years, and this nobody expects to last longer than 5 years. The main part of the work, the administration part, will be mostly done before that time, we sincerely hope.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. This bill appropriates $175,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring power plants and, further, to construct plants for the production of gas, toluol, benzol, and coal-tar products. I want to ask the gentleman, in all seriousness, how much is to be spent for plants for the production of toluol and other by-products? If the committee has gone into the subject, the gentleman ought to be able to tell us, as any appropriation committee would, how much you expect to use.

Mr. DECKER. Does the gentleman mean what the different items would cost?

Mr. GOOD. What part of the $175,000,000 would be required to build a plant for the production of toluol.

Mr. MADDEN. And how much it will produce.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; how much it will produce.

Mr. DECKER. I have not figured that up, and I do not think gentlemen would understand it if I had. I am speaking respectfully. I do not think anybody in the House would understand it if the committee did.

Mr. GOOD. I mean for building the plants.

Mr. DECKER. That is a question for the engineers to figure on—how much it will cost to build a plant—and I do not think they could do it in these abnormal times.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is mistaken; the department comes before the committee and states that they want so much money, and they may say that they do not know whether it will be constructed within that cost, but they have a program. But in your hearings I do not find any program laid down. More than that—and I say it with all due respect—any man in the House who has studied the question realizes that there is a lack of coordination between the War Department and the War Industries and other boards. I have here the statement of Col. McRoberts in regard to toluol. Congress gave the War Department $52,000,000, and he said that that would be all they wanted for the production of toluol. I want to say that the War Industries Board does not know what they are talking about when they ask us to appropriate a part of $175,000,000 for the production of toluol, and nobody has gone into the details. I do not mean to say that we ought not to have more power plants or that we ought not to increase the power plants, but I do say that in these times, when we need money so badly—so much of it—we do not want to appropriate more for any purpose than absolutely necessary to do the work. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if I can close debate.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have 10 minutes. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if I can get an agreement to close debate on this committee amendment and all amendments thereto. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this committee amendment and all amendments thereto close in 22 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it seems to me that while we are passing a law of this importance we ought to surround it with every possible safeguard, that we ought not any longer to consider appropriations in bulk without having definite information as to what the money is to be used for, what each unit is going to cost, what the unit is supposed to produce. We have evidence on every hand of the iniquity of lump-sum appropriations. The War Trade Board, the War Industries Board, the War-Risk Insurance Board, and all the other boards have employed people beyond the limits of decency. They no longer pretend to run the departments along economical business lines. Those in charge of employing the people to transact the business within the District of Columbia for the Government have caused to be issued advertisements throughout the country in the press that have invited thousands upon thousands of innocent girls to the city of Washington in search of employment without a chance to find a home, without the restraint or protection of their mothers and fathers, and they come here without any certainty of finding a place to work; and the War-Risk Insurance Board has been cited here as one of the solitary examples of scientific organization, and yet the War-Risk Insurance Board has 10,000 people employed, whereas 5,000 would do the work. They are standing in each other's way; they are not at work; they are idle; they admit it; they laugh on the streets at the ease with which they can get pay for the day's toil, so to speak, the easy manner in which they can draw money from the Treasury of the United States. They are not getting the work done. We find that everywhere on every hand. There ought to be something done. Here is a good place to start. If we have not already thrown the safeguards that ought to be thrown around such matters, let us begin. It is never too late. This is a good time to begin.

It is Friday, September 27. Let us note it as another day of record to see that in the enactment of the law providing for the creation of new power plants that we have established a policy not to make appropriations unless we have the fullest information upon which to base our action. We have not such information before us. We ought not to appropriate without it. The men who are to be charged with the responsibility of this work should be compelled to come before the Committee on Appropriations of the House, they should be required to tell in detail what the money is to be used for, what they propose to produce as a result of the expenditure of that money. The fact that we are at war and we have to do extraordinary things is no reason why we should throw the people's money away. We have just passed a bill to levy $8,000,000,000 of taxes upon the backs of the American people. They will feel that burden. They have already felt it. We are beginning a drive for the sale of $6,000,000,000 of liberty-loan bonds. The American people will be compelled to buy them. They want to buy them, they will buy them, they are interested in the war. They have given their boys to the country, they are willing to give themselves, they want this war to be won, they want honor to be reflected upon the management of the war, they want the departments of the Government to be conducted along economical business lines. They expect us to conserve their rights. We have an obligation imposed upon us by the oath we have taken.

If we fail to meet the obligation, we have been negligent of the responsibilities that have been handed to us by the people, and here we have a chance to show the people we are in earnest; that we realize they have heavy burdens to meet; that we do not want to impose greater burdens unnecessarily upon them. Let us consider the measures which come before us with a firm determination not under any circumstances to place in the hands of any man, no matter who he may be, the power to expend the people's money without restriction on his right to expend it. Is that unreasonable? Is it unreasonable to expect that we shall impose a restriction upon those who are charged with the responsibility of spending the people's money? Not at all. Our boys are spending their blood on the battle fields; they are exciting the admiration of the American people. Yes; they are exciting the admiration of the people of the world. Shall we be less worthy of the confidence of our own people than the boys who are fighting on the battle front? We will be if we fail to place every restriction that is possible to be placed upon every expenditure of their money, and for one I do not propose, because it is said that this is a necessary war measure, to place in the hands of any man, no matter who he may be, appointed by the President though he may be, the right of unrestricted employment here in Washington. Millions of dollars are being expended for the erection of buildings which would be unnecessary in this District if none were employed except those who are needed. I think it will not be denied by anybody who has made an investigation that the departments are overflowing with unnecessary employees, giving no return for the money they receive at the hands of the American people.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to yield; I want to go on and tell what I think about it. [Laughter.] I think that the time has come when somebody must speak. Democrats and Republicans alike know that what I say is true. I fear not only for the Treasury of the United States but for the welfare of the young girls who are coming to this city who are without the proper protection. I know many of them who have come as the result of advertisement, not because of any influence that has been exerted either by Democrats or Republicans in Congress, but by the desire on their part to be useful in war work.

And many of them have been placed in these positions who were not needed. They ought to be at home. They ought to be under the protecting influence of their mothers and fathers. And those who have been responsible for advertising the need for this large number of girls in the District of Columbia ought to insert in the newspapers of America the statement that there are more girls here now than there ought to be. And I make this statement for the protection and the welfare of the girls of America and not because of any desire on my part to prevent them from getting employment by the Government. I have fears that if we do not put a stop to this thing we will be responsible for many wrongs that may occur. In addition to being responsible for extravagant expenditures of public money, in God's name let us not be responsible for anything else that is worse. Let us insist that investigations to the fullest extent shall be made of the needs of the Government in every department. A committee ought to be appointed by the House with full power to go through every department and see what I saw, thousands of people sitting at desks and walking around without doing a tap of work from one end of the day to the other. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, a little while ago the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], in a colloquy with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER], said that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce ought to know, for instance, how much toluol was to be produced if this bill went through and became a law.

Mr. GOOD. What the plant would cost.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I can not yield. I will yield to the gentleman in a minute. I will say to him that if he knows anything about this product he knows it is a by-product that comes from other substances, that goes through certain processes. It would be an impossibility. The Appropriations Committee could not find out that. They would have no way of doing it.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is misquoting me.

Mr. FOSTER. Just wait a minute. I do not mean to misquote the gentleman; I will apologize to him if I have. But I understood one of his complaints was that they were unable to tell about how much they would produce of that.

Mr. Chairman, as I say, it will be impossible for them to do that, taking possession of these plants in this way, not knowing how many they would take over, not knowing what kind of plants they were, and whether they were fitted for that work or not. I agree with the gentleman that we ought to be careful as to appropriations; but I remember the chairman of the great Appropriations Committee in the last session of Congress, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], came on this floor and made a very sensible speech with reference to appropriations in war times. And among other things, as I remember it, he said that we could not scrutinize too closely items in appropriation bills for war purposes. I think that is true.

I think that the Appropriations Committee very wisely scrutinizes these bills that come before them. I have not a word of complaint for them doing that, because I think they are right and that we ought to cut down expenses just as far as possible to do. But we all realize that we are in war, and nobody denies, I think, that you can not make contracts now as you make them in ordinary times for supplies for all the Government. That is an impossibility. The Appropriations Committee, as careful as they are, no doubt have great difficulty in cutting them down as closely as they would like to do, and yet for fear they may cripple the war activities they do not cut them as close, possibly, as their judgment leads them to think should be done.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman, I think, did not understand me. What I intended to convey was this: This bill provides for plants to be constructed within such boundaries for the production of toluol. Now, what I did ask the gentleman was how much it was proposed to use of this $175,000,000 for the construction of these plants. Col. McRoberts, who has charge of the procurement of these things, says when we have these plants constructed, one for by-products from coke ovens, and then taking from the big gas plants in New York 40,000 gallons alone, we will have all we can use to furnish requirements abroad.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say to the gentleman that if you are going to extract toluol and benzol, that come from a part of coke and coal and production of gas, I do not think it would be possible for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any other committee, to tell anything definite as to what could be done or what would be done in the construction of plants. We do not know whether there will be any or not, but they want to give the right to the President to do that if he thinks best for the carrying on of this war. And, it seems to me, there is nobody connected with the Government whom we have a better right to believe would carry this work on in an economical way and see that the money was properly expended than the President of the United States.

Mr. GOOD. No doubt about the President, but the gentleman knows——

Mr. FOSTER. If he determines, in his judgment, it is necessary to construct a plant for the production of any of these substances he would do it, but it would be impossible to determine beforehand how much of it was to be done.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. There are seven minutes remaining.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have two minutes. I do not know who has the other five.

Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to call the attention of the committee, and especially the attention of the chairman of the committee, to the language on the bottom of page 14, in line 26, namely, "to be available during the time this act is in effect." In other words, that $175,000,000—and I was sure that I had read it somewhere in the bill—was available, just as I said it was.

Mr. SIMS. There is no question about it, but a report is to be made annually.

Mr. SISSON. I understand; but the report would not stop this appropriation. But here is what I am afraid of. I am afraid you gentlemen have run this clause in which makes it unconstitutional, if I may mention that document here. With your permission, however, I would like to mention that instrument, which used to be a sacred one.

Now, among the powers granted to Congress is the power to raise and support armies, but it is provided in the Constitution that "no appropriation of money for that use shall be for a longer term than two years." This bill, of course, is for the purpose of supporting the Army. It is an indefinite period that is described here, "during the time this act is in effect." Turning back to this other section of the bill, which makes it in effect for five years, or six months after the war is over, that might cause your whole bill to fall within the condemnation of that section of the Constitution.

Mr. SIMS. This amendment, like several others, was put in against my judgment.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman that he would have easier sailing for his bill if he would merely make authorization of these amounts and then permit the Committee on Appropriations to go carefully into this organization and supply the appropriation. Here is what you are going to do: You are going to fix the status of salaries under this organization, and that status will be fixed and unchangeable, because the gentleman knows the impossibility of cutting down excessive salaries when they are once fixed. I feel that it ought to be done in the proper way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I believe we have a right to use the language in the proposed amendment, beginning with section 2, and that we have the right to make an appropriation, not merely to make an authorization. The powers of the Committee on Interstate Commerce on such matters are as follows: In matters of appropriations for the Life Saving Service and the Coast Guard Service we can only authorize, but in certain other respects we can appropriate, and we have exercised that power in several bills heretofore passed. I need only call attention to the fact that in the trading-with-the-enemy act we provide in section 15—

That the sum of $450,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be used in the discretion of the President for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918—

And so forth. Nobody questioned the right of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when we asked the indorsement of that section at the time the bill was pending before the House. Again, in the bill for the control of railroads, in section 6, we provide:

That the sum of $500,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which, together with any funds available from any operating income of said carriers, may be used by the President as a revolving fund for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Federal control, and, so far as necessary, the amount of just compensation, and to provide terminals, motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment, such terminals, motive power, cars, and equipment to be used and accounted for as the President may direct and to be disposed of as Congress may hereafter by law provide.

So that in that respect the authority and power of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to make appropriations was not questioned. In this instance we asked for an appropriation of $175,000,000 to carry out the purposes of this bill.

Now, with reference to the question brought up by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] as to the inadequacy of detailed information to justify us in making this appropriation of $175,000,000, I wish to say that the testimony taken before our committee discloses the fact that the engineers of the War Industries Board and the expert engineer of the Fuel Administration and others made an intensive survey of the entire power field of the United States. They made it by sending men to these fields, taking the amount of power that the companies said they could produce and checking that up by going to the consumers of these power plants and finding out whether their figures were justified or not. They went further than that, and even went to the individual consumers, in order to test the accuracy of their judgment as to the amount of power developed, and they gave us information as to power plants within all the regions referred to. We had their estimates, and these estimates were reduced to dollars and horsepower, so that we have these figures: They find that the power deficiency amounted to 1,233,000 horsepower. There was no guess about that. That was based upon absolute figures and not mere estimates. They found that the cost of developing 1,233,000 horsepower was $138,427,000. That, too, is not a mere estimate, but was based upon actual figures gathered upon data made in the field; so that the committee was justified in making this estimate of $175,000,000 for increase of power development, allowing a certain margin of safety.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, there was some confusion. What was the question pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The question was on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. CANNON. You strike out line 4 and part of line 5 and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 4, strike out the words "the amounts herein authorized, or that may hereafter be authorized," and insert in lieu thereof "appropriations herein or hereafter made."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SIMS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMS. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirteen gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has an amendment pending, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Page 4, line 6, after the word "made," insert "Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be expended under the cost-plus system."

Mr. SISSON. I make the point of order that the word "may" is not there; that it has been stricken out. I have no objection to the amendment being offered.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will ask the Clerk to insert it after the word "authorized."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 5, after the word "authorized," where it occurs the second time in the line, insert the following: Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be expended under the cost-plus system."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the cost-plus system, as recently used, has been a success. I believe the result of that system has been gross waste and extravagance, if not something actually worse. The cost-plus system consists in expending the vast war appropriations that are being made by selecting a contractor to do the work authorized and paying him a fee on a sliding scale for the amount that the work may cost. Our cantonments have been built on that plan, and there has been great complaint and criticism over the whole country as to the lack of success in that work and the great waste that has resulted. The Hog Island scandal is a national scandal resulting from that system. It was imperatively demanded by the country that the system should be abandoned at Hog Island, and it was abandoned accordingly, but a great waste of money had already resulted.

Other Government works over the country are yet being constructed under the cost-plus system. I have received numerous complaints and criticism of waste and graft of one kind and another regarding some of them. I have referred these matters to the proper authorities, but have been met by the answer that they are within the province of the contractor on the work and would be referred to him. Of course, the answers were polite, but absolutely nothing was accomplished. I believe, with all my soul, that a great waste of public money has resulted because of the fact that this work has not been done by the Government directly, upon its own responsibility, by its own agents, or under contract, as was the previous practice.

We are not getting results under the cost-plus system. It results in excessive waste, loss of time, and we are not getting what we pay for, what the people expect, and what they are demanding. We have spent a great part of the huge sum appropriated for aircraft production under the cost-plus system, and the results have been wholly inadequate and unsatisfactory to the country. The system has not promoted the carrying on of the war, but instead has tended to lull the people into security and delay success in what otherwise might have been accomplished.

It seems to me that the time has come when we should take some steps on the subject. The time has come when we should say that contracts shall be let where they can be let and when they can not be let that some responsible officer of the Government shall be charged with the expenditure of the money so that proper accounting may be had and safeguards be thrown around the expenditure, that the people may get value received for their money. There are so many instances of waste and extravagance that I would not have time to recount them. Grafting is not only possible but has actually occurred.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Under the suggestion of the gentleman that the Government do the work directly, has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that the Government has not the men that would be necessary or the organization to do the work?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have considered that aspect of the matter, and I want to say to the gentleman that the so-called organizations and the benefits from them that these contractors are supposed to have is largely mythical. The system has put it within the power of the subordinate agents of the bureaus and of the departments to arbitrarily select this contractor or that one, as a matter of personal favoritism, or as a boon to a friend, or possibly to participate in the profits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. As I was saying, we have had a system in vogue whereby comparatively subordinate agents of bureaus and other officials of perhaps doubtful capacity have had the arbitrary power to select contractors and expend millions of the public funds. It is charged all over the country that some of them have favored their friends, not the contractor who had the organization, as the gentleman from Texas would suggest, but men who have had no special facilities for doing the work, men who were preferred as a matter of favoritism, in order to give them an opportunity to make some money. I and other Members of Congress have had contractors from our districts come to us and say, "How can I get in touch with the war construction work? I have got the outfit, I have the means of performing my contracts, I have had the experience," and what answer can a Member of Congress make? We are bound to reply, "I do not know how you can get in touch with the work; I do not know how you will be able to convince the officer or agent that you can do the work. They give the contract to whoever they want to have it, and there is no appeal from the decision." Necessarily the results are unsatisfactory, as I stated.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I am quite interested in what the gentleman said and agree with him, but can the gentleman give the House and the country some estimate as to how many millions or billions have been lost in the cost-plus system contracts?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Since there is no adequate system of accounting, since no examination of accounts is made public, since it is not possible to more than guess or speculate on what the losses may be, I am exceedingly loath to answer the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And since lump-sum appropriations are made out of which the expenditures are made?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Lump-sum appropriations without proper estimates, without accurate figures, as criticized by the gentleman from Mississippi, and well criticized, so it is impossible to estimate what the losses are and what the waste has been and what it must be in the future.

Mr. SNELL. I entirely agree with what the gentleman has said, but I understood we had abolished the cost-plus system of letting contracts some little time ago. Are we still following it up?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We are still following it in some cases within my own knowledge. I happen to know that in my own section of the country we have a great work being constructed at Muscle Shoals. Many millions, I do not how much, has been expended and I do not know how much more will be expended and I do not think anyone connected with the Government has any idea how much is going to be expended there. In that instance the work is let to contractors. One of the contractors is the J. G. White Engineering Co., and just the other day I received from one of my constituents a detailed complaint as to a certain considerable waste that was going on there. He had worked there and he was shocked at the waste going on and he made this complaint to me and I forwarded it to the proper official and was notified, most courteously I must say, that the matter had been referred to the contractor and no doubt he would be pleased to give it very careful consideration.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I was only going to suggest that $45,000,000 was the amount intended to be spent and probably the amount will be much more than that?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Maybe the amount will be much greater. We have no fair idea and nobody can tell what will happen if this system continues to be followed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that we still make contracts by which the contractors are paid on a percentage basis now?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. REED. What percentage does that run?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is on a sliding scale, dependent upon the cost of the work, the larger the expenditure the smaller the percentage.

Mr. REED. And it is to the advantage of the contractor to have as large an expenditure as possible?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is always to his advantage to have the largest expenditure possible.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman permit this question? I think there is a great deal to be complained of in reference to the cost-plus system, but on account of the changes of wages that are occurring all over the country constantly and the advance of other material, would it not be very difficult for the contractor to bid within a comparatively reasonable amount on one of these large contracts?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why, it would be hard to do if he made a bid as it was according to the previous system, but to do the work directly under the supervision of the Government would not be difficult.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the very reason the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] gives is the reason why this work ought to be done under the direct supervision of the Government itself. There are rapid fluctuations in the prices of material and changes in the cost of labor all over the country, and we find the extraordinary and amazing spectacle of the Government, through its separate agencies and contractors, bidding on material, carrying it higher and higher, because these agencies of the Government are not coordinated. We find the Government taking labor and material by higher bidding to one plant over from another plant that needs it just as badly, and prices go on, on up like a spiral. There can be no end to this foolish self-competition unless there is coordination under proper governmental direction.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Was the contractor to whom your communication was referred the contractor whom your correspondent claims was guilty of waste?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The waste was going on as a result of the system.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman stated his communication was referred to this very contractor who was guilty.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Under whose supervision this waste had gone on.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And who himself was guilty of the waste?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I took down the name of a man—I do not care to mention just who it was—who told me the other day, who has a big contract with the Government, that he was compelled by the overseers of the work to spend a large amount of money that he wanted to save and could have saved on that work, but they did not permit him to do so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say to the gentleman I have known men to quit work, some of my own constituents, to quit the service of these contractors because they were not going to stay where waste or "stealing," as they expressed it, from their Government was going on. They refused to be a party to it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and any amendment thereto to the first paragraph of section 2 close in five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Then I will ask that debate on this amendment and all other amendments to it close in 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not prefer that request just now. This is a very important matter. If we can spend 10 or 20 minutes here in discussing the matter that will save millions of money, I think we ought to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope he will not prefer the request at this time.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman want to occupy five minutes?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think I will.

Mr. SIMS. Then I will ask to close debate in 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. SIMS. My request is that all debate on the first paragraph of section 2—that is, on the committee amendment—close in 15 minutes. We have already had 12 minutes' debate on it.

Mr. CANNON. That leaves paragraph 1, that has not been read yet.

Mr. SIMS. That is correct. I ask that further debate on this portion of the first paragraph of section 2 close in 15 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, pending the statement of that request, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] be reported again. I understand that it is an important amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Of course that will be done.

Mr. SLOAN. Have it done now.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have it voted out or voted in. Why discuss it?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentlemen are in favor of the amendment, why not vote on it?

Mr. SLOAN. Let it be voted on.

Mr. SISSON. I demand the regular order, Mr. Chairman. For the present I have the floor.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman does not object to voting on the amendment reported if it does not come out of his time?

Mr. SISSON. I can state what is in the amendment. The amendment is that no money under this bill shall be expended under the cost-plus contract system. Now, what I want to say in defense of the administration is that at the beginning of all the contracts time was absolutely essential and necessary, and it was vital. Now, I raised the first objection in this House to the 10 per cent-plus contract system on the rifle contracts. I never believed that the 10 per cent-plus contract would result in anything except that which has followed—an enormous increase in the price of labor, an enormous increase in the price of material, and the only way to be sure to make a great deal of money is for the contractor to make his expenses just as heavy as possible. I objected to it, and, if you recall, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and I had quite a little colloquy on the floor. I brought that question to the attention of the House, and the House, notwithstanding their knowledge of the 10 per cent plus in reference to rifle contracts and cantonment contracts, voted the money, without in any way interfering with the 10 per cent plus. And this has to be said in reference to the cantonments, that the contract was made with the Secretary of War, and if you will look at the amount of money made by the contractors you will find that no contractor made over $250,000 on any one cantonment.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is not that enough?

Mr. SISSON. I understand that under the provision without change by the Secretary of War, in some instances it would have been more than $1,000,000.

Mr. REED. And nothing in the act of Congress provided for the cost-plus system?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely not; but Congress had the opportunity to say that none of the money should be expended under the cost-plus system.

Mr. FOCHT. Who was the patentee of this proposition?

Mr. SISSON. The fact is that it originated with the officers of the War Department and with the Chief of the General Staff, who was most anxious to get ready as quickly as possible; and I want to say that no man can hold, although it has been a most expensive project, an expensive experiment, that the War Department has not made good, so far as the preparations are concerned, under this 10 per cent plus. No man can say that it has not been efficient in so far as results are concerned. I do not defend the amount of money that has been expended in many instances; but in view of the fact that a few days, a few weeks, a month or two, means much to this country, it is justified, and I think the results of Gen. Pershing and what he has accomplished within a little over a year on the battle fields of France, on the far-flung battle line there, will justify the results of these gentlemen. And no man on the other side is able to criticize in the name of that flag and in the name of liberty. I do not justify all the expenditures, and I do not believe the criticisms are always just concerning this system, but I myself opposed it at the very beginning, in the subcommittee, and in the full committee, and on the floor of this House. I did not think the system was a wise one; but at the same time Congress voted it. I believe the thing to do now at the very outset of this bill is to put the gentleman's amendment on before they shall have entered into any contracts of any kind or character. I am just now where I was at the outset, and I believe the amendment is a good one and ought to have been put on earlier.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. The fact can not be disputed that millions upon millions of dollars have been wasted under the system under which the Government has proceeded. The gentleman from Mississippi said it was necessary to inaugurate this system——

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas (continuing). Because it was necessary to hurry up the work.

Mr. SISSON. I did not justify it. I did not agree with the system at the beginning, but I said that was the justification.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understood the gentleman to justify it because of the necessity for hurrying the work.

Mr. SISSON. That was the justification made by the War Department.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a brief question.

Mr. MOON. It has been stated by several gentlemen and repeated by the gentleman from Kansas a moment ago that hundreds of millions of dollars had been wasted under this system.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Or worse than wasted.

Mr. MOON. Do you not think it would be proper, if you intend to justify that statement, that you give the names of the gentlemen who have wasted that money on these contracts?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I refer the gentleman to every contract that has been carried out on the cost-plus basis. I want to illustrate.

Mr. MOON. What the gentleman says is not definite.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] said it was necessary to hurry up. As a matter of fact, under this system public works have been delayed—purposely delayed—in order to add to the cost of constructing the cantonments or whatever work it was that was under way, in order to increase the cost.

Now, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], let me say that I know of this incident that can be multiplied in every place where work has been done on the cost-plus basis. In room 33 of a street, the name of which I have forgotten, in Camp Funston, a captain's room was already plumbed for the steam radiator to be set. It was a work that would take a plumber's helper or a couple of boys about 15 minutes. The captain said he walked up and down in front of that room for three days, with two plumbers employed at $16 a day each, and three helpers, while they were setting a radiator of four stands.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That he became impatient about it and urged them to hurry up. They would set it up and then take it down, and set it up and take it down again, and would send out for another wrench or something, and then come back and do something else; and finally the captain went to his colonel and said he protested as an American citizen, not as an officer, against the waste of time and money that was going on there by these plumbers—that had been going on at that cantonment with the direct knowledge of the contractor and with his evident assent.

Mr. MOON. Of course, the gentleman heard that. He knows nothing about it personally.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I know the captain who gave me that information, and I know he would not misrepresent the facts.

Mr. MOON. But that is only hearsay. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I know that right here, within the shadow of this Capitol, laborers were not permitted to work more than two hours a day while they were being paid for eight hours a day.

Mr. MOON. I want to ask the gentleman this, if the gentleman will permit me a moment——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I had that information from the laborers themselves, and they quit because they did not want to see the Government's money wasted in that way.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman may be correct about both of those instances, and if he is, it is a bad state of facts, but in a small way.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, it multiplies into millions of dollars.

Mr. MOON. It may not amount to more than a few hundred dollars.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman must take time in his own right. He can not take up my time to make a stump speech.

Mr. MOON. We do not call that a stump speech down my way.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The fact is that the premises laid down by the gentleman are absolutely true. There has been waste. Millions have been wasted, and millions more will be wasted if this is not stopped. The country was given to understand six weeks ago that contracts under the cost-plus system were to be stopped, when the wastage or worse than waste that was going on at Hog Island was called to the attention of the country. Then the tension of the country was eased up by the statement from the War Department that there would be no more contracts on the cost-plus basis. But it was stated here this afternoon that contracts were still being made on that basis, and that work is still going on on the cost-plus basis.

That may account for what a Senator stated recently. He said he saw from a window of his office, within 50 feet of him, a carpenter carrying a plank forward and backward for two hours without doing anything. He watched that carpenter and saw that for hours and hours he did absolutely nothing except move lumber around from one place to another, getting no results. These things have been going on under the direct orders of the superintendent and the boss. Why? In order to increase the cost, so that the percentage of profit would be higher to the contractor.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Would the gentleman mind giving the name of the Senator who saw that carpenter carrying a plank backward and forward for two hours?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If the gentleman will read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he will find it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, some question was raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] as to whether it was possible at the time when the war broke out to let these contracts under any other system than that which is commonly known as the cost-plus system, and objection is sometimes made even at this time to a discontinuance of the cost-plus system on the ground that in cases where haste is needed, in cases of great emergency, it is necessary. As a matter of fact, the English have found—and I think some of our own departments have found—that it is not necessary to use this system at any time or under any circumstances. The profit system that ought to have been used from the start was one that fixed the profit of the contractor, with the provision that if the cost exceeded the reasonable amount fixed, his profit could be cut down accordingly, but if, on the contrary, the cost was less than the reasonable amount provided for, the profit should increase. Now, this system is had generally in England under cases where the contractor does not want to assume entire responsibility for the cost, and therefore makes an ordinary contract to do the work for a certain amount. And under this system he has every incentive to make the work cost as little as possible, his desire all the time being that a reasonable cost should not be increased, whereas under the cost-plus system the inducement is just the opposite.

Mr. SISSON. I will state that the system in England is the system in effect now in the Navy in reference to most of the ship construction.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman is correct in reference to the situation under the Navy contracts, but we still have the cost-plus system being used in the Army to a certain extent. I want to say, however, that certain branches of the Army have abolished it and use the system somewhat as I have described. Under this system it is impossible that graft and waste should go on as in the cost-plus system, where the inducements are so strong that they can not be avoided.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has said he would like to have the gentleman from Kansas tell the names of the parties who are indulging in graft through the cost-plus system, and he wants to know the amount which the Government has lost by such contracts. I say that it does not very well become gentlemen on the other side to propound that question when they have all the time been against any proposition which would permit Congress to find out how much has been lost or how much the Government has been defrauded. I have been proposing from the start, from the very opening of the war, the time the first bond bill was presented to this House, to have such accounting. I offered an amendment providing for a general congressional committee to audit these expenses, a joint committee of the House and Senate, to find out where the money was spent and how it was spent. My recollection is at that time practically every gentleman on that side of the House voted against it. I think some have changed their opinion since. The same proposition has been brought forward in many forms by Republican Members, but always rejected. On the motion of a Republican Senator, it was put on a bill that came from that body, but was rejected in conference. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] renewed it the other day when we brought in the new revenue bill, and his amendment was met by a point of order and ruled out. Whenever we have tried to bring it out we have been met with a determined opposition.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is there no means whereby the legislative branch of the Government can know what has been done with the money which has been appropriated for the use of the Government; is not there any way we can have a bill of particulars?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Apparently not; as things stand, there is no way. We have been trying for a long time.

Mr. SLOAN. There is a method—get a majority on this side.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Nebraska is correct. That would bring it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Under existing conditions are not the departments under obligation to make a report of any kind, so that the people can know what has been done with their money?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say that in a large number of cases the department has refused to give out the terms of the contract and the prices. At one time early in the war I went to a department and sought to inquire about the prices charged on contracts that were let, and they responded that they were not giving out that information. Of course, Congress or this House or a committee could request information of that kind and would probably get it. But as the political situation stands now, could the gentleman expect any such action as that to get through?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Another question: Are not the departments required to keep records of these transactions—the details of them?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, when was the time closed?

Mr. SIMS. At the end of 15 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I asked for the regular order and then proceeded with my remarks. I spoke for five minutes, and there has nothing occurred as to closing debate since.

Mr. SIMS. I asked unanimous consent to close debate in 15 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I make the point of order that all debate has been closed under the rule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is not in order. The time was limited and all time has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask that the Reporter's notes be referred to; I have no recollection of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair, but he is informed by the Clerk that the request was made and agreed to without objection.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. My recollection is as stated by the gentleman from Mississippi, that the request that debate close in 15 minutes was made, but the gentleman from Mississippi proceeded with his statement, and there was no agreement.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I was in the chair, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asked unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. At the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who wanted 5 minutes, it was made 15 minutes. I put the question if there was objection, and I am not responsible if Members did not hear it; they were probably making so much noise that they did not, but there was no objection, and the Chairman so announced.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I accept the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by substituting the word "amount" for "appropriation."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the modification will be agreed to, and the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 5, after the word "authorized," where it appears the second time in the line, insert "Provided, That no part of said amount shall be expended under the cost-plus system."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(1) To construct at any place or places within the boundaries of the United States such power plant or power plants as he may deem necessary, and in connection therewith to construct within such boundaries plants for the production of gas, coke, toluol, benzol, coal-tar products, and any other useful products that may be produced through or in connection with the coking of coal or lignite, or through or in connection with the combustion of any fuel.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert after the word "construct," in line 7, the words "during the war period."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 7, after the word "construct" insert the words "during the war period."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, would it not be better to say "during the period of the war"? That is the language used.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I think "war period" is defined in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. "During the period of the war," I think, is used in several places. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman look at lines 19, 20, and 21, page 13, where it says:

Except as is herein otherwise provided all other authority granted to the President by the provisions of this act shall cease at the termination of the war period.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am familiar with that provision, and yet, it seems to me, I am not sure that it would distinctly carry this particular item, but if it does not, there is no harm in having it in. I want it specifically stated in reference to this authority.

Mr. SIMS. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment. It conforms to the whole purpose of the bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 9, after the word "necessary," insert "for the purpose of increasing production of war material or meeting emergencies arising from war conditions."

Mr. SNELL. This amendment is simply in harmony and along the line of the same amendment we have adopted on top of page 3, and as far as I know I do not believe there is any special objection to it on the part of the members of the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think this paragraph ought to be amended in another particular. Just before the word "lignite"—I have not a copy of the bill in my hand—the word "carbonizing," I think should be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 13, after the word "or" and before the word "lignite," insert the word "carbonizing."

Mr. CANNON. Where is lignite produced?

Mr. HAMLIN. Principally in North Dakota. It is estimated there is a trillion tons of lignite in the country. The main body is in North Dakota, some in Arkansas, some little in western Minnesota, and some in Colorado.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, my objection to this amendment is that there is much of the bituminous coal that is not available for coking. I have known many experiments to be tried. I think in the neighborhood of my colleague's district, Doc. FOSTER's district, or southern Illinois, in central Illinois, the successful coking of coal does not very far reach west, I believe, of Ohio.

Mr. FOSTER. They do in Harrisburg and throughout that section.

Mr. CANNON. Harrisburg, where?

Mr. FOSTER. Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. There is some of it that is a high order of bituminous coal. Now, here is a proposition to start off with $175,000,000, first with authority to the President to requisition or commandeer any or all private plants or power anywhere in the United States, to build plants anywhere. Now, what is the use when there is much bituminous coal that is not available for coke to go and spend money on lignite coal away out half way across the continent?

If we are to use coking coal for these various by-products it ought to be nearer to transportation where it would have to be used first, and, second, I doubt if lignite can be successfully used for by-products. We are spending enough money, God knows, and I am willing to spend all that is necessary. If this war lasts a year beyond the close of this fiscal year, with our great taxation, the debt of the United States will mount up until the cost has been from $120,000,000,000 up. Now, that is my objection to the lignite proposition. I would like to strike out the word "lignite."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I was just going to suggest the gentleman's objection is not to the amendment I have offered, but to lignite. My amendment deals with the treatment you have to give lignite. You can not coke it; it would have to be carbonized if you treat lignite at all.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know how it carbonizes; I do not know that it can be done commercially or not, but this is war; we have got to support those in the Army, and we have got to support the Navy, and we have got to pay all the expenses, and in God's name let us not try useless experiments. We have enough to carry as it is in the shape of taxation and incurring the great indebtedness, and we will carry it to the end until success crowns the efforts of our people cooperating with our allies; but let us not do unnecessary things that may amount to large sums and are not war measures.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just a word in reply. I think the gentleman from Illinois is not, as he said awhile ago, very well posted upon the situation, so far as lignites go. I do not possess a great deal of information, but I have had occasion to investigate this matter in the committee of which I am a member. One of the prime necessities in the prosecution of this war is coal, as we all realize. It is very fresh and painful in the memory of the men of this House that a number of our ships were tied up at the wharves for the lack of coal within the last 12 months.

They could not convey troops or the necessaries for them overseas. They could not get the railroad cars to transport the coal. All of those things are liable to confront us again at any time. Now, there are in North Dakota large fields, almost inexhaustible we are told, of lignite, that is not, in its raw state, of very great commercial value. It must be treated. It must be carbonized and briquetted. In the process of briquetting that lignite you carbonize it, and get, in the form of briquets, a quality of fuel almost equal to anthracite coal in heating units, and in that treatment you get a lot of by-products, such as tar, oils, and gas.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman state what the process of carbonizing is?

Mr. HAMLIN. I could in a general way, but it would take some considerable time. The Bureau of Mines has experimented, and they have a process of heating it in ovens and extracting from the raw lignite these by-products, and that leaves the pure carbon. And they have a process to tie together, with some tying material in the way of straw or tar, the carbon, and then mold it into briquets, and ship it all over the country.

Now, then, they have even gone so far as to experiment, and know, so they say, that they can give it this treatment and put it on the cars at $4.50 a ton, with a heating capacity about equal to anthracite coal. But at the same time that whole country has now got to have coal shipped to it at an average of 1,000 miles, which requires a large number of cars. From that standpoint alone it is worth everything, it seems to me, to this Government, in these times when we need coal and the cars, to make available this lignite.

But I do not understand that to be the purpose of this bill. But where the Government is building power plants, or if there is a power plant there now and the Government extends it or takes it over, if they should have lignite there and should use lignite, let them carbonize it and use the by-products and the carbon for fuel. You can not coke it; and that is the only reason I wanted to put in the word "carbonize"—to carbonize the lignite and use the carbon for fuel. It does not interfere with the coking of the coal in the gentleman's State. It may avoid the necessity of shipping a lot of Illinois coal out to North Dakota. It may do that. But if it does, it is a blessed thing, and the gentleman will have plenty of market for his coal and it will relieve these cars and give those people out there fuel right at home.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. There is no lignite in the vicinity of any of these power plants, is there?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know where the power plants are to be located.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. These lignite deposits are principally in North Dakota, western Minnesota, and perhaps some in Montana, and down in Texas and Arkansas, and there may be some power plants near a deposit of lignite in some of these sections.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. If all this can be done successfully, as the gentleman has so eloquently described, why has not somebody with private capital developed the industry?

Mr. HAMLIN. Private capital has gone into it to a certain extent, and in connection with the University of North Dakota there is an experimental plant in the process of operation. But it is a situation such as we get frequently, where the Government has got to lead. It requires scientific treatment, and the Government must lead in the experiment.

Mr. CANNON. As a war measure?

Mr. HAMLIN. As a war measure, undoubtedly; anything that increases the fuel supply of this country and releases transportation in these times of congestion undoubtedly is a war measure.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have an illustration of that in the potash situation out in Nebraska. The high price of potash makes it possible to develop the potash industry out there, which was formerly monopolized by Germany. It would not be possible at all unless it were for this war necessity, which has increased the price. It makes it possible to develop that industry when it could not be done otherwise.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes. Let us take coal as an illustration, that we all must buy. I can not understand it, but I know that I burn in my furnace at home a certain kind of coal, semi-anthracite, that I have bought everey yar, and I have bought it before the war period began, laid down at my home, at $5.50 and $5.60 per ton. This year I paid $9 a ton for the same coal. Now, anything that will enable us to increase the coal supply and release the cars necessary to transport it is undoubtedly a benefit to the prosecution of this war.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would like the gentleman to explain what is meant by carbonizing.

Mr. HAMLIN. I did explain it before. I am not scientist enough to particularize or use the technical terms in regard to it, but I said that the State of North Dakota had put in a plant for the treatment of the raw lignite so as to extract from it certain elements as by-products. Of course, the gentleman knows—but perhaps others do not know—that when you take the lignite out of the ground and it is exposed to the air it dissolves and disintegrates and will ignite spontaneously, and they can not ship it any considerable distance in its raw condition. If you burn it at all, you must burn it immediately after taking it out of the ground.

Now, they have got a process of treating this lignite as soon as it is brought out of the ground and extracting from it these by-products, which leaves the natural carbon, and they have learned to take it now and mold it into briquettes for fuel, and they test it and find that it equals anthracite in heating qualities, and after they have done that they can put it on board the car at $4.50 a ton. Now, if that can be done in a commercial way, it will be one of the best things that could be done in this country in solving the fuel problem.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. This seems like a proposition to put the United States Government into an experiment. If the gentleman's statement is true—that they can make these briquettes for $4.50 a ton, and that such high prices are paid for coal—why should the Government go into the experiment? Why could not private capital carry it on?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania gets a wrong impression from what I said. I am only speaking of what I think will be the great benefit that would come from the Government inducing private capital to go into this by pointing out the way; inducing private capital to go into this business. But, as I said awhile ago, I do not understand that to be the purpose of this bill. The purpose of this bill is, if the Government takes over a power plant anywhere near one of these lignite coal fields, to give them the right to carbonize it and treat it and get out the by-products and use the actual real carbon that is in the coal for fuel purposes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Another question, if the gentleman please: Reading over the report on this bill, it seems that none of the districts where the so-called great shortage of power exists, which this bill proposes to supply, are located near or within reasonable distance of the fields of lignite to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. HAMLIN. That may be true. If that is so, no harm is done. But I take it for granted that there are some power plants in Arkansas and Texas.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There are certain qualities of coal in Colorado which are supplied to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad system in Nebraska. That is a quality of coal that can not be coked, but it is heavily charged with lignite and can be used in these power plants.

Mr. HAMLIN. Some of the railroads have special engines adapted so that they can use lignite, and they are burning it now, but they can only use those engines close to the field where the lignite is mined, because they can not ship this lignite in its raw form. They have to use it as soon as it is taken out. But it lies close to the surface, and it is estimated that there are a trillion tons of it in the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not just now in an experimental way, an experiment on a small scale, and North Dakota has put up some kind of a plant? If she could make her own coal at home, she could cut off this great expense.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is true; and I say to the gentleman that this bill does not contemplate going into the business of experimenting out there for the purpose of carbonizing lignite.

Mr. CANNON. Why? There is the power.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not to do that. This bill only gives authority to do it in connection with the production of power to produce certain war materials. Now, if one of these power plants should be located near one of these lignite fields, it would give them the power to carbonize this lignite and extract the by-products.

Mr. CANNON. And the Government could build a power plant for that express purpose?

Mr. HAMLIN. Not for that express purpose.

Mr. CANNON. For power and for experiment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not believe they could, but I believe it would be a good thing, and a blessing to the country.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think there are some corporations that have contracts at Minneapolis and they might be able to do it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] goes not to the provisions of this bill, but to the provisions of the bill which the Committee on Mines and Mining has unanimously approved and which will be reported to the House.

This provision, to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] offers an amendment, is the provision which will authorize the construction of power plants, and in connection therewith the construction of such plants as may be necessary to utilize the by-products in certain cases. The word "lignite" must come along with coal, because one-third of the coal of the United States is lignite. Lignite is just nothing but coal at one stage. The deposits of lignite in the Dakotas and in Texas and in southern Arkansas are sometimes isolated by themselves, it is true, but the bill that will be reported will go beyond the experimental laboratory stage and will undertake to put up a plant to demonstrate that the carbonizing of lignite and the briquetting of the carbon and the utilization of the by-products are commercially profitable. If the laboratory experiments show that it is a success, the carbonizing of lignite coal and the utilization of the by-products would make this country independent of Germany, so far as the dye industry is concerned. There is no dispute about that and no question about it, and Germany's great control of dyes is in part due to the fact that she has utilized and developed her great lignite fields and utilized the by-products of lignite.

But suppose they get to constructing a plant under this bill and you have lignite along with the coal; if you authorize them to use power produced by gas from coking coal they ought to be permitted to use the gas and other by-products from carbonizing the lignite.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman state that there are lignite fields in Germany?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; and she has developed it to the greatest extent, and thereby added to her economic strength and wealth. I will say that that is not a haphazard opinion of mine. For the last three nights I have been going over the literature available for the purpose of making a report on the lignite bill. At first I laughed at it and scoffed at it, but I was forced to acknowledge my error. I was amazed at the possibilities of developing and utilizing this great resource.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WINGO. Yes.
Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Have not we had for several years coal-tar products out of which we might have competed with Germany if we had had the formulæ, and has not Germany had the advantage of us in that particular?
Mr. WINGO. Yes; and we have developed several along that line; but it is too technical a proposition for a nontechnical man like myself to go into. It is somewhat clear to me, but I could not express myself, because I can not call to mind the technical terms. I have mastered enough by my study, although a nonexpert, to satisfy me when I had read the opinions, dissertations, and arguments of the expert chemists.
Mr. EAGLE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WINGO. Yes.
Mr. EAGLE. Is it not true that the lignite formation in Germany, on account of the age in which it was laid down, and similar deposits of lignite in Texas and the small deposits in North Dakota, on account of the difference in the age at which they were deposited, that a chemical process perfected by a German scientist for the extract of by-products would not at all be a successful formula for Texas, or one for Texas would not be successful in North Dakota?
Mr. WINGO. Yes. The lignite is a formation between peat and coal. The formula which proved successful in carbonization in Germany may not be suited to our lignite, on account of certain elements in it, and their process can not be used on ours. There have been conducted laboratory experiments on a small scale, and very small experiments in North Dakota, a private experiment, by a gentleman by the name of Babcock. If gentlemen would read the literature that I have of these experiments they would become enthusiastic over the commercial possibilities from the standpoint of building up the economic strength of the United States.
In Texas alone it would utilize the power that will save over the present power $15,000,000 a year. From each ton of lignite you get 10,000 cubic feet of gas, 15 pounds sulphate of ammonia, and oils of different kind. From these you get asperin, picric acid, alizarin, a necessary dye acid; also aniline dye and carbolineum and other products we now have to import.
Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman let me suggest that the gas they will get out of this process of carbonizing lignite will furnish all the power wanted.
Mr. WINGO. Yes; and there will be gas for household purposes.
Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Ordinarily does not lignite lie rather near the surface?
Mr. WINGO. As a rule it does.
Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose this amendment. Mr. Chairman, originally the coking of coal in this country was done by what is known as the beehive open ovens, and the largest part of it is still done in that way. That is, the coal was put in ovens; the smoke, gas, and carbon and heat in that process are blown out into the open air. Recently—and I live in the coke region—they have abandoned entirely the beehive-oven process of coking coal. They now coke all coal under modern conditions in what are known as closed ovens or by-product ovens, either the Otto Huffman oven or the Koppers process, in which all the smoke, heat, gas, and carbon, and all the by-products are caught and saved; and from these are extracted tar, toluol, and by-products, and all of the fundamental basic colors from which the dyes are extracted and manufactured. Now, I see no reason why we should put in this bill a provision for experimenting in peat or in lignite, which is an imperfect form of coal, coal that was not geologically completed in the process of nature in the making by heat, which was not healed in with the earth and compressed and subjected to great heat, converting it into coal, because our anthracite coal is merely coal made under great heat and great pressure. Our bituminous and semibituminous coal is coal not perfected by great pressure and heat. We have in this country an abundant supply of coal from which we can extract by our modern coke ovens these dyes and by-products used in making explosives and all the basic material for making dyes we need, and we do not want to embark the United States Government into spending this war money that we are collecting from the people to carry on this war in experimenting in making dyes and extracting by-products from lignite or peat.
Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROBBINS. I will.
Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I entirely agree with the gentleman, and propose to move later to strike out all this. I understood from the gentleman that a good deal of the coke is still being extracted under the old oven process, and that if they were remodeled we could produce more in this country than we could possibly use.
Mr. ROBBINS. Yes. Just this year, in the month of April, the United States Steel Corporation put in operation near the city of McKeesport, on the Monongahela River, where there is cheap water transportation, in the midst of the great, rich bituminous coal fields of western Pennsylvania, a plant consisting of a thousand of these by-product ovens, every one of which would have been constructed before except for the great cost of the construction. They cost from twenty to thirty thousand dollars each, whereas the beehive oven costs less than one thousand. There is also at Glassport, on the Monongahela River, a coke plant owned by another corporation, from which they are extracting these by products, and they have established at Donora, 8 miles up the Monongahela River, a plant for manufacturing high explosive materials, and have created within the year a large amount of high explosive material for the United States Government which is being used now in the manufacture of high explosives for this war.
Now, we have demonstrated a success, a success that could only be carried on by the investment of capital of a great company like the United States Steel Co. It is a very great success, and I was up there two weeks ago to-morrow, and I went through that plant for the purpose of learning something about it, and I was told by those in connection with it—because it is a highly technical process—that they were now making sufficient of these materials to supply the Government's need of these high explosives, for the present at least. Then why go into the process of experimenting with lignites at this time and spend the money we are getting by the sale of war stamps and Government bonds to carry on this war, by experimenting with lignite, when we have these established industries which take these by-products out of the rich bituminous coal, from which they can extract these in great abundance and at a reasonable cost?
Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROBBINS. I do.
Mr. WINGO. What lighting gas do we get out of this coal?
Mr. ROBBINS. We do not get gas out of anthracite coal.
Mr. WINGO. The coal you do coke.
Mr. ROBBINS. We do not coke anthracite coal; we coke bituminous coal.
Mr. WINGO. What lighting gas do we get both from anthracite and bituminous coking coal?
Mr. ROBBINS. You will not get any gas from anthracite coal.
Mr. WINGO. I understood the gentleman had been arguing here that you had all the commercial plants that produce the by-products——
Mr. ROBBINS. Not from anthracite coal, from bituminous coal.
Mr. WINGO. What particular lighting gas do we get from coking bituminous coal?
Mr. ROBBINS. The character of gas that burns right here in the city of Washington is manufactured from this coal which is shipped here from my native county of Westmoreland in Pennsylvania.
Mr. WINGO. What oils do you get out of it?
Mr. ROBBINS. I am frank to say I am in the same category the gentleman was a moment ago, I can not tell——
Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not mean to say you are carbonizing——
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. ROBBINS. I will ask for two minutes.
Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all general debate on this amendment close, if the gentleman has finished his remarks, in two minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. WINGO. The gentleman did not catch my question. The gentleman does not pretend to say anywhere in your State there is now a commercial plant that carbonizes lignite?
Mr. ROBBINS. No.
Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman name one in the United States?
Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know of any; I think they are all experimental.
Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman say that the experiments which have been conducted do not demonstrate it is a wise thing to undertake to establish a commercial plant?
Mr. ROBBINS. For carbonizing?
Mr. WINGO. For the carbonizing of lignite and the utilization of its by-products?
Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know enough about it to answer that question intelligently. I will say this: There is now such an abundance of dye materials and other by-products extracted from the bituminous coal in western Pennsylvania, in its three or four great plants to which I have alluded, that there is no necessity of going into the experimentation of trying to extract it from lignite at this time.

Mr. WINGO. How are you going to get these out to the Dakotas?

Mr. ROBBINS. It is not necessary to take it to the Dakotas.

Mr. WINGO. How are they going to get it out there; they have to get it; they import a lot of things from Canada now——

Mr. ROBBINS. The by-products of this plant at Glassport were taken in tank cars, one car marked "acid" and another marked "tar," another "oil," and taken to the factory at Donora and there converted into various products used by the United States Government in the manufacture of high explosives.

Mr. WINGO. I am speaking of the gas and fuels which are needed in the Dakotas and everywhere else.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gas is piped into the city of McKeesport and used under the boilers of these plants, because all the fuel they use is extracted right out of the coal in the shape of gas and piped under the boilers, and the whole process is carried on in that way. Everything is saved.

Mr. WINGO. McKeesport is not in the Northwest or in the Southwest.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is in a location where the coal is found which is used to carry on this enterprise because it is in a coal field.

Mr. WINGO. Would the gentleman object to the development of lignite like your coal has been developed?

Mr. ROBBINS. I would have no objection. But this is not the time to spend the money we collect by war-savings stamps for experimenting in the treatment of lignites for by-products.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If western Pennsylvania had lignite instead of the coal, would he make the same argument?

Mr. ROBBINS. I would. It is not an argument born from any selfishness of mine because I happen to live in western Pennsylvania. I am making this statement to inform the committee at first hand, at least so far as I know, what is the right course to pursue in this matter as I see it, and it is not to experiment now, but to take an accepted fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I think there may be an omission of one word. May we have it read again?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAMLIN: Page 4, line 13, after the word "or," insert "carbonizing."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, perhaps I ought to modify the amendment, making it read "carbonizing of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read the modified amendment, as follows:

Page 4, line 13, after the word "or," insert the words "carbonizing of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. It is subject to amendment yet. I want to move to strike out the words "or lignite," in line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 4, line 13, strike out the words "or lignite."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say only a word.

I have already said perhaps all that I ought to say about this matter. One gentleman who spoke here, and spoke with much power, said that he was preparing a report for the Committee on Mines and Mining, of which he was a member, to carefully guide it in its development—a peace measure and not a war measure. There is not any question on earth but what, so far as the use of coal is concerned, it and all of its by-products are amply provided for. There is no question on earth but that it may go beyond the experimental stage in the lignite fields and prove a commercial success, but it can not during the pendency of this war.

You are now writing a report for the Committee on Mines and Mining to take this up as a peace measure and the committee is almost ready to report to the House. Well, when the bill comes as a peace measure, no doubt the House will consider it, and then there will be ample time to give it full consideration.

The only reason I make this motion to strike out the words "or lignite" is that I do not want it in this war bill, with the debts we have and the taxation that we have, which will be doubled, if the war lasts, and more too, at the end of the coming fiscal year—that is, the fiscal year after this. This is a war measure, and let us keep it a war measure.

That is all I want to say.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] offers a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa, as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 4, line 9, after the word "necessary," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I not only agree with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said, but I want to go considerably further. There is not, to my mind, a shadow of excuse for any of the remainder of this paragraph being enacted in this bill. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, as if there were some persons lying awake nights, with wheels running around in their heads, to see how they can devise schemes to spend the money of this Government by the millions at a time when the country is staggering under the load of an $8,000,000,000 tax bill and when it will be compelled to expend $24,000,000,000 to $34,000,000,000 next year—nearer $30,000,000,000 than $24,000,000,000, I believe.

How are you going to get the lignite out of the mines? You can not get it out. There are no miners or workmen to spare in the regions where it is found. So far as coke is concerned, there are coke ovens enough if you could get miners sufficient to get the coal out to put in the coke ovens. And, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] has already stated, there is an abundance of ovens to make all the toluol, the high explosives, and the coal tar that you need. And if those modern, improved ovens will not make what is necessary, although my understanding is that the Government is being completely supplied with all it needs at this time, then there are thousands more coke ovens that are not fitted with the modern process, and the gas and the tar and the toluol and all those products are being wasted that might come from these ovens. It is not necessary for the Government to construct any more ovens. Private capital will construct them if the Government will buy what is now going to waste.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to my friend.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman does not mean what he says here in his amendment. You propose to leave in the bill the proposition to construct at any place or places within the boundaries of the United States such power plant or power plants as may be deemed necessary. If you strike out the balance, you will go on and construct these plants and generate the power and waste absolutely all the by-products that come from it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, what is the gentleman thinking of? Does not the gentleman know that these by-products are being wasted now?

Mr. HAMLIN. Ought they to be wasted?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know. Not if there is any use for them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Why not save them, then?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If you have any use for them, it would be well to save them; but you have not any use for them. The Government is getting all these materials it wants now. Why not let the Government get them where it can obtain them cheapest.

Mr. HAMLIN. We have been importing millions of dollars' worth of these by-products every year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. It is not necessary for the Government to construct these ovens. Private capital will construct them if the Government will purchase these by-products.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The ground is being broken for that plant, and it is being built from the beginning, showing that the Government does need the toluol.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The trouble is, you want to use the Government's money all the time when you ought to use private capital. Private capital will construct all these ovens that are necessary. Why should we take, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] says, the money derived from the sale of liberty bonds and saving stamps to construct these ovens?

Gentlemen have already shown that a Government officer testified that there was no shortage of toluol. If there was a proper hearing and investigation of this matter, the provision attacked by my amendment would be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. They lost $25,000 apiece on the by-product ovens.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present. This has been a very interesting and busy day.

Mr. SIMS. Will not the gentleman allow me to move to close debate at a particular paragraph? I want to make that request.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not withdraw my point now.

Mr. SIMS. The Chair has not yet acted upon it.

Mr. MADDEN. The Chair does not have to act upon it. It is for the committee to act.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman from Illinois ought to withdraw his point. We ought to run until 17 minutes past 5.

Mr. MADDEN. It is 15 minutes past 5 now. This is a very important bill, and it ought to be given careful consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-nine gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARNER, as Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12776) to provide further for the national security and defense and for the more effective prosecution of the war by furnishing means for the better utilization of the existing sources of electrical and mechanical power and for the development of new sources of such power, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BESHLIN, for one week, on account of illness in his family;

To Mr. LARSEN, for 15 days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. KITCHIN, for four days, on account of illness.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. GILLETT. Will not the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, in some of the press reports of some remarks which I made last Saturday it was stated that the Speaker, Mr. CLARK, had voted against the declaration of war. That was a mistake. It was my fault, and as he did not vote against the declaration of war I wish to state the fact here publicly. I think anybody who heard my whole speech or read it in the RECORD will appreciate the fact that I made no reflection at all upon the loyalty and patriotism of any Member of this House, least of all against the Speaker, who has given to the service of the country a life which he values more than his own. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE rose.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from South Carolina wanted one minute. I do not know for what purpose.

JUDGMENT OF COURTS.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as to when it is his purpose to report out the bill H. R. 12472?

Mr. SIMS. What is it about? Judgments of courts?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. My purpose is to report every bill just as soon as I can get the committee to act upon it, and to give the preference to war measures.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Now, the situation is this: This bill was introduced on June 14. Judgment was obtained against the railroad, and the suit was filed before the Government took over this property. It appears affirmatively in the record that the property is not being used for transportation purposes, and yet the Director General is absolutely preventing any levy on the property, is protecting the corporation interests and the stockholders against certain laborers who are entitled to some hearing and some relief. I would like to know whether the American Congress is going to leave these powers to be exercised as they now are by the Director General.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On July 12, 1918:

H. J. Res. 313. Joint resolution providing for the disposition of moneys represented in the Alfred Bernard Nobel peace prize awarded in 1906; and

H. R. 10021. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county commissioners of Trumbull County, Ohio, to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio.

On August 31, 1918:

H. J. Res. 324. Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government for the month of September, 1918, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11692. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes;

H. R. 12704. An act to authorize the importation without the payment of duty of sundry articles for the American National Red Cross to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or its allies, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or of its allies; and

H. R. 12731. An act amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the military establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ROBBINS requested leave of absence for four days, on account of important business.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to give notice that hereafter, until this bill is concluded, I shall object to any requests for leave of absence on important business. I would not object on account of illness in the family. I do not object to the present request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Engineer Department of the Army for the prevention of deposits in New York Harbor, fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1306); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Navy Department and Naval Establishment for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1307); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Postmaster General submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for increases in salaries of certain classes of employees of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1308); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting draft of bill amending the fiftieth article of war, relating to mitigation or remission of sentences (H. Doc. No. 1309); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. LUNN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12834) providing increased pay for cadets of the Military Academy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 818), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2205) to transfer Frederick W. Cobb from the list of chief machinists, United States Navy, to the list of chief pay clerks, United States Navy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 817), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 13014) authorizing certain decorations and insignia for persons serving in the Navy and Coast Guard; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 13015) to amend so much of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," approved July 9, 1918, as provides for "longevity pay for men other than the Regular Army"; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13016) to amend so much of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," approved July 9, 1918, as provides for "longevity pay for men other than the Regular Army"; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 13019) to authorize the purchase by the city of Myrtle Point, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. RUCKER: Resolution (H. Res. 438) providing for the consideration of Senate bill 3438, entitled "An act to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress"; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. GILLETT: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 333) to aid in combating the disease known as Spanish influenza; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 13017) for the relief of David Housel; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 13018) granting a pension to Kate Smith Richardson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MANSFIELD: A bill (H. R. 13020) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain money to A. May, late postmaster at Yoakum, Tex.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OVERMYER: A bill (H. R. 13021) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Yeagle; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SINNOTT: A bill (H. R. 13022) granting an increase of pension to Francis M. Humphrey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. VESTAL: A bill (H. R. 13023) for the relief of John T. Adams; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts: Telegram of Eugene R. Kelley, commissioner of health of Massachusetts, for congressional action calling for Government assistance for emergency service of 500 doctors and 1,000 nurses to arrest influenza-pneumonia now prevailing to an alarming extent throughout the State; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RAKER: Letter from Fred J. Crittenden, Truckee, Cal., in re tax on medicated alcohol proposed in the revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petitions in favor of House bill 152, the minimum-wage bill, by the following: F. Flaherty, secretary of the American Federation of Postal Employees; Miss Agnes Nestor, Washington, D. C.; Federal Employees' Union, No. 76, Vallejo, Cal.; Alfred Barrydessa, secretary Federal Employees' Union, No. 1, San Francisco, Cal.; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. SLOAN: Petition of Hon. F. E. Edgerton and 53 others in behalf of legislation to place chiropractic on plane with osteopathy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, September 28, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou who didst command the light to shine out of darkness hast shined into our hearts to give the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Thou hast set before us the perfect life. Thou dost lure us on by all of the appeal of the beautiful and good that was in Him who went about doing good. We pray for His Spirit—His Spirit so gracious, so tender, so forgiving, so earnest in its zeal and advocacy of right and justice and truth. Grant to endue us with this Spirit for the duties of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore assumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, and was interrupted by Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. LODGE. I think the reading had better be completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal, and it was approved.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS IN NEW YORK (S. DOC. NO. 283).

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the speech of President Wilson which was delivered in New York yesterday be printed in the RECORD. I regard it as one of the strongest messages ever delivered. It is an inspiration to every man who loves liberty and humanity.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to amend the request by asking that it be made a public document as well as printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is perfectly acceptable. I move that a million copies of it be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection at all, but I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the address be read. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

"My fellow citizens, I am not here to promote the loan. That will be done—ably and enthusiastically done—by the hundreds of thousands of loyal and tireless men and women who have undertaken to present it to you and to our fellow citizens throughout the country; and I have not the least doubt of their complete success, for I know their spirit and the spirit of the country. My confidence is confirmed, too, by the thoughtful and experienced cooperation of the bankers here and everywhere, who are lending their invaluable aid and guidance. I have come, rather, to seek an opportunity to present to you some thoughts which I trust will serve to give you, in perhaps fuller measure than before, a vivid sense of the great issues involved, in order that you may appreciate and accept with added enthusiasm the grave significance of the duty of supporting the Government by your men and your means to the utmost point of sacrifice and self-denial. No man or woman who has really taken in what this war means can hesitate to give to the very limit of what they have, and it is my mission here to-night to try to make it clear once more what the war really means. You will need no other stimulation or reminder of your duty.

WAR OF PEOPLES.

"At every turn of the war we gain fresh consciousness of what we mean to accomplish by it. When our hope and expectation are most excited we think more definitely than before of the issues that hang upon it and of the purposes which must be realized by means of it. For it has positive and well-defined purposes which we did not determine and which we can not alter. No statesman or assembly created them; no statesman or assembly can alter them. They have arisen out of the very nature and circumstances of the war. The most that statesmen or assemblies can do is to carry them out or be false to them. They were perhaps not clear at the outset, but they are clear now. The war has lasted more than four years and the whole world has been drawn into it. The common will of mankind has been substituted for the particular purposes of individual States. Individual statesmen may have started the conflict, but neither they nor their opponents can stop it as they please. It has become a people's war, and peoples of all sorts and races, of every degree of power and variety of fortune, are involved in its sweeping processes of change and settlement. We came into it when its character had become fully defined and it was plain that no nation could stand apart or be indifferent to its outcome. Its challenge drove to the heart of everything we cared for and lived for. The voice of the war had become clear and gripped our hearts. Our brothers from many lands, as well as our own murdered dead under the sea, were calling to us, and we responded, fiercely and of course.

ISSUES OF THE WAR.

"The air was clear about us. We saw things in their full, convincing proportions as they were, and we have seen them with steady eyes and unchanging comprehension ever since. We accepted the issues of the war as facts, not as any group of men either here or elsewhere had defined them, and we can accept no outcome which does not squarely meet and settle them. Those issues are these:

"Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force?

"Shall strong nations be free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and interest?

"Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force or by their own will and choice?

"Shall there be a common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations or shall the strong do as they will and the weak suffer without redress?

"Shall the assertion of right be haphazarded and by casual alliance or shall there be a common concert to oblige the observance of common rights?

WEAK MUST BE PROTECTED.

"No man, no group of men, chose these to be the issues of the struggle. They are the issues of it, and they must be settled—by no arrangement or compromise or adjustment of interests, but definitely and once for all and with a full and unequivocal acceptance of the principle that the interest of the weakest is as sacred as the interest of the strongest.

"This is what we mean when we speak of a permanent peace, if we speak sincerely, intelligently, and with a real knowledge and comprehension of the matter we deal with.

"We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the governments of the central empires, because we have dealt with them already and have seen them deal with other governments that they were parties to this struggle, at Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest. They have convinced us that they are without honor and do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principle but force and their own interest. We can not 'come to terms' with them. They have made it impossible. The German people must by this time be fully aware that we can not accept the word of those who forced this war upon us. We do not think the same thoughts or speak the same language of agreement.

NO PEACE BY COMPROMISE.

"It is of capital importance that we should also be explicitly agreed that no peace shall be obtained by any kind of compromise or abatement of the principles we have avowed as the principles for which we are fighting. There should exist no doubt about that. I am, therefore, going to take the liberty of speaking with the utmost frankness about the practical implications that are involved in it.

"If it be in deed and in truth the common object of the Governments associated against Germany and of the nations whom they govern, as I believe it to be, to achieve by the coming settlements a secure and lasting peace, it will be necessary that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure it, and ready and willing, also, to create in some virile fashion the only instrumentality by which it can be made certain that the agreements of the peace will be honored and fulfilled.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS ESSENTIAL.

"That price is impartial justice in every item of the settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed; and not only impartial justice, but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with. That indispensable instrumentality is a league of nations formed under covenants that will be efficacious. Without such an instrumentality, by which the peace of the world can be guaranteed, peace will rest in part upon the word of outlaws and only upon that word. For Germany will have to redeem her character, not by what happens at the peace table but by what follows.

"And, as I see it, the constitution of that league of nations and the clear definition of its objects must be a part, is in a sense the most essential part, of the peace settlement itself. It can not be formed now. If formed now, it would be merely a new alliance confined to the nations associated against a common enemy. It is not likely that it could be formed after the settlement. It is necessary to guarantee the peace; and the peace can not be guaranteed as an afterthought. The reason, to speak in plain terms again, why it must be guaranteed is that there will be parties to the peace whose promises have proved untrustworthy, and means must be found in connection with the peace settlement itself to remove that source of insecurity. It would be folly to leave the guarantee to the subsequent voluntary action of the governments we have seen destroy Russia and deceive Roumania.

BASIS FOR LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"But these general terms do not disclose the whole matter. Some details are needed to make them sound less like a thesis and more like a practical program. These, then, are some of the particulars, and I state them with the greater confidence because I can state them authoritatively as representing this Government's interpretation of its own duty with regard to peace:

"First. The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standard but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned.

"Second. No special or separate interest of any single nation or any group of nations can be made the basis of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all.

"Third. There can be no leagues or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the league of nations.

"Fourth. And more specifically, there can be no special, selfish, economic combinations within the league and no employment or any form of economic boycott or exclusion except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the league of nations itself as a means of discipline and control.

"Fifth. All international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world.

NO ECONOMIC WARFARE.

"Special alliances and economic rivalries and hostilities have been the prolific source in the modern world of the plans and passions that produce war. It would be an insincere as well as insecure peace that did not exclude them in definite and binding terms.

"The confidence with which I venture to speak for our people in these matters does not spring from our traditions merely, and the well-known principles of international action which we have always professed and followed. In the same sentence in which I say that the United States will enter into no special arrangements or understandings with particular nations, let me say also that the United States is prepared to assume its full share of responsibility for the maintenance of the common covenants and understandings upon which peace must henceforth rest. We still read Washington's immortal warning against 'entangling alliances' with full comprehension and an answering purpose. But only special and limited alliances entangle, and we recognize and accept the duty of a new day in which we are permitted to hope for a general alliance which will avoid entanglements and clear the air of the world for common understandings and the maintenance of common rights.

PLAIN SPEAKING NEEDED.

"I have made this analysis of the international situation which the war has created, not, of course, because I doubted whether the leaders of the great nations and peoples with whom we are associated were of the same mind and entertained a like purpose, but because the air every now and again gets darkened by mists and groundless doubtings and mischievous perversions of counsel, and it is necessary once and again to sweep all the irresponsible talk about peace intrigues and weakening morale and doubtful purpose on the part of those in authority utterly, and if need be unceremoniously, aside, and say things in the plainest words that can be found, even when it is only to say over again what has been said before quite as plainly if in less unvarnished terms.

"As I have said, neither I nor any other man in governmental authority created or gave form to the issues of this war. I have simply responded to them with such vision as I could command. But I have responded gladly and with a resolution that has grown warmer and more confident as the issues have grown clearer and clearer. It is now plain that they are issues which no man can pervert unless it be willfully. I am bound to fight for them, and happy to fight for them, as time and circumstance have revealed them to me as to all the world. Our enthusiasm for them grows more and more irresistible as they stand out in more and more vivid and unmistakable outline.

WORLD OPINION CLARIFIED.

"And the forces that fight for them draw into closer and closer array, organize their millions into more and more unconquerable might, as they become more and more distinct to the thought and purpose of the peoples engaged. It is the peculiarity of this great war that while statesmen have seemed to cast about for definitions of their purpose and have sometimes seemed to shift their ground and their point of view, the thought of the mass of men, whom statesmen are supposed to instruct and lead, has grown more and more unclouded, more and more certain of what it is that they are fighting for. National purposes have fallen more and more into the background and the common purpose of enlightened mankind has taken their place. The counsels of plain men have become on all hands more simple and straightforward and more unified than the counsels of sophisticated men of affairs, who still retain the impression that they are playing a game of power and playing for high stakes. That is why I have said that this is a peoples' war, not a statesman's. Statesmen must follow the clarified common thought or be broken.

NEED TO AVOW AIMS.

"I take that to be the significance of the fact that assemblies and associations of many kinds made up of plain workaday people have demanded, almost every time they came together, and are still demanding that the leaders of their governments declare to them plainly what it is, exactly what it is, that they were seeking in this war, and what they think the items of the final settlement should be. They are not yet satisfied with what they have been told. They still seem to fear that they are getting what they ask for only in statesmen's terms—only in the terms of territorial arrangements and divisions of power, and not in terms of broad-visioned justice and mercy and peace and the satisfaction of those deep-seated longings of oppressed and distracted men and women and enslaved peoples that seem to them the only things worth fighting a war for that engulfs the world. Perhaps statesmen have not always recognized this changed aspect of the whole world of policy and action. Perhaps they have not always spoken in direct reply to the questions asked because they did not know how searching those questions were and what sort of answers they demanded.

VICTORIES WINNING PEACE.

"But I for one am glad to attempt the answer again and again, in the hope that I may make it clearer and clearer that my one thought is to satisfy those who struggle in the ranks and are, perhaps above all others, entitled to a reply whose meaning no one can have any excuse for misunderstanding, if he understands the language in which it is spoken or can get some one to translate it correctly into his own. And I believe that the leaders of the governments with which we are associated will speak, as they have occasion, as plainly as I have tried to speak. I hope that they will feel free to say whether they think that I am in any degree mistaken in my interpretation of the issues involved or in my purpose with regard to the means by which a satisfactory settlement of those issues may be obtained. Unity of purpose and of counsel are as imperatively necessary in this war as was unity of command in the battle field; and with perfect unity of purpose and counsel will come assurance of complete victory. It can be had in no other way. 'Peace drives' can be effectively neutralized and silenced only by showing that every victory of the nations associated against Germany brings the nations nearer the sort of peace which will bring security and reassurance to all peoples and make the recurrance of another such struggle of pitiless force and bloodshed forever impossible, and that nothing else can. Germany is constantly intimating the 'terms' she will accept; and always finds that the world does not want terms. It wishes the final triumph of justice and fair dealing."

Mr. FLETCHER subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to inquire what became of the motion or request made with reference to the President's address?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). It was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and also as a public document. Of course, the reading to the Senate would put it in the RECORD, anyway.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] made some suggestion about 1,000,000 copies being printed. I did not know whether that had been acted on or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair heard the Senator from Colorado say something about a million copies, but, in the opinion of the Chair, the Senate took no action upon the request.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well. It can be presented at another time.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Ward 17 Massachusetts Suffrage Association, of Boston, Mass., and a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Cotton Spinners' Union, of Maynard, Mass., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry textile workers in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation establishing an eight-hour day for all industrial employees, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the Waterman-Waterbury Co., of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed excess-profits tax in the pending revenue bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry citizens of St. Paul, Minn., praying that section 213 of the pending revenue bill be amended so as to provide that the proceeds of all life-insurance policies be payable at death of the insured, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a memorial of the women voters antisuffrage party of New York, remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed Federal suffrage amendment to the Constitution, which was ordered to lie on the table.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 198, and I call the attention of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 198, submitted by Mr. FLETCHER on February 4, 1918, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $120 per month, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, until the end of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, on line 3, before the words "per month," to strike out "$120" and insert "$100."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 4964) for the payment of claims for loss of private property on account of the loss of firearms and ammunition taken by the United States troops during the labor strikes in the State of Colorado in 1914; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 4965) granting pensions to certain soldiers and widows of deceased soldiers of the Utah Territorial Militia who served in the Indian wars in Utah Territory, and to amend the act approved March 4, 1917, entitled, "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 4966) to authorize the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge over and across the headwaters of Mobile Bay and such navigable channels as are between the east side of the bay and Blakeley Island, in Baldwin and Mobile Counties, Ala.; to the Committee on Commerce.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS IN NEW YORK (S. DOC. NO. 283).

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 23), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the address of the President of the United States delivered at the fourth liberty loan meeting in New York City on September 27, 1918, be printed as a public document, and that 1,000,000 additional copies be printed for distribution by the Publicity Bureau, Liberty Loan Division of the Treasury Department.

COMMITTEE ON REORGANIZATION.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 22), which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee on reorganization is hereby authorized and created to be composed of six Senators and six Representatives in Congress, fairly representative of the Democratic and Republican Parties, to be nominated by the party organizations of the two Houses and approved by the respective Houses; service upon such committee to terminate if a member ceases to be a Member of Congress. Vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as the original selections were made, respectively.

That such committee shall make an immediate investigation and report to Congress not later than January 1, 1919, and from time to time subsequently, with suitable recommendations upon the reorganizations required for a return to the occupations of peace of the men and women, capital investments and supplies now employed in war.

It shall be the duty of such committee to propose the ways and means by which the soldiers of the United States and those directly or indirectly employed in making war, both men and women, or engaged in any of the activities connected with war, shall be found employment; to prepare and assist in restoring the activities of peace; to make concrete proposals for the utilization of the materials, buildings, and supplies which have been prepared for war purposes, but which may be used for the service of the country in times of peace.

To propose methods by which the capital, credit, and labor of the American people after the war may be actively employed in production and distribution of goods at home and abroad, the supply and distribution of raw materials and food products arranged to that end; to report upon the construction of national hard-surfaced roads throughout the United States; building of internal and coastal canals, reclaiming and cultivation of swamp lands and arid lands, utilizing water powers, and the permanent maintenance of the American merchant marine, and in general to report upon those problems arising from the change from the activities of war to those of peace, so that all the productive activities of the American shall be continuously and profitably employed.

That the committee is authorized to employ such clerical assistance as it may deem necessary, including the services of experts, and may, as subcommittee or otherwise, send for persons or papers, administer oaths, and employ stenographers at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, and report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject before it.

That the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate and House of Representatives, and that expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House, upon the presentation of vouchers, approved by the chairman of said committee, until otherwise provided for by law.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	New	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Hardwick	Nugent	Smoot
Benet	Henderson	Overman	Thomas
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Thompson
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Colt	Kellogg	Penrose	Trammell
Culberson	King	Phelan	Underwood
Cummins	Kirby	Pittman	Vardaman
Curtis	Lenroot	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Lewis	Pomerene	Walsh
Drew	Lodge	Ransdell	Warren
Fletcher	McCumber	Reed	Watson
France	McKellar	Robinson	Wilfley
Frelinghuysen	McNary	Saulsbury	Williams
Gerry	Martin, Ky.	Shafroth
Gronna	Martin, Va.	Sheppard
Gulon	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to announce the temporary absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] on account of public business.

Mr. FRANCE. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on official business as members of a conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

AFFAIRS OF HUNGARY IN 1849–1850 (S. DOC. NO. 282).

Mr. LODGE. I present a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations asking for a reprint of the document of the Sixty-first Congress, second session. It was a document which gave the correspondence of A. Dudley Mann from 1849 to 1850, which was of great historical value, and remained here in the Senate files and never had been printed. It is of a great deal of historical interest. The edition is exhausted, and there are additional requests for the document. The Secretary of State has very kindly sent in a few additional dispatches, which complete the matter. I laid it before the Foreign Relations Committee, and they instructed me to ask for a reprint, including the new letters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the request is granted.

MINERAL PRODUCTS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 281).

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on H. R. 11259.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none, and the report is before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, as one of the members of the conference committee I advise the Senate that the bill reported by the conferees is substantially the bill which passed the Senate. The amendments are unimportant. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the entire report be dispensed with and that the attention of the Senate be called only to the specific amendments.

Mr. LODGE. This is an important conference report, and it is usual to read conference reports. I only ask that it be read. I shall make no opposition to its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that objection has been made to the request. The Secretary will resume the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which, entire, is as follows:

[S. Doc. No. 281, 65th Cong., 2d sess.]

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following conference report on the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, and to the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to provide for an adequate and increased supply, to facilitate the production, and to provide for an equitable, economical, and better distribution of the following-named mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products, metals, alloys, and chemical compounds thereof, to wit: Antimony, arsenic, ball clay, bismuth, bromine, cerium, chalk, chromium, cobalt, corundum, emery, fluorspar, ferrosilicon, fuller's earth, graphite, grinding pebbles, iridium, kaolin, magnesite, manganese, mercury, mica, molybdenum, osmium, sodium, platinum, palladium, paper clay, phosphorous, potassium, pyrites, radium, sulphur, thorium, tin, titanium, tungsten, uranium, vanadium, and zirconium, as the President may, from time to time, determine to be necessary for the purposes aforesaid, and as to which there is at the time of such determination, a present or prospective inadequacy of supply. The aforesaid substance mentioned in any such determination are hereinafter referred to as necessaries.

"SEC. 2. That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase such necessaries and to enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign contracts for the production or purchase of same, to provide storage facilities for and store the same, to provide or improve transportation facilities, and to use, distribute, or allocate said necessaries, or to sell the same at reasonable prices, but such sales made during the war shall not be at a price less than the purchase or cost of production thereof: Provided, That no such contract of purchase shall cover a period longer than two years after the termination of the war.

"The President is further authorized, upon finding that importation into the United States of any of the necessaries covered by this act is likely to result in a loss to the United States on any necessaries which it may have acquired hereunder, to ascertain, fix, and proclaim such rate of duty upon such imported necessaries as shall be sufficient to adequately protect the United States from any such loss.

"The funds provided by section 6 hereof shall be used in carrying out the powers granted by this section, and all moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal of such necessaries, shall be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this act. Any balance of such moneys remaining when the object of this act has been accomplished, shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to requisition and take over any of said necessaries and to use, distribute, allocate, or sell the same; and also to requisition and take over any undeveloped or insufficiently developed or operated idle land, deposit, or mine, and any idle or partially operated smelter, or plant, or part thereof, producing or, in his judgment, capable of producing said necessaries, or either of them, and to develop and operate such mine or deposit or such smelter or plant, either through the agencies hereinafter mentioned, or under lease or royalty agreement, or in any other manner, and to store, use, distribute, allocate, or sell the products thereof: Provided, That no ores or metals, the principal money value of which consists in metals or minerals other than those specifically enumerated in section 1 hereof, shall be subject to requisition under the provisions of this act. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, so acquired, is no longer essential for the objects aforesaid, the same shall be returned to the person, firm, or corporation entitled thereto. The United States shall make just compensation, determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, or operation by the Government of any such necessaries, or any such land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof. If the compensation so determined be unsatisfactory to the person, firm, or corporation entitled thereto, such person, firm, or corporation shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145, of the Judicial Code.

"The President is authorized to require statements and reports, to examine books and papers, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem appropriate for carrying out the purposes of this act. The fund provided by section 6 hereof may be used in carrying out the purposes of this act, and all moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the use, operation, or disposal of any such necessaries, land, deposit, mine, smelter or plant, or part thereof, shall be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this act. Any balance of such moneys remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished, shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 4. That any person who shall neglect or refuse to comply with any order or requisition made by the President pursuant to the provisions of this act, or who shall obstruct or attempt to obstruct the enforcement of or the compliance with any such requisition or order, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or any rule or regulation adopted hereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 5. That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1919, for the payment of all administrative expenses under this act, including personal services, traveling and subsistence expenses, the payment of rent, the purchase of equipment, supplies, postage, printing, publications, and such other articles, both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential and proper.

"SEC. 6. That the sum of $50,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which, together with all moneys received from time to time under the provisions of this act, all of which shall be credited to said appropriation, shall be used as a revolving fund for carrying out the objects of this act, and for the purpose of making all payments and disbursements, including just compensation under section 3, by this act authorized: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purposes described in the last preceding section: Provided further, That a detailed report of all operations under this act, including all receipts and disbursements, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 25th day of each month, covering the preceding month's operation. Any balance of said revolving fund remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished, shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 7. That the President is authorized to exercise each, every, or any power and authority hereby vested in him, and to expend the moneys herein appropriated or provided for, or any part or parts thereof, by and through such officer or officers, department or departments, board or boards, agent, agents, or agencies as he shall create or designate, from time to time, for the purpose. He may fix the reasonable compensation for the performance of such services, but no official or employee of the United States shall receive any additional compensation for such services except as now permitted by law: Provided, That no person employed under the provisions of this act shall be paid any salary or compensation in excess of that paid for similar or like services rendered in executive departments of the Government.

"SEC. 8. No person having a pecuniary interest in any transaction in pursuance of this act shall have any official connection under this act with such transaction. Any person violating this provision shall forfeit to the Government all proceeds which he shall have received from such transaction, and upon due conviction of such violation shall be fined not exceeding $10,000 or imprisoned not exceeding 10 years.

"SEC. 9. That the President is authorized, if in his judgment such action be necessary or useful for the objects of this act, to form one or more corporations under the laws of any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, for the purpose of carrying out the powers or any of the powers hereby authorized. The capital stock of any such corporation shall be such as the President may determine, but the total capital stock for all corporations so formed shall not exceed in the aggregate the appropriation of $50,000,000, made by section 6 hereof. Said appropriation, or any part thereof, may be used by the President in subscribing on behalf of the United States, through such person or persons as he may designate, to the capital stock of such corporation or corporations, and the capital and assets of any such corporation or corporations, together with all additions thereto under sections 2 and 3 hereof, may be used in carrying out the objects of this act. The directorate and organization of such corporation or corporations shall be such as the President may prescribe, and such corporation or corporations shall have all such charter powers as may be deemed necessary or desirable by the President to enable it or them to accomplish the objects of this act. The capital stock of any such corporation or corporations shall be held and voted for the exclusive benefit of the United States, through such person or persons as the President may designate.

"SEC. 10. Upon the proclamation of peace the President shall proceed as rapidly as possible to wind up and terminate all transactions under this act, and to dispose as fast as practicable of all property acquired thereunder, and after said proclamation of peace no contracts shall be made, property acquired, or other transaction performed under this act except such as shall be necessary for the purpose of this section and incidental thereto, and two years after such proclamation of peace this act shall cease to have effect and all powers conferred thereby shall end: Provided, That the termination of this act shall not prevent the subsequent collection of any moneys due the United States, nor shall it affect any act done or any right or obligation accrued or accruing, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced before such termination, but all such collections, rights, obligations, suits and proceedings shall continue as if this act had not terminated, and any offense committed or liability incurred prior thereto shall be prosecuted in the same manner and with the same punishment and effect as if this act had not terminated.

"SEC. 11. That employment under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any person from military service under the provisions of the selective-draft law approved May 18, 1917, or any act amendatory thereto.

"SEC. 12. That if any section or provision of this act shall be declared invalid for any reason whatsoever, such invalidity shall not be construed to affect the validity of any other section or provision thereof."

And the Senate agree to the same.

CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
T. J. WALSH,
MILES POINDEXTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
M. D. FOSTER,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
M. M. GARLAND,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will report the first business on the calendar.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) to appropriate $3,000,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prosecute the work of eradicating the southern cattle tick was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. ASHURST. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 53) authorizing the President to appoint two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, and for other purposes, was announced as the next business on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent, if we are going to take up bills on the calendar, that we begin where we left off when we were last considering the calendar, with Order of Business 364.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that in proceeding with the calendar under Rule VIII bills be taken up under that rule to commence with Order of Business 364.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Kellogg	Overman	Smoot
Benet	Kenyon	Owen	Sterling
Brandegee	King	Page	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kirby	Penrose	Townsend
Colt	Knox	Phelan	Trammell
Curtis	Lenroot	Pittman	Underwood
Drew	Lewis	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lodge	Reed	Walsh
France	McKellar	Shafroth	Warren
Frelinghuysen	McNary	Sheppard	Watson
Hale	Martin, Ky.	Shields	Wilfley
Hardwick	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Henderson	Nelson	Smith, Md.	Wolcott

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to announce the temporary absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] on public business.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] necessarily on public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

COAL SITUATION IN ITALY.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, Charles Edward Russell, who recently returned from Italy, has called attention to the extremely urgent need of Italy for coal. I was informed by some representatives of the Italians in this country that they had actually been driven to cutting down olive trees, which require 20 years to bear profitably, as a means of supplying fuel for the engines to move, at a time of great exigency, some of the troops to the battle front. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the very great importance of giving support in the way of coal to Italy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator permit the Chair to suggest that the Senate, by unanimous consent, has agreed to proceed with the calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. OWEN. I beg the Chair's pardon. I did not know that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma can make his remarks if he will allow the Chair to lay the next business on the calendar before the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be pleased to have the matter laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next business on the calendar.

BULGARIA AND TURKEY.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. Res. 229) to request the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred S. J. Res. 145, to give said resolution early consideration, and report to the Senate thereon.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the resolution be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 229), as follows:

Whereas S. J. Res. 145, to declare a state of war between the United States of America and the Governments of Bulgaria and of Turkey, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations on April 2, 1918: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is requested to give said resolution its early consideration and report thereon to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Secretary if there has been any report of the committee on that resolution?

The SECRETARY. There has not been.

Mr. OVERMAN. The present occupant of the chair (Mr. BRANDEGEE) introduced the resolution, but I think under the circumstances it had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that his recollection about the matter is that the resolution had been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, although it now appears on the calendar that it was ordered to lie over. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the resolution go over. It will go over. The Secretary will state the next business on the calendar.

CONSOLIDATION OF NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

The bill (S. 3907) to provide for the consolidation of national banking associations was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SMOOT. To enable the Senator from Oklahoma to proceed I will withdraw the request that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah withdraws his request that the bill go over so that the Senator from Oklahoma may make his remarks.

COAL SITUATION IN ITALY.

Mr. OWEN. Very well, Mr. President. Mr. Charles Edward Russell makes these observations on his return from Italy:

It is perfectly apparent that Italy ought to have, as she has deserved, the most liberal and practical support from the United States. She is at present in very sore need of coal, steel, and, to some extent, of lubricating oil. Last winter she was practically without coal, and the suffering of the people, especially in northern Italy, was very real and very great. She ought not to be compelled to go through another such winter. The normal coal supply of Italy in peace times comes from Great Britain. Great Britain this winter, for certain reasons, will be unable to supply Italy with even as much coal as she sent there last year.

URGES US TO SEND COAL.

It is of the gravest importance that the people of Italy, who have endured with wonderful fortitude far more and far worse things than we in America have ever imagined, should not be compelled to go through another such a trial. With the proper effort in this country, with only a little of this spirit of sacrifice of which the people in the other allied countries have shown so much, we ought to be able to spare for Italy enough coal to enable her to get through the winter. Already many of her munition works are closing down because of the lack of fuel.

At best the shell supply in Italy has never been what it ought to be. If now it is to be still further curtailed, conditions will arise, familiar to every military observer, that will have disturbing possibilities. We can meet this emergency, and we ought to do it. We ought to begin to do it at once, and not stop until we are assured that Italy has the coal, the steel, and the oil necessary to enable her to keep up her magnificent and most efficient struggle on behalf of the common cause.

I strongly emphasize and approve the recommendations of Mr. Russell, which are based on well-known facts and approved by those who understand and appreciate the conditions on the Italian and Balkan battle fronts.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the break through the Bulgarian line, the separation of the Bulgarian Armies, and the advance which has now been made 75 miles north of Monastir by allied troops in conjunction with those of Italy has been largely due to the energy and the magnificent courage of the Italian troops. The probabilities are that the breakdown of Bulgaria will cut a most important figure in bringing this war to an earlier termination. Bulgaria has already offered an armistice, showing that her authorities are very much demoralized.

We are turning out ships every day; we are turning out freight ships on a large scale. We can, by making an extra effort, fill some of these cargo ships with coal and thus supply

Italy. I think that the morale of Italy is involved in being furnished the coal which is necessary in carrying on the munition factories. I make this observation because I think the attention of the country ought to be called to the need of Italy and to our failure in some respects to adequately respond to it. It is true that, so far as the Italian purchases from the United States are concerned, the United States has extended credit to Italy, not, however, to the same extent as we have extended it to Great Britain. At one time, because of the failure adequately to support Italy's credit in this country by extending financial accommodations, Italian exchange went down to the enormously disproportionate point, reaching 9.15 lire in exchange for $1, which practically meant that when the Italian bonds were sold on such a basis of exchange the American dollar was buying $2 in gold bonds at 5 per cent in Italy. That has been since very substantially reduced by the activities of the Government in taking over, as far as appeared to be practicable, the matter of foreign exchange through the establishment of an institute of exchange under the patronage of the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, so that Italian exchange has been brought down to 6.35. That, of course, is still a serious discount.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Italy has always fully met her obligations; she has never forfeited her bonds or the payment of interest on them. That country is capable of a large production of goods. They have abundant cheap labor; they have great water supplies; and because of the building up of great factories during the war—because of the war—they will have a productive capacity after the war which will be abundantly able to meet the extension of credits which might be made by the United States to Italy.

Those people are entitled to every support which the United States can give, and I think that this country ought to extend to Italy the coal supply which she needs, and ought to furnish the ships which are necessary to transport that coal, because it is vital to the manufacture of munitions of war, upon which depends the Italian war-making power in southern Austria. I heartily approve the extension of credit to Italy to the full extent of her needs. Italian credit in the United States should be immediately put on a basis equal to that of Great Britain in the United States, which is stabilized at $4.76\frac{7}{8}$ per pound sterling and is only 2 per cent below par. When the United States Government gives the same support to the Italian exchange it gives to British exchange, Italian exchange and Italian credit in the United States will come up to the same high level. The common interest of America, Great Britain, France, and Italy requires this to be done.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I move that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico moves that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Mr. BENET. Mr. President, I think it is the wise and proper course for me at this time to state my position upon the pending proposed constitutional amendment.

In the beginning I wish to correct a statement that was made, inadvertently I am sure, by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] in the speech he made on this matter some two days ago. He linked South Carolina and Mississippi, and stated that in both of those States we had a "grandfather clause" which had to do with the qualifications of electors. I do not know where the Senator secured his information, but that is a misstatement so far as South Carolina is concerned. We have no "grandfather clause" in our constitution; a man in our State now may secure all the rights of an elector either on an educational basis or on a property qualification. We have, and have always had, male suffrage in our State, and the question of female suffrage has not been agitated in South Carolina in any campaign that we have had up to this time. There are in our State a number of our foremost men and women who believe very earnestly in woman suffrage; but no campaign to enlighten the bulk of our people on this question has been had in our State, and the great majority of the people of South Carolina are not informed on the suffrage question, nor, frankly, are they interested in it.

Mr. President, coming here as an appointee to succeed a Senator who was against suffrage, coming from a State in which suffrage has not been an issue, coming from a State the senior Senator of which is opposed to the suffrage amendment and all the Representatives from which voted against the suffrage amendment in the House, a situation presented itself to me which was unusual and at the same time most far-reaching.

We have heard statements made by Senators about the attitude of the President, the leader of this country and the leader of my party, and it is known that he favors the passage of the amendment. I have heard statements made by Senators to the effect that the suffrage resolution is a war measure, and I have listened to several days of argument for further enlightenment on that particular point. I say here and now that were I convinced that suffrage was an essential war measure, or if suffrage under this amendment was to last only for the period of the war, I would unhesitatingly vote for it; but, Mr. President, feeling as I do, that a measure which in this identical form has been before the Congress since 1875—five years before I was born—can not be a war measure, having reached that conclusion, and further knowing that this is a matter which once written into our Constitution never will be taken out of it, and therefore unlike the wire-control bill, the railroad-control bill, the selective-service act, and the other war measures which my party, in conjunction with the Republican Party, has put into effect in this country, all of which measures will terminate at the end of the war, or shortly thereafter, I feel that it is my duty, representing the constituency that I do, and with the views that I have and which I shall further enlarge in a moment, to vote against the resolution.

Having reached that conclusion, it was my duty, as I take it, to relieve the suspense which has existed here as to my vote. I wish to say that both sides have made many appeals to me during the week and prior thereto. I wish to put at rest, however, any suggestion that I have been harassed unduly or that the advocates of either side have done anything in trying to secure my vote which was beyond the bounds of proper and courteous argument.

Mr. President, having stated that, it is not necessary for me to say much more; but I wish to say a few words in regard to the situation in my State and in justification of the position which I have taken. It is a hard position for a man to take who supported the President prior to the Baltimore convention, who supported him in his campaign prior to that convention and ever since, who took the stump in his behalf in South Carolina this past summer, and who has done everything in his power to uphold his hands in this war. Should I have admitted the premise that this was a war measure, the speeches that I have made and the stand that I have taken in South Carolina would unquestionably have led me to but one conclusion, namely, that I should vote for the resolution, no matter what the result might be to my State; but, Mr. President, as I stated awhile ago, I can not and do not see how the fortunes of this war are bound up in this proposed amendment, and with that belief I do not "deem it necessary," as the fifth article of the Constitution states it, to propose to the States an amendment on this subject.

I have heard Senators here pay great tribute to the way the women of America and the women of the allied countries have done their work in this war. I echo every word that they have said; but I wish to say, Senators, that in the Confederate war the women of the North did, as I am told, their full quota of the work which was necessary on that side, and I here state that no women of any country at any time in any war have ever done more than the women of the South did to sustain the cause of the Confederacy. Women have always borne their full share of war duties. If you are going to put it on that ground, then two thoughts present themselves: First, either that this resolution must pass to give suffrage to women as a reward for what they have done, or, second, in fear of what they may do if the resolution does not pass. I for one do not feel that the women of my State expect or want any reward for what they have done in this war, and I for one would not vote for this resolution if I thought any question of threat had to do with its passage.

South Carolina, along with Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and perhaps one or two other States, has a peculiar burden. It would be a piece of impertinence and presumption on my part to say to the people of Utah or to the people of California how they should manage their internal affairs. I reply that it is a piece of impertinence on their part to say to the people of South Carolina how they shall manage their State matters. We believe in my State, and I subscribe to that doctrine, that one of the fundamental rights of the sovereignty of our State is involved in this resolution—the right to prescribe the qualifications of our electors. We believe that we know better than anyone else what sort of a civilization we have got to work out there, and far better than anyone else how that civilization shall be worked out.

If the people in our State are not satisfied with our laws we can amend our constitution very readily. If the advocates of a measure are in a minority and are not satisfied with the result, then they have the redress of leaving our State. But if this constitutional amendment is adopted it will be the absolute, binding law on South Carolina for all time, no matter that the majority of her citizens now do not want it and no matter whether the majority of our citizens at any time in the future should desire to be rid of it. Once there, it is there forever.

The fact that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were adopted has nothing to do with this question. South Carolina was then in the hands of people foreign to her ideals, foreign to her hopes, foreign to her desires, and although we are set down in the Constitution as having ratified them, the people of South Carolina have never ratified those amendments in their hearts, and they believe that those amendments were forced on them by people who did not understand their situation.

Mr. President, I do not wish to go into the details of that matter. I want to say, however, that in our State we have a great deal of illiteracy; we have many whites who have never had a fair chance to get an education or to get money enough to get those things which make life worth while. There are many men and women in my State of good Anglo-Saxon stock who can not read or write. Those people are bearing the burden now of the work which was done from 1865 to 1876. In the community, Senators, in which I live, in the city of Columbia, we are paying each year interest on a bonded debt of $852,000, which was put on us in the early seventies by those then in charge of our State, and out of which we got one cheap wooden building, used as a city hall. That building burned down, and now we have nothing, and we never did have anything but that building to show for those bonds; yet the city of Columbia, not being a sovereignty, could not repudiate those bonds, fraudulent as they were, and those bonds now take $40,000 for interest out of our income each year. Had we had that $40,000 for all the years from 1874, when those bonds were first issued, to the present time, the people in my community would have been better educated and better cared for than they are now. I mention that merely by way of illustration. The fact that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are in the Constitution emphasizes the fact that when amendments are once in they are there for all time. It has been admitted here, or at least I have heard the statement made, and I have read it in the RECORD, and therefore I presume it is correct, that men on the other side of the Chamber have admitted that those constitutional amendments should not have been adopted. But once in the Constitution they can not be gotten out, and there is no power on earth that can get those amendments out of the Constitution now; and I feel that the same thing would exist about this proposed amendment.

My people believe that they have a right to say who shall vote and how a man or a woman, if they should decide for suffrage, should be qualified in order to vote. I myself believe that a sovereign State should have the right to prescribe which of her citizens should have a voice in her own government. Believing that, I believe that we would be giving up a fundamental right to adopt for all time this amendment. If my people want to adopt woman suffrage later, it is their affair. I do not now say whether I will vote for it or not. I do say that in the present state of public opinion in South Carolina and in the present state of information on the subject I would not vote for it; but just as soon as the educational situation in my State gets better and as soon as the information on this subject is more widespread, I now believe that I will vote for it, as a State measure.

Mr. President, there is nothing more that I can add to this discussion. I have never avoided an issue; I have never let my stand on any matter remain in doubt. I sat here as long as I could, hoping that some light would be thrown on the one thing that would justify me, if anything would, in voting for this measure, and that is the winning of this war. I have heard the challenge made in the debate that this amendment has nothing to do with the winning of the war, and I have not heard it refuted, nor have I heard anything but the bare statement that it had to do with the winning of the war. Such being the case, I feel that the door is closed to any doubt in my mind. The only thing that could have possibly justified me in voting for this amendment was that one thing that we all so earnestly desire.

My State has given her men, has given her support, will give her all, to win this war; but she will not give up a fundamental right of her sovereignty unless she knows that in giving it up she is doing something necessary to win the war.

Therefore, sir, I wish Senators to be in no further doubt as to my position. I feel, in taking this position, that there are many women in my State who are far better qualified to vote than many of the men who are now voting. If I had my way I would like to take the ballot away from everyone in the United States and put it back on an educational basis and nothing else; but that is out of the question, and we all know it. I know that those women in favor of suffrage in my State will help us solve our problems after this war. I know that the men who have gone oversea from my State will help us solve our problems after this war. I am thoroughly content, for my part, to leave the civilization of South Carolina where it was when our soldiers left us and when our women as Red Cross nurses and in other war service went across the sea. When they come back with their eyes opened and their hearts opened by what they have seen and learned over there I am willing and glad to take counsel with them and with them to work out our salvation.

Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama have a peculiar situation. We stand here together to-day. We have stood together before and we have gone down. I do not believe that we are going down to defeat on this measure, but if we go down we will work out our salvation, and the white race will triumph in those States just as it has always done. I do not for one moment decry what the negro has done in my country. I believe, sir, that I can say that when I was prosecuting attorney of my district the black race believed that they got a fair and square deal at my hands. I have always tried to give it to them. I believe that they are entitled to every consideration. But the people who have to work out the salvation of the South, the people who are carrying the burdens of the South to-day, are the white race, and they alone have got to work them out.

Feeling that way, and feeling further that this is a fundamental right of sovereignty which we can not give up simply because other sections of the country would like to have it, I shall vote "nay" on the proposition.

Mr. President, one word more and I am through.

So far as the party situation is concerned, I know that I would be false to every duty if I were to vote here influenced in any way by the possible benefit to my party. This is a matter of principle which rises high above any party interest or possible party defeat. I have not touched that in this discussion, nor have I touched it in my consideration of the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, after listening to the remarks just made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET] I feel it my duty to correct a statement I made of the RECORD yesterday when the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] was trying to play politics with the question before the Senate.

Yesterday the Senator from Nevada asked me this question:

> Did not the Senator from Utah know the number of votes the Democrats on this side had polled for the suffrage amendment?
>
> Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator from Utah knew that.
>
> Mr. PITTMAN. Of course the Senator from Utah knew; and the Senator from Utah knows to-day how the poll stands on the Democratic side.
>
> Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. President, I want to say that I was in error in the statement that I made yesterday. I wonder where the Senator from Nevada is now. I wonder if he now will undertake to say that the members——

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I have just sent for the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in view of the inquiry of the Senator from Utah, I suggest that he withhold his remarks until the Senator from Nevada can reach the Chamber. I have no doubt that he is accessible and will be here in just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that my remarks will be very brief.

Yesterday the Senator tried to make it appear that I in particular, and the other Republicans who favored woman suffrage, had deceived him; that they had played a trick for political purposes. Who is responsible for the change in the poll of the Democrats, made necessary by the remarks of Senator BENET? I want to say that the statement I made yesterday was based upon the word of not one Democratic Member, but a number of Democratic Members, that there were 31 votes upon that side of the Chamber for the amendment. I wish to say that I have the Democratic poll in my pocket, and as I have I now make the statements that I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My colleague [Mr. BENET] has just made a speech. I wish to suggest that while he may have been included in that poll, I was ignorant of his view from the beginning, and in justice to him I want to state that he has never said to any man until this morning where he stood on this matter, and no one had a right to count him in for it or against it.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator for the statement that he has made, and I believe it with all my heart. In fact, I have heard it stated a number of times that the Senator has never stated to a soul that he was for or against the amendment; and I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina that there is no feeling on my part against the position which his colleague has taken to-day. I simply wanted, first, to correct the statement that I made yesterday, and state that it was based directly upon the statement of the Senator from Nevada.

I did intend yesterday to answer the Senator from Nevada, but I think it is useless to do so. I think the debate that was indulged in yesterday was unfortunate, it was unwise, it was uncalled for, and it was unjust; but I was sorry yesterday that the Senator from Nevada had undertaken to drag into this question the question of politics when he knew that there was not a man on that side of the Chamber or this side of the Chamber who was in favor of the woman-suffrage amendment who had any thought of politics in his mind. I say now that if the amendment is ever carried in the Senate of the United States it will be carried upon the merits of the question and not upon the question as how politics may be affected by it.

I simply wanted to say that much, Mr. President, at this time. It is unfortunate, of course, that we have not the votes to carry this amendment. I am disappointed; yet I am quite sure that Senators are going to vote their sentiments upon this question, whether they be for it or whether they be against it, and will vote what they think to be just and right.

Mr. SHAFROTH obtained the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. In amplification of some of the observations I made to the Senate the other day on this question, I desire to call the attention of the Senate and of the country, and particularly the attention of those southern Senators who are supporting this proposition, to a recent occurrence in New York in which the people of the South are deeply interested. I read from a report of a political meeting in New York City. It appears in the New York Journal of February 27, 1918, on which date a campaign was in progress to fill a vacancy from one of the New York congressional districts in the House of Representatives.

The article reads as follows:

[From the New York Journal, Feb. 27, 1918.]

SUFFRAGE LEADER URGES "BLACKS TO BAND TOGETHER TO STRANGLE SOLID SOUTH"—MRS. HOWARD GOULD RAISES RACE ISSUE IN SPECTACULAR ATTEMPT TO SEND NEW YORK NEGRO TO CONGRESS—APPEALS TO WOMEN VOTERS AGAINST SOUTH.

Negro voters are being urged by Mrs. Howard Gould to support Reverdy C. Ransom, negro candidate for Congress. Unaccompanied by a white escort, Mrs Gould addressed a crowded negro campaign meeting in Mother Zion Church, One hundred and thirty-sixth Street, near Seventh Avenue.

With the exception of three reporters, Mrs. Gould was the only white person in the hall. She was stunningly dressed and did not seem at all embarrassed by her environment. Her automobile, which waited for her outside the church, created much interest in the neighborhood.

Mrs. Gould, who has done much agitation for woman suffrage, met Ransom in connection with other activities. She formed a high opinion of his character. When she heard he was a candidate for Congress she promised to do all she could to get votes for him. Ransom was one of the speakers at the meeting.

STANDS FOR EQUALITY.

Mrs. Gould, although she referred more than once to her southern birth and family—

And if she is proud of it I do not know that the sentiment can be reciprocal—gave expression to sentiments of equality between the white and colored races. She said:

"We call people blacks and whites now, but some day we'll call them United States Americans. On March 5 you will have a chance to help President Wilson in his fight for democracy.

"Black men are now fighting side by side with white men in the trenches. They are fighting for the world democracy. And they are fighting for the democracy of a country which at one time boasted a king whose atrocities surpassed any of those committed on black men in history."

APPEALS TO WOMEN.

This was understood to refer to the late King Leopold, uncle of the present King of the Belgians. It was received with devout cries of "Amen." In fact, many of Mrs. Gould's periods were greeted with audible approval of a camp-meeting character.

Speaking of the colored soldiers in the National Army, she said they had "white hearts under a black skin." Reverting to the congressional election, she said:

"Any colored man in this district who votes against Mr. Ransom is a traitor to his race and to democracy. If the white man, the Republican captain, tries to insist on your voting for his man, he is beguiling you and is not your friend."

She concluded, Mr. President, in these words:

Now that the black women of the North have political power, they must band together for the black women of the South. You black people must strangle the solid South.

Those words I commend, Mr. President, to the consideration and attention of those distinguished Senators from my own section who intend to support this proposition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I thank my friend the able Senator from Colorado for yielding to me at this point. I should not have anything to say at this time had not my good friend the distinguished Senator from Georgia addressed his remarks and read the newspaper clippings to the Senators from the South who have declared their purpose to vote for the resolution giving women the right of suffrage.

For one holding my views on the race question, of course, everyone knows that there are not words in my vocabulary sufficiently strong to express my disapproval of the conduct of the white woman whose ignorant enthusiasm would lead her to commit the wicked mistake of urging the negroes to take part in politics. If such were done in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor, it would bring about untold trouble, not only to the white people, but the negroes also. But I can not for the life of me see the relevancy of the newspaper article to the subject matter under discussion. Certainly, there is no more harm or damage done the country by a white woman insisting upon the negro woman voting for a negro who is a candidate for Congress than there is in a white man holding office appointing a negro to office.

I think it is very natural for a negro to desire to vote for a negro for office. But it is an unwise thing for a white person to insist upon a negro voting for anybody or taking part in politics at all. If I had my way about it I should not permit a negro man or negro woman or a yellow man or yellow woman to vote in any State in this Republic. I should make of this absolutely a white man's Government. But every idea of justice and sense of right is outraged by a condemnation of women for doing things in politics or anywhere else that men are applauded for doing. If it is right for a negro to vote, it is right for a negro to hold office. If it is wrong for a negro woman to vote, it is wrong for a negro man to vote. If it is wrong for a white woman to urge negro women and men to vote for a negro candidate for office, it is equally wrong for a white man to urge a negro man to vote or for a white man to appoint a negro to office—and the latter has been done as a reward for the negroes' support in political campaigns.

I do not approve either or any such—but I am in favor of treating women fairly. It is my purpose to continue the fight for the repeal of the fifteenth amendment, and finally the completed elimination of the negroes, both male and female, from the politics of America. And I expect the white women of America to help me in that great undertaking.

Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say to the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I am due at a conference on what is known as the food-production bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the Senator, is there a controversy over the matter now?

Mr. GORE. The matter which I intend to present to the Senate I think there will be no controversy over, and I think it will not require three minutes. It is the regular annual appropriation bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to report, without amendment, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, by authority of a majority of the membership of that committee, the regular annual Agricultural appropriation bill, being House bill 12714. I shall then ask for its immediate consideration, on condition, however, that it will not lead to any discussion.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it a conference report?

Mr. GORE. No, sir; it has not been in conference.

I will say in this connection that this is the measure which has already passed both Houses of Congress; it is the measure that was vetoed by the President on account of the wheat amendment. The bill has passed the other House exactly as it had previously passed both Houses, excluding the wheat amendment. It has again passed the House and now comes to the Senate.

I will say, by way of further explanation of the apparent haste, that either this bill must pass to-day or on Monday, or another continuing joint resolution must be passed. The House of Representatives has lost a quorum, I am advised by the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, and that they will not be able to obtain a quorum either to-day or on Monday for the purpose of passing a continuing joint resolution. Notice has been served upon him that such a joint resolution can not be passed in the absence of a quorum. That renders it, therefore, imperative that this measure should be presented at this time, and I ask unanimous consent for that purpose. It is the exact measure which has heretofore passed both Houses, excluding the so-called wheat amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, to be resumed immediately upon the conclusion of the matter which he now presents to the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none, and the report will be received.

Mr. GORE. I now ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12714) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I simply wish to reiterate the statement that this is the regular annual Agricultural appropriation bill, the former bill having passed both Houses and having been vetoed by the President; it has been repassed by the House as it previously had passed both Houses, excluding the so-called wheat amendment.

On this point let me say that the friends of the increased price of wheat have decided to adjourn that question until the short session of Congress next winter. The President has issued a proclamation fixing the price of wheat for the 1919 harvest at the same figure which was fixed for the harvests of 1917 and 1918. There are those who think the price was not high enough. The President, however, has given notice that he would appoint a commission to investigate the cost of production next spring, and if it should be found necessary would issue a proclamation making the necessary or proven advance in the price. In view of that statement and assurance it has not been deemed wise to insist upon the wheat amendment at this time, but, as I say, to adjourn that question until some future occasion.

In that connection I wish to say it is only since the Senate voted last upon the wheat amendment that the so-called agricultural advisory committee, appointed by Mr. Hoover and Secretary Houston, have unanimously recommended a price of $2.46 per bushel for wheat at Chicago. The price of the crop of Switzerland this year is guaranteed by the Government at $2.70 per bushel, and the price guaranteed by the French Government for the current year is $3.95 for wheat. Further than this I have nothing to say. I hope the measure will now pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 333) to aid in combating "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PREVENTION OF SPANISH INFLUENZA.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator in charge of the pending measure has kindly agreed to lay it aside temporarily, without losing its place, in order that the Senate may consider the joint resolution which has just come over from the House of Representatives. It is vitally important that it be disposed of promptly, and I ask unanimous consent that it be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which the Secretary will read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 333) to aid in combating "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases was read the first time by title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Public Health Service to combat and suppress "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases by aiding State and local boards of health, or otherwise, including pay and allowances of medical and sanitary personnel, medical and hospital supplies, printing, clerical services, and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, transportation, freight, and such other expenses as may be necessary, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,000,000, to be available until June 30, 1919.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury are authorized and directed, respectively, to utilize jointly the personnel and facilities of the Medical Department of the Army, the Medical Department of the Navy, and the Public Health Service, so far as possible, in aiding to combat and suppress the said diseases.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether this amount has been asked for by the War Department or by any other department?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not prepared to say whether it has or not. The joint resolution has passed the House, and the situation is critical and serious.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, one of the evidences of the situation being critical, it would seem to me, would be for one of the executive departments, particularly the War Department, to have taken cognizance of it and to have called the attention of Congress to it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator from Pennsylvania objects to the passage of the joint resolution, I do not wish to delay the pending measure any further.

Mr. PENROSE. In good faith, I only want to ask for information. I have no doubt that the situation growing out of the so-called "Spanish influenza" is very serious, but it seems to me that we are proposing to disburse a million dollars absolutely without consideration and without any estimates. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any idea how the money is going to be spent?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have no information except what everybody has, and that contained in the joint resolution itself.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, I have no information.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is now under investigation. Some of the representatives of the War and Navy Departments and the Public Health Service had been requested to appear before the Appropriations Committee, but the Senator from Massachusetts made such representations to me about the serious nature of this contagion in the State of Massachusetts that I thought the Senate might well afford to appropriate this money immediately, so that the country might be relieved of this menace.

Mr. PENROSE. Then the Senator's thought is to appropriate this $1,000,000 and investigate the propriety of the appropriation afterwards?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Not to investigate it at all, but to leave it to the officers of the Government to expend it for the purposes indicated.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, has the Senator any idea whatever as to how the money is to be expended?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Medical Department of the Government is to expend it.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, how are they going to expend it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I can not tell the Senator how. It is within their discretion to expend it to control this epidemic, which is a menace to the cantonments, to the camps, to the Army everywhere, and to the civil population. It is a serious menace, and we have got, in my judgment, to take some risk in trusting the officers of the Government to use wisely the funds necessary at least to make an earnest effort to check this contagion.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to trust the officers of the Government, and if they would come here and ask for this $1,000,000 I would not hesitate a moment; but nobody has asked for it that I know of; nobody knows how it is to be expended; and absolutely no information exists on the part of any Senator or Member of the House, so far as I can gather, as to how or why this money should be spent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit the Chair to state that a similar Senate joint resolution was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], who knows the facts about it, and, as the Chair is informed, requested that he be present when the joint resolution was called up for action. In view of that, the Chair was about to suggest that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] be allowed to proceed with his remarks upon this matter, leaving it pending for a few minutes, in the hope that the Senator from Massachusetts may arrive in the meantime.

Mr. PENROSE. I really think it would be well to do so. The Finance Committee is in session——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I withdraw the request for the consideration of the joint resolution. I am perfectly willing, if any Senator objects, to let it go to the committee for investigation. I was endeavoring to relieve what I consider a serious menace to the Army and to the country, and I think that we could very well afford to do that; but, in view of what has been said, I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the message from the House remains on the desk of the Presiding Officer, and can be laid before the Senate at any time.

Mr. PENROSE. I simply want to suggest in conclusion, in justice to myself, that the Finance Committee of the Senate is engaged every day and all day in the laborious task of devising methods of getting $8,000,000,000 from the taxpayers. In my opinion, there is going to be imposed upon the taxpayers a crushing burden, such as in many cases will result—I hesitate to use the word—but I am of the opinion that it will result in many cases in industrial disaster; and I think the time has come when we should stop appropriating a million to-day and ten million to-morrow and fifty million the day after, without any consideration or investigation or recommendation.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I not only withdraw the request, but the Senator can do as he pleases. If he wants the joint resolution to go to the committee, I am perfectly willing to have that action taken, but there is, in my judgment, a public emergency. The proceeding is irregular, and the joint resolution can only be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. PENROSE. I simply want to state, Mr. President, that I am one of those—and I believe my opinion is shared by others—who are reaching the conclusion that we are approaching the time when it will be easier to save a million dollars than to raise a million dollars.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be very much indebted to the Senator from Colorado if he will yield to me just for a moment in regard to the joint resolution which was brought up by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and which has passed the House, appropriating a million dollars to enable the medical departments of the Government to meet the scourge of Spanish influenza which has appeared in this country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well; I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The appropriation, of course, gives them authority to use money everywhere, and the Red Cross is making arrangements to send out units everywhere. It is not alone for New England; but I hope no objection will be made to its passage, because in Massachusetts and in the other New England States, but particularly in Massachusetts, there is great suffering, and many deaths are occurring.

Mr. THOMAS. It is right here in Washington.

Mr. LODGE. It has appeared here; it has appeared in many States; it will be everywhere. At Camp Devens, according to the last figures I saw, there were over 10,000 cases, and many deaths. It has gone so far that theaters and churches are closed, and all public meetings are postponed, as a measure of necessary precaution. The distress is very great, owing to the great lack of physicians and nurses. The hospitals are so crowded that it is impossible to get the cases into them, which, of course, affects the mass of the population more than anything else. We need, more than anything, nurses and doctors. We are doing the utmost that can be done in the States, but we need help from the General Government in the way of nurses and doctors. They can aid the Red Cross, and I know they have been in consultation, and are anxious to help in every way that is possible.

The epidemic is stopping the war work in the States. It is retarding it in all the great plants which are occupied in making munitions of war. It is of the utmost importance to do everything that can be done to curb the progress of this disease; to take the proper measures to keep it within the narrowest possible bounds. The money that is asked for is not alone for New England at all, as I said in the beginning. It happens that there is where it first broke out, and there is where the situation at this moment is worst.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will allow the joint resolution to pass.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no desire to object to the passage of this measure. The Senator from Massachusetts thinks it is necessary, and I am generally in harmony with him, and I do not object to it. It seems to me, however, that there should have been some estimate from the department, or some little investigation from the committee, no matter how hasty. It is the practice that I object to, rather than the purpose of the appropriation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Pennsylvania. This matter is being carefully considered and has been carefully considered by the Medical Department of the Navy, of the Army, of the Red Cross, and of the Public Health Service. I know that Surgeon General Blue, of the Public Health Service, Surgeon General Braisted, of the Navy, and Surgeon General Noble, of the Army, have all been in consultation about it. They will spend the money. It will be wholly in their hands, and I am sure they can be depended upon to spend it as wisely as possible, but I assure the Senate that the need is very great indeed. We ought to have all the help we can get to check and quarantine the disease, and all that is done in New England or anywhere else is for the benefit of the rest of the country and for the war work throughout the country.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is not true that the Surgeon General's Office now has in the service practically every doctor it can get hold of and ample funds to carry on all kinds of work connected with the war?

Mr. LODGE. They have no funds with which to meet such an exigency as this. The funds are all specifically appropriated for other purposes. This is an emergency. They have no funds at all for this purpose, and it may be necessary for the Government to assist the Red Cross, which has the best general organization. I can only hope it will be done. We have gone to the rescue frequently in case of floods and other visitations which were local, and I have always been glad to vote for those appropriations, but I think in this case the work is national and affects the welfare of the war work as well as the welfare of the part of the country where the scourge is raging most severely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I only have a word to say in reference to the pending joint resolution.

As a rule, I am in accord with the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] that we ought not to recklessly appropriate money, at least we ought, as a rule, to take the time to ascertain for what purpose it is going to be spent, how it will be spent, and as to whether the scope of the appropriation is within the possibilities of its helpful expenditure. As a member of the Public Health Committee of the Senate, however, I happen to know something about the conditions of the Public Health Service, and as a member of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, which reviews their appropriations, I have some information from that source, and I know that as now constituted they have a woeful lack of officers. They are being pushed to the extreme to get the men in the Public Health Service to do the work that they have in hand, and they have not ample appropriations to carry on the work that is in hand outside of this epidemic.

I therefore know that not one step can be taken by the Public Health Service unless we furnish them with more money, and, more than that, provide a new field, as this joint resolution does, in which they can get surgeons to cooperate with the Public Health Service and aid in stopping this epidemic. It may not be so serious as we imagine at the present time; but if it is, and it continues to spread, it may do far more harm to our Army in the camps on this side of the Atlantic than the enemy can do in months on the other side. At this stage of the war, when victory is only a step forward, when every effort should be made to put every possible man on the firing line, when the Provost Marshal General has felt that this situation is so serious that he has stopped the mobilization of 142,000 men going to the camps, it seems to me that we ought not to hesitate for an hour to appropriate whatever money is necessary, in the opinion of the authorities, to take steps immediately to stop this epidemic, protect our civil population, and protect our Army in the camps.

Although as a rule I believe that appropriations of this kind should go to a committee for consideration, I hope that this joint resolution will be passed this afternoon by unanimous consent, so that by Monday morning the constituted authorities may go to work, and may begin the fight to stop a serious menace to the health of the country and to our Army in the field.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution, and that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for action upon the joint resolution which was withdrawn a few minutes ago.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if we can be assured that it will take only a few minutes, I shall not object.

Mr. LODGE. I think the joint resolution will pass at once.

Mr. SHAFROTH. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 333) to aid in combating "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to oppose the joint resolution, but I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if there is a serious need of surgeons in the Army at the present time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was speaking of the Public Health Service, not of the Army. The Public Health Service is that part of the service which, as the Senator knows, takes care of epidemics and does not directly relate to the Army or the Navy.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a serious need for them in the Public Health Service, is there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have been told in the committee, by members of that service, that they have great difficulty in getting men. For instance, they have to supply men to the merchant marine; and then all these calls for doctors in epidemics and for the scientific work in reference to epidemics are made on the Public Health Service generally. Then a large portion of the work with regard to sanitation around Army camps has made another drain on the Public Health Service. So my information is—and I am sure it is correct—that there is a lack of trained officers in the Public Health Service.

The Congress has recently provided for taking in a certain number of junior officers; but this class of work requires men who are experienced in scientific lines rather than in the line of doctors. Of course they are doctors and surgeons, but their work is not primarily the work of a doctor or a surgeon who treats one patient. It is rather the work of a scientific man, whose principal object is to prevent the disease and not to cure it. Of course that takes men with years of training; and when they take a new man into the service it takes some time before they can educate him to the point where he can be of use.

The drain upon the Public Health Service has taken every possible man of that kind. Of course they would direct this work because they have charge of the public health at home, but they have not the officers. This bill authorizes the temporary use of men in the military and naval services to cooperate with the Public Health Service for this purpose; and the $1,000,000 appropriation, of course, is intended for sanitation, for investigation, for nurses, and other work in creating a quarantine service for the prevention of the disease. In other words, if this joint resolution is passed it will be primarily for the purpose of prevention and not for cure.

Mr. PITTMAN. The reason why I ask the question is simply to enforce this necessity. As I understand—and I thought the Senator from Alabama was familiar with it—the amount of disease, and the necessity for physicians and surgeons in every department connected with this war, has been steadily increasing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PITTMAN. And the Government is appealing all the time, not only to the surgeons but to the scientists and all others, to meet this tremendous emergency.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is the necessity for the passage of this joint resolution supposed to arise from the fact that the Government, or the governmental agencies in connection with the camps, are not able to cope with the condition already developed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I do not think it directly relates to the camps. As I understand the purpose of the joint resolution, some cases of this epidemic have originated in the camps, but more have originated in the civil population. The disease appears to be a highly communicable one, however, and if prompt steps are taken to stop its progress by quarantine and information to the public generally it may be stopped in its initial stages, whereas if it progresses for a week or two or a month it may be very difficult to stop in the end; and in the meantime the contact with the camps will become greater, and there will be vastly more danger of our armies being affected by the disease.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that further mobilization is suspended, however, to prevent the last condition arising which the Senator has named. Is the Senator's information to the effect that the cities and the counties and the States are unable to cope with the condition, or have they refused or failed to attempt it and asked that the Government in the first instance shall take charge of it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no information whatever on that subject; but the disease has only appeared in the last few weeks, and most of the States can only act by way of an appropriation through their legislatures. I know that is true of my State; and if we waited for State action the epidemic might come and go before we would get it from many States in the Union. It is not that the people would not be willing to respond, but that the State has not the machinery for immediate response.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can answer the Senator as to the State of Massachusetts. Everything is being done there that the State resources permit—everything in the way of money and every effort in the way of nurses. The hospitals, as I have said, are crammed beyond capacity. Nothing has been spared by the State. The State can not get additional medical help and help of nurses without the aid of the Federal Government. It must have aid from the outside.

The Federal Government has been most energetic already. Several days ago the Navy, although hard put to it for physicians and surgeons, sent six doctors to the shipping district at Quincy, where there are the Victory Works and the great Fore River yards, so important did they regard it to have medical aid. The State is straining every nerve and doing everything it can; but the State authorities telegraph me that they must have the aid of the Federal Government to get the necessary assistance to check and control the disease so far as it can be done.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. PITTMAN. I just want to make a statement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that while I was absent at lunch the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made some comment upon a colloquy between the Senator and myself yesterday with regard to this matter. I simply give notice that, with the consent of the Senate, upon the completion of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado I will answer the Senator from Utah, and I trust he will be present at that time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have listened to the debate upon this question with deep interest, and find that nearly everything urged against the measure has been on the ground of expediency for man, how it will affect his power, his control, nothing as to the righteousness of the cause. Senators forget the woman, who believes that in justice she is entitled to vote; they forget the mothers, the wives, and the sisters who, according to our theory of government, are entitled to suffrage; but because some fancied complication clouds their vision, the effect of which might be to limit man's power, they would deny to women the right of the franchise.

Mr. President, what is involved in the right to vote? It is the greatest governmental power that exists, because it includes the determination of all governmental questions. Is it possible that a human being who is as well educated as man shall not be given consideration because man has arrogated all powers and has reserved them exclusively for himself?

It has been said that Senators have been influenced politically to change their views upon this subject; but, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned that charge does not lie at my door. Forty-odd years ago I made a speech in a debating society in favor of woman suffrage, and there never has been an hour since that time when I did not feel that it was an outrage for man to deprive woman of the right to vote. I introduced this identical joint resolution in five successive Congresses when I was a member of the House of Representatives, and yet its passage was always refused.

Mr. President, what is this power? Where do we get it? Is it a fact that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed? Is that true or is it a lie? Is it possible that any person can fairly reason that a woman is not entitled to this right when that declaration has been accepted by all republics throughout the world, and when it is supposed to be acquiesced in by every man on the floor of this body? Our forefathers said it was so clear that it could not be the subject of dispute, that it was a self-evident truth.

No one can fairly deny that women are part of the governed, and hence we violate that fundamental principle of our Government when we refuse to permit them to participate in that government. Are not the women subject to the laws of the Government? Are they not liable to all the pains and penalties that are prescribed in the statutes? Oh, yes. Then, why is it that Senators will deny their right on the ground of expediency in some States of the Union?

Mr. President, how did man come to get this power? Everybody concedes that all powers of government are either delegated or assumed. Everybody recognizes that all powers not delegated are assumed. Consequently all assumed powers are usurpations. That being true, wherein can you justify ever having excluded women from the right to vote? The women never gave their consent that men should usurp all powers of government. You can not find where they have ever had submitted to them any such proposition of disfranchisement. You can not find that it has been voted by them. If the principle is true that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, where do you get the consent of the governed in the case of women? From what source of authority do you get the right of man to make all the laws not only for himself but also for his mother, his sisters, and his wife without their consent? Whence did he derive it?

As it is conceded that woman is subject to the jurisdiction of the laws, then you are exercising usurped power over her. Even if you could find that she had voted this power to man, can it be said it was to exist forever—that it was irrevocable? Does this self-evident truth, that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, relate to a past condition only, or is it a "living truth yesterday, to-day, and forever"?

Mr. President, suppose men were deprived of the right to vote, how long would that condition last? Would there not be a revolution? Our very Declaration of Independence in referring to inalienable rights says "that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." Of course a revolution would follow. Why can we not look a little at the other side? Why can we not see the matter from the woman's position? There are women advocating this measure who are so earnest that they would lay down their lives in order to get the principle established. Are we to ignore fundamental principles? Are we to ignore women who are pleading for such rights?

Mr. President, we do not look at the question from woman's viewpoint. We are just like any class of people or any potentate that has power and does not want to give it up. The original form of government was an absolute monarchy. It was the assumption of power by force, and the absolute monarch vigorously resisted yielding any of it. The absolute monarch denied the petition of the people, and even of the lords of the realm, in order to retain his power. Yet, Mr. President, when the first concessions came they were called grants of power not to the people but to the aristocracy, and the governments were then called limited monarchies. Then there grew the sentiment that all people have inalienable rights, that they had rights which they could not be deprived of, even if they were willing to surrender them.

How can it be asserted that women are not citizens when they perform almost every task that man has done? The incomparable record woman has made in industries and in all fields of effort during the war surely entitles her to be considered, sympathetically at least, in connection with this question. It may be said that the husband will give the wife all the rights she should have, but he did not do so when by legislation he vested in himself the title to all her property on marriage and arrogated to himself the sole guardianship of all the children. Should she have no voice in determining such questions? Must her privileges be subject to the gracious favor of men? They must have a right, and that right must be given by us, if we want to do what is fair and what is just. The idea of letting a matter of expediency determine the granting or rejection of a human right is repugnant to every lover of liberty.

Speakers here have opposed the idea of woman's being entitled to vote unless she has the strength to go upon the battle field and resist by force of arms the enemies of our country.

Mr. President, you can not win a war unless you have the aid of women. You will find that millions of women will take the places of men who will be released to go to war. Wars can not be won with soldiers at the front alone. The great forces in the factories and on the farms must be maintained. It may be that woman has not the strength to bear arms, but she does bear sons who fight the battles of the Republic.

Mr. President, this sacrifice upon her part is far greater even than that made by the boy himself. There is nothing that so disturbs the soul and rest of the mother as the fear that her beloved ones may have to meet death. To her it is the supreme sacrifice. Will you deny to such human beings the right to participate in government, but insist that man shall make all the laws not only for himself but also for his mother, for his sisters, and for his wife without their consent? Is there justice in that? Is there any fairness in it?

The distinction is attempted to be made that this is a matter for State determination. If the principle is true that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, it applies to all governments. It applies to the State government. If the State does not permit that principle of law to prevail in the State, then it is not a democratic State; it is a State that violates the very fundamental principle of the Government. If a Nation which is a distinct Government itself, which elects its President, its Vice President, and its Senators and Representatives, denies that principle of government, wherein can you say that it is a true democracy?

Mr. President, this "self-evident truth" applies to all governments. It applies to a city government, to a county government, to a State government, and it applies to a national government. The safeguard which has been thrown about the adoption of constitutional amendments is supposed to be the ample protection which will prevent legislation of a character that is detrimental.

Is it possible that when we elect a President of the United States we should deprive one-half of the people of the right of participating in that election? The man says that the men represent the women. You might say, let the son represent the father, or let the father represent the sons. Of course there is some sympathy between them, and consequently you would not get extremely bad legislation; but if the principle is true that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed you have no right without that person's consent to let somebody else represent him or her, and especially some one who may be antagonistic to his or her views.

Mr. President, is it possible that we are going to maintain a position that one-half of the world is going to be denied the right to exercise that power which is the greatest governmental power and the foundation of democracy?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I did not want to ask the Senator a question, but I am on a conference committee and compelled to go away. I wonder if the Senator would yield, that I may place a telegram in the RECORD which I am rather anxious to place in it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I would like to have placed in the RECORD a telegram I received this morning stating that my home town, Fort Dodge, Iowa, and Webster County, a large agricultural county, raised their quota on the liberty-bond issue at midnight last night. That is the kind of answer that is coming from the Iowa people to the camouflage peace campaign of Austria. It shows that the Middle West is thoroughly aroused and is behind the Government to the last dollar and the last man. I think no other town or county in the Nation can exceed this record. I thank the Senator for his kindness.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORT DODGE, IOWA, September 28, 1918.

Senator W. S. KENYON.
Washington, D. C.:

Webster County and Fort Dodge raised their quota before midnight on the 27th. The editor Des Moines Register, when advised, says we are the first county in the State to raise quota.

M. P. CHUMLEA.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, you will find in the list of subscribers the Senator has referred to the work of women for the purpose of raising that money. Should we not consider women's rights in view of her work in behalf of the preservation of the Government? Is it possible that a matter of expediency is going to determine this great question of right? If we do, Mr. President, we had better wipe out the axiom that the right of every cause should prevail.

Mr. President, what are these women doing? Hundreds of thousands are working to take the place of men in order to let them win the battles of the Republic. What are they doing every day? Working for nothing day after day, continually working for the great cause. Are we to shun them; are we to say, "You have no rights"; shall we say "we will continue to make the laws just as we want them whether you like them or not"?

Mr. President, there should be a movement everywhere in behalf of this great principle. I can not conceive how people want rights that they are not willing to give to other people of intelligence. It must be a relic of the theory of the divine right of kings extended to the divine right of sex. Is that right? Is that fair? If you were in the other position, would you deem it right? Would you deem it fair? Can you not look at it a little from the woman's standpoint?

Mr. President, there is no sacrifice that woman will not make for her country. There is no sacrifice she would not make, even to the extent of going upon the field of battle. I want to read an extract from an account of the heroism of the Legion of Death:

> They fought like demons. Under the spell and excitement of battle the 3,000 women in the battalion reverted to the primitive. The refinements, limitations, and the weaknesses which civilization has implanted in the feminine sex seemed miraculously wiped away by a terrific lust for blood, which I do not believe any regiment of men even in this bitterest of all wars could ever display.
>
> Twice the Russian battalions to the right and left gave way under the German thrust, one regiment throwing down its arms in a mad scramble for the rear. Each time their officers rallied them by pleading with their men not to desert the women who were holding on. The whole Russian line would have been pushed back and the road to Petrograd opened if the Battalion of Death in its first engagement had faltered against almost overwhelming odds.
>
> The Death Battalion fought so viciously, using their bayonets in preference to taking time to reload their rifles, that the Germans, who were concentrated on them, were gradually pushed back toward their own lines. The women, with their bayonets, subjected themselves to an unceasing hail of bullets, but seemed utterly unconscious of it. They plunged recklessly into the deadly barbed wire, which impaled hundreds of them.
>
> Every now and then a whole group, perhaps a squad sticking together around its corporal or under lieutenant, would sway and fall together, like so many ninepins, before a concentrated German volley. Then over their twitching bodies another group of women would leap madly, screaming as they went, only to fall themselves into a second heap in the face of a second volley of bullets.
>
> The women ignored their wounded, even as they scorned the bullets which mowed them down. Even the wounded themselves fought as they staggered and let loose of their guns only when they could keep their feet no longer. If the men had been dependable, the Death Battalion would have broken through the German lines that day, and with a glorious victory might have saved Kerensky by inflaming Russia with a new patriotism.
>
> The doggedness and fierceness of the women compelled the Germans to subside. The women wanted to follow them into their trenches. For more than 10 minutes Maj. Groffoff, who had gone out with his female soldiers, failed in his frantic efforts to herd the women into retirement. When they did turn back they drove with them 102 disarmed prisoners.

Ah, Mr. President, when the extreme would come, when the absolute necessity for physical force would come, you would find that women, though not so strong as men, would give that determination to their action which would produce a defense beyond calculation. If we had had Russian soldiers imbued with the same spirit of patriotism as the women of the Legion of Death, Russia would not have fallen under the attacks of the Germans.

Mr. President, we are attempting to discriminate between men and women because it is said that women are weaker than men. We do not make that discrimination in any other line. We do not say that the old man should not vote because he can not go to war. We do not say that the decrepit and lame can not go to the polls and cast their vote because they no longer can shoulder muskets and go to the front. There is nothing in our theory of equality and justice which makes any such discrimination.

What bad results can come from women participating in politics? What is their position? No one will say that women will vote for immoral legislation when a man would not. We find that every time she has ever performed a duty it has been in behalf of good government. She appears always on the front and in support of legislation that will elevate mankind.

I want to say that while this applies to white women, it will apply as between black women and black men in the same proportion. When you examine the criminal records, the proportion in the United States of men to women in the prisons of this country is about 20 men to 1 woman. That would necessarily show that so far as her tendency to commit crime is concerned she is in a far higher position than man.

[At this point Mr. SHAFROTH yielded to Mr. GORE, and the Agricultural appropriation bill was passed.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there was once a principle announced, which was supposed to be sacred, which is violated by not permitting women to vote, namely, that taxation without representation is tyranny. If it is tyranny to men, why is it not tyranny to women? How can we discriminate and maintain that a violation of that principle is wrong as to men but is not wrong at all as to women? There was a time when there was very little property held by women, when primogeniture prevailed. That was an injustice to women. By that principle the first male of the family was entitled to all of the income and all of the property; and under such a condition, necessarily, woman could have but very little property, and the question of taxation without representation did not bear very heavily upon her. But there has since come about an equality in the rights of males and females in the distribution of estates, and if there is a tendency toward enlarging the estate of one rather than the other the father usually tries to see that the daughter is protected, even if he allows the son to go without any inheritance. Now, the major portion, or fully one-half, of the property in the United States in a generation goes to women.

When one-half of the Nation's property which passes through the hands of women is subject to taxation, how can a system be defended which denies them representation in order that they may protect the same from excessive tax incumbrances? There is no fairness in that, and it will not compensate to place woman upon a pedestal and kneel down in worship of her. No; she, like man, should have the same right to determine such matters according to her own judgment.

We deny the women the right to vote, and yet in eight States of the Union we allow aliens who have only filed their first declaration of citizenship to vote. We allow them to vote, but we can not allow the women, from whom we have all sprung, to go to the ballot box and cast a vote.

Why can we not see just a little that there are wrongs perpetrated by this disfranchisement? Why have we not the manhood to right this wrong? Why do we not joyously seize the opportunity of adding this large, good, moral, and enlightened element into the citizenship which works for the purification of politics and the advancement of civilization?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Colorado has just made the statement that we allow persons who have filed their declaration for citizenship to vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is being done in eight States.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Colorado does not mean by that that the Federal Government allows that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; it is the State governments that do that.

Mr. KING. Then the States themselves in their sovereign capacity permit certain individuals to vote?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Then, the Senator's proposition is, of course, to rob the States of the sovereign power which they reserved to themselves when the Federal Government was formed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, rob the States! Why, Mr. President, if the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, the principle is not only applicable to a State, but it is also applicable to the United States.

Mr. KING. Well, does the Senator realize that the Federal Government is a government of enumerated and delegated powers?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not, but I undertake to say that we can not contend that democracy exists in any form of government in a city, in a county, in a State, or in a national government, unless we observe that fundamental principle that is laid down as the test of all the rights of mankind.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am astounded to hear the Senator make the declaration that the Federal Government is not one of enumerated and delegated powers. Certainly he is too good a lawyer to challenge that doctrine, which is the foundation really of our dual form of government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I certainly do not deny it; I admit it. If I said to the contrary I did not understand the Senator's question, and I want to say that we are trying to confer power which the United States Government does not now possess, and we are appealing for what? We are not appealing to you to give the women the vote, but we are appealing to you to submit the question to the States; that is all. When women have sacrificed in the way they have in this war and we will not give them that right, it seems to me we are in a deplorable condition.

Mr. KING. The Senator realizes that each State, under our theory of government, has the right to determine who shall and who shall not vote; so that there is no reason in the world why if the people of the States desire to extend the franchise to women that they may not do so whenever they desire.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the Senator from Utah loses sight of the fact that this very right that we are trying to extend is for the purpose of vesting that power in the Federal Government. That is the reason. The State government has the control now; there is no doubt of that; but when we are trying to remedy that in the way prescribed by the Federal Constitution and simply want to give the people of the United States an opportunity to let the States pass upon it, then we think it oppressive action in refusing to permit that course to be taken.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A moment ago the Senator criticized the action in, I believe, eight States permitting men who have merely taken out their first papers to vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in entire sympathy with the criticism expressed by the Senator; but, in view of that criticism, does not the Senator believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to this very amendment, which aims to cure a situation equally vicious which would follow the ratification of the amendment now pending, ought to be adopted?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President, we have Senators in the Senate who are trying to defeat this amendment, and they will try to defeat it if possible by filibustering, in my judgment, though I am satisfied the Senator from New Jersey is not one. Why should we consent to any amendment? I can not consent, and I would not consent that the Ten Commandments be put on this amendment, although every one of them is good. Why? Because you know that the House of Representatives by simply a two-thirds majority—not one over—passed this joint resolution. You know further that if we ever send this resolution back with an amendment attached to it, no matter what kind of an amendment, it will never be considered by the House of Representatives; and the change of the votes of one or two Representatives might defeat the entire measure. That is the reason, Mr. President, we do not want to consent to any amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, he has not answered my question. I wanted him to comment upon the merits of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can only say that I am not familiar with it; I was not here when it was read, and I have not examined it. I presume that it is a good amendment. I imagine if the Senator would present it as a separate joint resolution or as a bill, if it is possible to present it in that form, I perhaps would vote for it; but, as I have said, I am not familiar with its terms.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator believe that when we set to work to amend the Constitution of the United States we should do it in the very best manner we can?

Mr. SHAFROTH. How is that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has said that he is opposed to any amendment to the pending joint resolution regardless of its merits——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly. Let it be presented as an independent measure. I am not going to consent to any amendment of the pending measure, because any amendment, no matter what it is, would send the joint resolution back to the House of Representatives; and there it would likely sleep the sleep of death, because at this stage of the proceedings of Congress it will readily be seen that a filibuster could be made most effectively upon it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, in view of the fact, then, Mr. President, that the Senator has criticized eight States for permitting people to vote who ought not to vote, it seems to me it is rather difficult for him to defend this joint resolution, which will do exactly the same thing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President, I have explained—but I will explain over again—the fact that in the House of Representatives House joint resolution No. 200, which is the woman-suffrage amendment to the Constitution now under consideration, was passed by exactly a two-thirds majority, there being not one vote to spare. It came over to the Senate; we have ever since been trying to get a two-thirds majority for it; and we have met with appeals of all kinds upon the part of those who are opposed to the passage of the joint resolution. The Senator knows that, if the measure were sent back to the House, it would run the hazard of being defeated. If he had any legislation that he wanted to put through, he would never consent to a thing of that kind, and, that being the case, we can not consent to any amendment being placed on this joint resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I thought it were the duty of a Senator to put through legislation simply for the purpose of establishing a record, perhaps I would not consent to an amendment, but I understand that perhaps it is the duty of every Senator when proceeding to amend the Constitution of the United States to endeavor to perfect it before it is submitted to the States for ratification, regardless of whatever little delay might be involved.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, delay——

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what the Senator is complaining about.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator knows that it would be a parliamentary advantage to the other side of this question if the friends of the measure should consent to its amendment; and it would be unpardonable to consent on the part of those who are in favor of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In making that statement, the Senator does so, I understand, because of the improbability of getting a vote in the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I take it that the proceeding as it has gone on has been in regular order, the House has passed the joint resolution by a two-thirds majority, it is now here in the Senate, and I can not understand how anybody can vote against it who believes in the doctrine of our Government that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] interrogated me a few moments ago and intimated that we were trying to impose, or might impose, on the States some law that would be detrimental to their interests.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the inquiry of the Senator from Utah to involve the conclusion that the passage of this amendment would deprive the States of the power to regulate the suffrage altogether, a query prompted by the reference of the Senator to the fact that in some of the States aliens who had merely declared their intention to become citizens were given the right of suffrage. I understand that this constitutional amendment will operate negatively. Like the fifteenth amendment, its purpose is to deny to the States the right to withhold suffrage because of one condition or qualification; that is to say, the fifteenth amendment provides that no State shall deny the right of suffrage to a man on account of color or previous condition. This left each State free to impose other qualifications which in the legislative judgment seemed to be desirable or expedient.

In the same fashion this proposed amendment provides that the right to vote shall not be withheld from an individual on account of sex; that is all. The States will still possess their present power to impose other disqualifications and to resort to other bases for limiting the right of suffrage in all respects as though this amendment had not been adopted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. We know, because it is an historical fact, that the black people in the South do not exercise the right of suffrage, notwithstanding the fifteenth amendment. That would be impossible were the States entirely deprived by that amendment of control over the suffrage. They impose other disqualifications, other impediments, which seem to be as effective in suppressing that vote as though there were no fifteenth amendment. In the same fashion the adoption of this proposed amendment leaves to the States the power to determine either that a person having only declared his intention to become a citizen might vote or that an alien woman marrying a citizen of the United States should not by that fact be invested with the right of suffrage citizenship. So that the entire deprivation of the States of control over the right of suffrage does not follow the adoption of this proposed amendment; it operates precisely as the fifteenth amendment, except that it imposes one other disqualification upon State action, and only one.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I heartily concur in the Senator's position concerning this matter. There is no attempt to control the action of the States except in one particular, and that is, you can not enforce a law against a person on account of sex.

Mr. President, it seems that Senators do not realize that there is going on in the world an evolution in government. They do not seem to realize that this onward tendency of democracy has been developing for years and years; that its greatest impetus was given by the Declaration of Independence, and that it is making a sweeping movement on account of the great war that is now devastating Europe.

Mr. President, it was that Declaration of Independence, which announced the doctrine that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, which has modified every form of government on earth. It has made the absolute monarch yield to a legislative body which holds the purse strings of the government. It has brought about the establishment of Republic after Republic on the Western Hemisphere. It has even established Republics in the Continent of Europe. The man who can not foresee that this onward movement is bound to succeed, that it is founded upon justice, upon equity, upon right, it seems to me is blind to what the future holds in store for us.

Why, Mr. President, this evolution is going on even to the extent of affecting the subject of woman suffrage, by reason of the fact that State after State is adopting this measure, notwithstanding the harrowing conditions that exist, notwithstanding the obstructions that exist in the constitutions of the States; and, Mr. President, the time is bound to come when there will be more States of the Union that will give women this right than there will be States that deny it to women.

The women in 19 States now can vote for President and Vice President of the United States. It seems to me that any man who can perceive future events to any extent must realize that it is bound to come. If it is bound to come in a year or two, why should you not yield to these women who have always been loyal to the Government, these women who have aided the Government in every way, and let the States vote upon it and determine by that immense majority required in the Constitution whether or not women are going to be admitted to this right?

Mr. President, it seems to me that any man possessed of fairness, looking upon the other side of this question, must realize that we are asking nothing that is unfair. Why, on yesterday we heard the women who have solicited Senators to vote for this measure held up to scorn, and held up under the designation "petticoat brigades" and "petticoat lobbies." Mr. President, the Senator who used those expressions will find that a speech of that kind will not do his side of the question any good, but it will do it immeasurable harm. That is not the way to brush aside a right which I regard as inalienable, notwithstanding the courts have declared that it is a privilege.

Mr. President, these women who have come here are as good women as live; and to have them referred to in the manner that they have been, to criticize them for asking and pleading with a Senator for a right to which they consider they are entitled, it seems to me can have no effect except to work a reaction.

Mr. President, I contend that this evolution in government is proceeding right now, has been developing for years, and will culminate in the passage of a joint resolution of this kind.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I saw the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in the Chamber a minute ago. He has now gone into the cloakroom. I trust that a page will invite him in, if he desires to be here while I reply to his remarks.

The Senator from Utah during my absence—and I do not say that in criticism of the Senator, because what he has said was subject to my review, and I now have the stenographic report before me—made some comments upon the colloquy indulged in between us on yesterday. I simply refer to my absence at that time as the reason for my delay in responding to his comments.

On yesterday I stated the exact reasons why the Committee on Woman Suffrage of this body brought this question before the Senate at this time. One Senator on the Democratic side has criticized the committee for injecting the matter into the deliberations of the Senate at this session. Let me read very briefly from my remarks of yesterday the statement of why the Woman Suffrage Committee, of which the majority is composed of Democrats, and the chairman consented to bring this matter before the Senate at this time.

I read from the RECORD of yesterday. I was then referring to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]:

> Because he knew just how many votes it would be necessary to have on the Republican side to carry this joint resolution through at all times, and he told Miss Hay, a member of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, who served on a committee to discuss suffrage with the Republican Members of this body, that they would give them 33 votes; and then that association, headed by Mrs. Catt, invited the Democratic members of the Suffrage Committee of this body, together with one or two other Senators, to confer with them. They then urged upon the chairman that he bring the suffrage amendment before the Senate. The chairman said:
>
> "I have brought it twice before the Senate under misinformation; I have twice subjected it to defeat on account of misinformation. We have not the votes to pass the amendment, and it is a crime to bring it up to kill it. We may get the votes later, but we have no right, after the joint resolution has passed the House, to kill it in the Senate so long as there is a chance to save it. I will not bring it up until I believe I can carry it; and I do not care how many attacks the Woman's Party make on me; that does not concern me. I am for passing this amendment and not for killing it."
>
> It was then——
>
> Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——
>
> Mr. PITTMAN. Wait until I finish this statement. I do not want to be interrupted now.
>
> It was then, by reason of the statement of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], that those ladies stated. "If we can assure you 33 Republican votes, will you bring the joint resolution up?" We replied, "Yes." Why? Because, although we had not enough with the 33, we believed that we might get 2 more votes. They said then, "We feel at liberty to say to you that Senator SMOOT, on behalf of the Republican Senators, has come to our committee, through Miss Hay, and assured us that the Republicans are ready to deliver 33 votes. We then asked for the names, to give us the poll, but they said they would not give us the poll; they said, 'Leave that to us, and we will deliver the 33 votes.'"

Again on yesterday, in commenting on this matter, I said:

> The Senator from Utah may have had doubt in his mind with regard to the Senator from New Hampshire. Undoubtedly, however, the women who induced us to bring this matter to a vote did not have any doubt about the doubt of the Senator from Utah, or they would have expressed the doubt to us. As a matter of fact, one of the ladies charged the Senator from Utah in the Marble Room yesterday with having pledged 33 votes and not giving them a poll so that they could use their own judgment, and the Senator from Utah said at the time he made the promise he thought he had them.

Now, the Senator to-day, for the purpose, I assume, of showing the Senate that there has been some deception on this side toward him arose and made the remarks I will later discuss. That I may then devote myself solely to the question of deception on this side let me now say this, so that there may be no mistake about the pledge of the 33 votes, which no one has denied so far. The Senator said he never made any contrary statement as to his doubt. Of course, he made no contrary statement as to his doubt as to any member of the 33, because he refused to give the names of the 33, but here is further proof of the pledge of 33. It is absolute proof. It is published in the Suffragist, the most ardent supporter of the Republican Party in existence to-day, one that supports them, right or wrong, whether they are with them or whether they are against them, a wonderful organization. On Saturday, August 31, 1918, there is on the front page a cartoon of a very beautiful lady holding up two banners. One of the banners reads as follows:

> Democratic Senators, 55 per cent for the suffrage amendment.

That would be 27 or less votes.

On the other banner, which is held proudly higher than the Democratic banner, we read:

> Republican Senators, 75 per cent for the suffrage amendment.

At the bottom of the page it is entitled:

> Congress convenes: The score.

Seventy-five per cent of the Republican Members of Congress.

Seventy-five per cent of 44 is 33. Where do the ladies get this information? The National American Woman Suffrage Association, headed by Mrs. Catt, is a nonpolitical organization. The Woman's Party, the publisher of the Suffragist, is an adjunct of the Republican Party. It speaks those things for the Republican Party which the Republican Party is ashamed to speak for itself.

Surely the members of the Republican Party, at least those who are suffragists—and I understand there are a great number over there—are not going to condemn the Woman's Party. Surely they do not believe that the Woman's Party published that statement and used it throughout the country as a campaign argument against Democracy without authority, without information. Where did they get their information? Where do they generally get the information? I wonder if members of the Woman's Party who are using such violent means to force the leaders of Democracy to induce the Democrats to vote for woman suffrage are going to apply this same instrument to leaders of the Republican Party in this body, whether they are going to demand that they stand by their pledges to women. Now, I am getting down to the question that Mr. SMOOT has made his excuse on. He said in his remarks to-day:

> I did intend yesterday to answer the Senator from Nevada, but I thought it useless to do so.

Then he goes on and says this. I am reading now from Mr. SMOOT's remarks to-day:

> Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, after listening to the remarks just made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET] I feel it my duty to correct the statement I made in the RECORD yesterday when the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] was trying to play politics with the question before the Senate.
>
> Yesterday the Senator from Nevada asked me this question:
>
> "Did not the Senator from Utah know the number of votes the Democrats on this side had polled for the suffrage amendment?"
>
> Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator from Utah knew that.
>
> Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, the Senator from Utah knew; and the Senator from Utah knows to-day how the poll stands on the Democratic side.
>
> Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. President, I am still reading from Mr. SMOOT's remarks:

> Mr. President, I want to say that I was in error in the statement that I made yesterday. I wonder where the Senator from Nevada is now. I wonder if he now will undertake to say that the Members—

He was interrupted. Afterwards he proceeded—

> Yesterday the Senator tried to make it appear that I in particular and the other Republicans who favor woman suffrage had deceived him; that they had played a trick for political purposes. I want to say that the statement I made yesterday was based upon the word of not one Democratic Member but a number of Democratic Members that there were 31 votes upon that side of the Chamber for the amendment.

Where are we now? Senator SMOOT believed, as he said in that statement, that there were 31 votes on this side of the Chamber for the amendment. Then he knew it would take 33 votes to pass it. When he knew it would take 33 votes to pass it, he said they only had 32. I am happy to know that Senator SMOOT believed that.

There is another thing that Senator SMOOT believes and will admit, that Mr. BENET, whom we believed we had with us, was an addition to the number we could possibly count at the time the Republicans passed the resolution in caucus. In other words, when Senator SMOOT in the caucus of the Republican Party on August 24 voted to bring the joint resolution to a vote at once he knew that the Democrats did not have to exceed 30 votes, and he now says he was not certain of more than 32 Republican votes and hoped to get 33. In other words, Senator SMOOT voted on August 24 in caucus to bring a measure to a vote that he knew did not have the votes to pass.

That is not all. There is a whole lot more to it. Who offered the resolution in the Republican caucus that the joint resolution be brought to a vote immediately? According to the Suffragist—and I do not take issue with it—the resolution was presented by Senator WADSWORTH, of New York, and passed after the election of Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE to succeed the late Senator Gallinger as the Republican leader.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The statement just read by the Senator from Nevada is a very good illustration of the accuracy of the periodical from which he is reading. The Senator from New York did not oppose the resolution in the caucus. He never opposed it during the discussion in the caucus; he took no part in the proceeding.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did the Senator from New York vote for it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He did.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from New York is known as one of the most ardent and intelligent antagonists of the Federal suffrage amendment in this body and of equal suffrage for woman everywhere. Yet the Senator from New York was aiding by his vote in caucus to bring the Federal amendment to a vote in the Senate. Was he aiding in bringing the amendment to a vote because he wanted it passed? Is that reasonable? I have known distinguished Senators in this body who did not want something to pass who would not even permit a vote upon it on the floor, and it seems incomprehensible that the able, fighting Senator from New York would deliberately try to bring a matter to a vote on this floor which he so bitterly opposes if he thought it had any chance to pass.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator from Nevada should know that that resolution was proposed by a Senator who is as ardently in favor of suffrage as is the Senator from Nevada himself, and it received the unanimous vote of those in the conference.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, we Democrats have secret caucuses. The Republicans have always been opposed to secret caucus proceedings. Will the Senator state who offered the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. PITTMAN. I am addressing my remarks first to the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not understand what he said.

Mr. PITTMAN. I made several remarks. The purport of it was that the Republicans have always opposed secret caucuses of their party and condemned the action of the Democratic Party in that respect, and he will possibly tell us who offered the resolution.

Mr. WEEKS. I have no objection to divulging the name of the Senator who offered the resolution. It was printed in the papers. It was offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and his name was attached to the resolution in the papers.

Mr. PITTMAN. How many voted for it?

Mr. WEEKS. Everybody present.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the resolution was printed in the papers. I think perhaps the Senator has not seen it. It represented the wishes of everybody to bring the matter to a vote as soon as possible, and it also explicitly stated that it committed nobody to vote for it on the merits of the question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand. If it had committed all the Republican Members to vote for it I could have understood why the suffragists on that side would like to have had it come up; but the very fact that it did not commit the antisuffragists to vote for it, and the very fact that the leading suffragists on that side knew that with the combined vote on their side and on this side we did not have enough votes to pass it indicates a very peculiar action on the part of the Republican caucus.

Senator SMOOT and every suffragist leader on that side who took the trouble to investigate it had as complete a poll of this side of the Chamber at the time that resolution was passed as any Member on this side.

They know that we never had as many on our poll as we have to-day, and to-day we have only 30. Yet Senator SMOOT says that they had only 32 on their own side, with the possibility of getting 1 more. So at the time he voted for the joint resolution to come immediately before this body he knew that it was coming up to certain defeat. Not only did he know it, but every Member who was interested in the question who desired to inquire must have known it. None of them seem uneasy about it to-day. All the uneasiness with regard to the defeat of this measure is among the Democratic Senators on this side who favor suffrage. There is not a voice on the other side of uneasiness and no assistance on the other side to keep from killing this measure or any suggestion whereby we can save it. And the Senator from Utah said we deceived him; that we made him believe that we had 31 votes. Yes; we did make him believe that we had 31 votes, and when we made him believe it he struck off one of his 33. He did not strike off one of his 33 until he believed we had an additional one on this side. Deceived him into believing we had 31! If we deceived him at all, it was to his advantage, because the information we put in his possession placed him in a position where he could work among his own colleagues on that side to get the 33 votes. The deception on our side, if there was any, could not injure him. He deceived us into believing that he had 33 votes, and induced us who had control of the measure to put it on the floor, knowing that it would be killed the moment it came to a vote.

There are two different kinds of deception. One is deception in holding the 33 votes, and the other in giving him the facts in aid of his own energies on the other side.

I am satisfied with the situation. I am satisfied with it all the way through. If the Senator thinks he has got any satisfaction out of the fact that this side has lost 1 vote, that the amendment now has 1 less vote than we thought it had, that it makes 34 votes necessary, let him take it. I suppose now that we have lost 1 vote he can safely offer the 33 votes, as with such votes the amendment would still die.

I wish to say that I am not attacking the sincerity of every advocate of universal suffrage on the other side. I do not know their position. I do know the position of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], because he has taken the pains to put it before the public himself. Whether he has deceived his own party as he has deceived the great National Woman's Suffrage Association, I do not know. The Republican Party has either got to stand by an agreement made by the leader of the suffrage cause on that side or, by the violation of their agreement, they have got to take the responsibility before the country of the death of this measure.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, the one thing I can not understand, the most puzzling circumstance about the question before us to-day, is the fear expressed by some of my distinguished southern colleagues that the bloom, the subtle charm, the loveliness, of women may disappear if they are permitted a voice in the affairs of their own Government.

Now, it may seem strange that a western man should rise in their defense, but many western men have, as I had, southern fathers and southern mothers, and so I can not refrain from saying that the record of the southern women during the Civil War and the reconstruction period should have forever removed that fear from their minds. Were they any the less charming, gentlemen, when they danced with you clad in homespun, with hands roughened by unaccustomed toil, before the lost cause went down in defeat? Were they any the less lovely to you afterwards when, their natural protectors killed in battle, they assumed the entire management of broken-down estates and, with the courage taught by the example of their men, conducted and managed with skill and intelligence the new work that fell to their hands?

Does deep human knowledge and wide experience destroy the bloom of womanhood to-day? Why, I have it at first hand that though women in England are doing a man's work while dispensing with a man's protection, they have never before been so charming to the men of their nation, not simply because these men are grateful, but because all sympathy is quickened between them. To which type of woman do you think the soldier would turn—the woman who has nursed the wounded back to life under fire, who understands his hardships because she has endured some of them herself, or the woman who has remained sheltered with idle hands while the world storm sweeps over the world?

More and more the men of the future will demand real mates—women who understand their political battles as well as their pitched battles, women with some intelligent knowledge of the affairs of state. This can only bring a greater sympathy and, consequently, a greater charm. To my mind, the greatest women the world has ever known were the pioneer women of the West, and the best type of western men owed their power of endurance, their incentive for creative work, to the quickening influence of woman's greatest charm—her understanding sympathy.

Perhaps, Mr. President, it is because the men and women of the West have been more truly mated that there the principles which gave birth to our Nation have first become a practical reality. Are the women of the South, then, of so frail a nature that their charms will take wings when burdened with responsibility of looking after their children's welfare in the political world as well as in the home? And are the southern men, after protecting their women valiantly during the reconstruction, now going to deny them the rights and privileges which other women enjoy, because, forsooth, they now are no longer equal to the task?

In those old days with ranks reduced by a four years' war, with new and unheard-of conditions, with a half-savage people criminally loosed upon your electorate, your achievement in bringing order out of chaos ranks in the world's first order. Are you to-day become so timid that with established regulations to control, a more civilized race to govern, you must place upon your women the humiliation of declaring them unfit for a voice in your Government?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Nevada that women are now voting in the Southern State of Texas and the Southern State of Arkansas, and in neither State has it affected the women unfavorably. On the other hand, it has affected those States most favorably. The women in Texas and Arkansas have taken enthusiastic advantage of the right to vote. It is universally admitted that the participation of women in elections has had a beneficial and uplifting effect in both the States of Arkansas and Texas. Neither has the fact of their voting accentuated the race problem in any way or added to its dangers. On the contrary, we feel that we are enormously benefited in having the added intelligence of white women to help us handle that problem.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to say also to the Senator that the adjacent State of Oklahoma is just on the point of voting for woman suffrage. Both political parties already have indorsed it, after having fully heard the arguments on both sides, and that is a Southern State also.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to thank the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Oklahoma for the information they have just given.

As I said, you become so timid that you must place upon women the humiliation of declaring them unfit to have a voice in our Government, for that is what you do when you refuse to pass this amendment. With 12 State constitutions almost impossible to amend, with 8 very difficult to amend, you send the women back to a position without civil recognition if you do not pass this amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it is quite evident that there is no opportunity to take a vote on the joint resolution to-day. I am reminded that a short executive session is desired, and after the executive business is attended to I shall then move that the Senate adjourn until Monday.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I withhold the motion for the present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Democratic and Republican parties in the State of Wisconsin held their respective State conventions a week ago last Tuesday, and in the platform of each there is a declaration in favor of the measure now pending before the Senate. I ask that the planks of the Republican and Democratic platforms be read into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask that they be read or printed in the RECORD?

Mr. LENROOT. I ask that they be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WISCONSIN WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION.

Woman-suffrage planks in Republican and Democratic State platforms adopted at Madison, Wis., September 17, 1918:

REPUBLICAN.

The splendid spirit of the helpfulness and efficient service of the women of the Nation in every activity has been thrown into bolder relief by the war emergencies. They have demonstrated anew their fitness for and right to equal opportunity in the conduct of the Government, and we therefore favor the extension of the elective franchise to women.

DEMOCRATIC.

To give recognition to the wonderful sacrifice and service of the women of America we approve President Wilson's recommendations for woman's suffrage by Federal amendment through ratification by the States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were opened, and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 30, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate September 28, 1918.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL.

Mark Storen to be United States marshal, district of Indiana.

UNITED STATES COAST GUARD.

First Lieut. Eugene Blake, jr., to be a captain.
Second Lieut. Philip F. Roach to be a first lieutenant.
Cadet Joseph Greenspun to be a third lieutenant.
Cadet Louis Waite Perkins to be a third lieutenant.
Cadet Lyndon Spencer to be a third lieutenant.
Cadet Raymond Thomas McElligott to be a third lieutenant.
Cadet Asa Vern Wilder to be a third lieutenant.
Cadet Robert Myer Kaufholz to be a third lieutenant.

The following-named second lieutenants to be first lieutenants:

William Patrick Kain,
James Marsden Earp,
Floyd Jesse Sexton,
Clement Joseph Todd,
Gustavus Urban Stewart,
Joseph Francis Farley, jr.,
David Patterson Marvin,
Carl Herbert Abel, and
Edwin Mount Webster.

The following-named first lieutenants to be captains:

John F. McGourty,
John J. Hutson,
Fred A. Nichols,
Charles F. Seiter,
Chester H. Jones,
William F. Towle,
Michael J. Ryan,
James Pine,
Warner K. Thompson,
Joseph R. Besse,
John P. Gray,
Paul H. Harrison,
William Williams,
John H. Cornell,
William Pitts Wishaar,
Gordon T. Finlay,
Louis L. Bennett, and
Roy P. Munro,

The following-named third lieutenants to be first lieutenants:

Frederick J. Birkett,
Norvin C. Smith, and Donald H. MacCollom.

The following-named first lieutenants of Engineers to be captains of Engineers:

John T. Carr,
Albert F. Patterson,
Webb C. Maglathlin,
Whitney M. Prall,
George W. Cairnes,
John F. Hahn,
Harvey F. Johnson,
Martin A. Doyle,
Norman B. Hall,
Sidney B. Orne,
Frank E. Bagger,
Philip B. Eaton,
Thomas H. Yaeger,
Alvan H. Bixby,
Charles E. Sugden,
Francis E. Fitch,
Charles J. Odend'hal,
Henry C. Roach,
Clinton P. Kendall,
Kurt W. Krafft, and Charles H. Johnson.

The following-named third lieutenants of Engineers to be first lieutenants of Engineers:
Charles T. Henley, jr.,
Edward F. Palmer,
Francis C. Wells, and
John N. Heiner.
First Lieut. of Engineers Byron A. Minor, retired, to be a captain of Engineers.
Cadet David F. Akers to be a third lieutenant.
Cadet Engineer William B. O'Brien to be a third lieutenant of Engineers.
First Lieut. Samuel P. Edmonds, retired, to be a captain on the retired list.

POSTMASTERS.

GEORGIA.

Wellborn J. Roberts, Arlington.
James A. Glodney, Bowdon.
Thomas E. Brown, Bremen.
Bedford McK. Harlan, Calhoun.
Annie K. Bunn, Cedartown.
John P. Turner, Columbus.
John S. McKenzie, Comer.
A. G. Hockenhull, Cumming.
Frank M. Meaders, Dahlonega.
Benjamin E. Croker, Dallas.
William H. McMillion, Demorest.
Afley M. Cherry, Donaldsonville.
Lemuel S. Peterson, Douglas.
L. M. Peacock, jr., Eastman.
Lonnie C. Brown, Elberton.
Richard D. Moore, Jefferson.
Henry T. Sewell, Lavonia.
Jennie S. Lester, Lexington.
Clifton O. Lloyd, Lindale.
James R. Dixon, Metter.
Willie A. Sheats, Monroe.
John T. Stilwell, Montezuma.
William M. McElroy, Norcross.
John H. Hodges, Perry.
Samuel H. Timmerman, Plains.
Walter R. Harrell, Quitman.
Merritt B. Brown, Richland.
James S. Alsobrook, Rossville.
Julia B. Fleming, Sparta.
Abner I. Head, Tallapoosa.
Harvey C. Bunn, Waycross.
Gilbert B. Banks, Waynesboro.

MAINE.

Alfred T. Hicks, Auburn.
Frederick W. Plaisted, Augusta.
Otha H. Jellison, Bar Harbor.
Guy L. Thurston, Bethel.
Harry Hinckley, Blue Hill.
Frank P. Davis, Bridgton.
Wallace O. Estes, Brooks,
Richard P. Harriman, Bucksport.
Patrick F. Welch, Calais.
Josiah H. Hobbs, Camden.
Fred S. Doyle, Caribou.
George F. Treat, Chisholm.
Frank J. Carsley, Dexter.
Minnie M. Holland, Dixfield.
Joseph A. Linscott, Farmington.
Everett P. Hanson, Gorham.
John S. Williams, Guilford.
John E. Murphy, Hallowell.
Dennis Sheehan, Houlton.
Ellsworth W. Sawyer, Kezar Falls.
Herbert L. Pinkham, Lincoln.
Willie B. Parlin, Machias.
Benjamin F. Pierce, Mars Hill.
Frank A. Millett, Mechanic Falls.
William I. Johnson, North Berwick.
Frank E. DeCoster, Norway.
Vivian E. Howe, Presque Isle.
Morrill McKenney, Richmond.
Howard E. Perkins, Sanford.
Clarence Mantor, Skowhegan.
Otis C. Verow, South Brewer.
Lindley L. Hamilton, Topsham.
Lee M. Treat, Vinal Haven.
Percy E. Storer, Waldoboro.
Frederick E. Mathews, Warren.
Charles M. Richardson, Waterville,
Clinton S. Eastman, Westbrook.
James B. Clark, Wiscasset.
Frank O. Wellcome, Yarmouth.
Edward C. Bridges, York Village.

NEW YORK.

Fred G. Burt, Adams Center.
William H. Barry, Carthage.
Peter T. Conley, Fulton.
Wesley J. Springstead, Haverstraw.
J. Edward Lyon, Naples.
Orin A. Skutt, North Rose.
James L. Hutchens, Pulaski.
Minnie C. Fellows, Scarsdale.
Myric M. Kelly, Sodus.
Henry S. Sutherland, White Plains.
Clarence E. Palmer, Willard.
Claude T. Metcalf, Wolcott.

TEXAS.

Tyre H. Brown, Lockhart.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 28, 1918.

The House was called to order by the Clerk of the House.
The CLERK OF THE HOUSE. The reading clerk will read the order from the Speaker designating the Speaker pro tempore.
The Clerk read as follows:

SEPTEMBER 28, 1918.

Hon. SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House:

I hereby assign the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FOSTER, to preside as Speaker to-day.

CHAMP CLARK, Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore took the chair.
The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:
We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee, our Father in heaven, for the great unanimity of purpose existing among the people of America to prosecute the war at whatever cost of means and men until a peace shall be secured which shall guarantee liberty and justice to all the peoples of all the world.
May the generosity and patriotism of our people continue, that the Government may not be hampered in its war program. May the heavy tax laid upon them be borne with patience, and may the new demand for liberty bonds be met with alacrity; and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.
The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the RECORD that Mr. WEAVER, of North Carolina, failed to answer to his name on roll calls during Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of this week. I wish to state that he has been confined in a hospital sick, and I desire further to ask leave of absence for him for four days on account of sickness.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for leave of absence for four days for his colleague, Mr. WEAVER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. J. Res. 175) to correct an error in the wording of the appropriation of $71,000 made in the act approved July 9, 1918, and to authorize the Secretary of War to pay said sum to the respective parties entitled thereto, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clase 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:
S. J. Res. 175. Joint resolution to correct an error in the wording of the appropriation of $71,000 made in the act approved July 9, 1918, and to authorize the Secretary of War to pay said sum to the respective parties entitled thereto, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 334) making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government for the month of October, 1918, and for other purposes.

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the months of July and August, 1918, and for other purposes," approved July 8, 1918, except so far as they relate to the support of the Army and of the District of Columbia, are extended and continued in full force and effect for and during the month of October, 1918.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this joint resolution is to make such provision for the Agricultural Department as may be necessary pending the final approval and passage of the two appropriation bills for that department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he has any information as to what the status of the Agricultural appropriation bill is in the Senate?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not the slightest. I have not been able to follow it. I have been continuously engaged in my own work in connection with the deficiency bill. The month is about to expire, and in the absence of this joint resolution, after the end of the month, there will be no provision of law whereby any of these activities could be continued. I have assumed that these bills will become laws some time during the present month, and, by the terms of the original resolution which this pending resolution extends for the further month, upon their becoming the law the effect of the resolution ceases.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, of course this method of supplying the departments of the Government is rather a lame one, and if there is any way to get the Senate to pass the appropriation bills before the end of the month it should be done.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, that suggestion pertains to the gentlemen who are in charge of these regular agricultural bills. As chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, it is my duty to continue the Government even if other committees having charge of appropriation bills fail to come to an agreement with the Senate touching regular appropriations.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman will yield, has this bill gone to conference, or is it still in the Senate?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not undertaken to follow the details of it. I think, however, it is in the Senate.

Mr. GILLETT. I am told it has not been reported by the Senate committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky for the present consideration of this resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

COMBATING "SPANISH INFLUENZA."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration House joint resolution 333.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 333) to aid in combating the disease known as "Spanish influenza."

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Public Health Service to combat and suppress the disease known as "Spanish influenza" by aiding State and local boards of health, or otherwise, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,000,000, to be available until June 30, 1919.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury are authorized and directed, respectively, to utilize the personnel and facilities of the Medical Department of the Army, the Medical Department of the Navy, and the Public Health Service, so far as possible, in aiding to combat and suppress the said disease.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if this consent is given I propose to offer several amendments which will enlarge the scope of the resolution so as to give authority for the expenditure of money for combating not only the disease known as "Spanish influenza" but other communicable diseases. The House is probably fully aware of the situation that has arisen in the country, and particularly in the State of Massachusetts in connection with this disease. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] introduced the resolution which has just been read, and the Public Health Service has communicated with me, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, touching the situation that confronts them and confronts the country. There is necessarily as a result of the war and the demand that has been made upon the medical profession a shortage of physicians in the country. If the physicians in localities are left alone to deal with this situation they will not be able to cope with it, and it is believed that the Public Health Service, by mobilization of the physicians from the various sections of the country, can, by putting them in districts where the disease is worst, control it. The disease is of such a character that it seems to expend itself in localities within a limited time, and then it appears in other sections.

The need of these funds seems to be urgent. I believe that Congress would not be justified in refusing to take action touching this matter at this time. It not only is a situation which might affect, as it has, the Army in certain localities, but if it is permitted to become general it would have a very great effect in reducing the productive capacity of the country, to say nothing of the loss of life that might result from it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say that the purpose was, if consent was given, to broaden the scope?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the gentleman permit stating that now?

Mr. SHERLEY. With the permission of the House I would be glad to have read the joint resolution as it would read if amended as I propose to ask to have it amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 333) to aid in combating "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases.

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Public Health Service to combat and suppress "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases by aiding State and local boards of health, or otherwise, including pay and allowances of medical and sanitary personnel, medical and hospital supplies, printing, clerical services, and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, transportation, freight, and such other expenses as may be necessary, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,000,000, to be available until June 30, 1919.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury are authorized and directed, respectively, to utilize jointly the personnel and facilities of the Medical Department of the Army, the Medical Department of the Navy, and the Public Health Service, so far as possible, in aiding to combat and suppress the said diseases.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, as I suggested, the effect of the change is simply to broaden it so as to have this fund available for any other communicable disease that might arise, and there is certain language put in there in order to make clear the power in regard to pay and allowances, and medical and sanitary personnel, and so forth.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. As I caught the reading of the resolution, the appropriation is available only to the Public Health Service.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true.

Mr. ANDERSON. I was wondering whether it was necessary to make any appropriation covering the medical departments of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. I think they have ample funds that will be available with the assistance that will come through the Public Health Service.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman thinks the appropriations that are available generally for the medical departments of the Army and Navy will be sufficient?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no doubt about that; but the epidemic appropriation we carry for the Public Health Service is by the terms of the statute limited to certain specified diseases, and the Congress has never heretofore seen fit to enlarge that into a fund to be available for any sort of disease, because it might in peace times lead to the building up of a very great corps of officials under the Public Health Service; but, as this is limited in amount and for a particular period of time, it seemed wise to broaden it so as to deal with any communicable disease that might arise within that period of time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has the Public Health Service asked for this legislation?

Mr. SHERLEY. They have.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. I understood from his statement that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] introduced the resolution and the Public Health Service approved it.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true, and the other statement is also true. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], knowing that the situation was so acute in his State, introduced the resolution, but the Public Health Service themselves, on their own initiative, came to me, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and urged not the consideration of this resolution but the passage of some resolution that would give them this amount of money for this work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. I did not introduce that until after the Public Health Service had expressed their desire for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that this resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Line 4, strike out the words "the disease known as," and in the same line, after the words "Spanish influenza," insert the words "and other communicable diseases."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Line 5, page 1, after the word "otherwise," insert "including pay and allowances of medical and sanitary personnel, medical and hospital supplies, printing, clerical services, and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, transportation, freight, and such other expenses as may be necessary."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Page 1, line 11, after the word "utilize," insert the word "jointly." In line 15, strike out the word "disease" and insert "diseases." Amend the title to read: "Joint resolution to aid in combating 'Spanish influenza' and other communicable diseases."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what does the word "jointly" cover?

Mr. GILLETT. The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury, jointly.

Mr. SHERLEY. The language will read, as amended:

That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury are authorized and directed, respectively, to utilize jointly the personnel and facilities of the Medical Department of the Army, the Medical Department of the Navy, and the Public Health Service, so far as possible, in aiding to combat and suppress the said diseases.

Mr. CANNON. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the passage of the resolution as amended.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me one moment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am very heartily in sympathy with this resolution and the purposes of it. I trust that it may never again be said that there has been any sectional opposition to a request by the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman refers to me, of course I represent only one section of the State of Massachusetts. But this resolution is not offered in behalf of the State of Massachusetts. It is a measure for the benefit of the whole country. The city of Washington is suffering to-day from this disease, and while perhaps it appeared first in Massachusetts, being brought across the ocean, it is just as dangerous to the gentleman's section as it is to my own.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Precisely so, and because we recognize that fact we are very glad to join in combating it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not control of the time.

Mr. CANNON. If I may utter just a single sentence, this disease, like other diseases, knows no State boundaries.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And I might also suggest to the gentleman that the majority leader on that side of the House, we regret to hear, is suffering from it.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; and the Speaker is suffering from the disease. So it obviously is not sectional.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the title be amended in accordance with the text.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be amended in accordance with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech delivered last night in New York by the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech delivered last night by the President of the United States in New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FIRE DEPARTMENT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11231, creating the double platoon system for the fire department of the District of Columbia, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11231, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title. The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11231) to regulate the hours of duty of officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky when did this measure pass? When did it pass the House, and when did it pass the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It passed the House April 2, 1918, and it passed the Senate July 8, 1918.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that this resolution came to the House on yesterday. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker pro tempore, through the Clerk, announced the following as the conferees on the part of the House: Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. CROSSER, and Mr. CARY.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to read the telegram that I send to the desk.

Mr. WALSH. What is it about? I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

CREDIT TO THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12998. I wish to say that I do not think it will take more than 10 minutes to pass this bill. If anyone wishes to object to it after the bill is explained, he can take that responsibility.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12998) to amend section 3528 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. CANNON. What is it about?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the bill? The title just refers to some provision of the Revised Statutes, and nobody is acquainted with it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If the gentleman will kindly reserve his objection, I will explain the bill as well as I can.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I can not consent to a new bill being taken up here under the circumstances. I have no objection to the bill, but there is a special rule pending covering the order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If the gentleman from Tennessee will withhold his objection for five minutes, I think the bill can be passed in that time. If it is not passed in that time and he then wishes to object I shall have no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Go ahead, but I shall reserve the right to object.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill amends section 3528 of the Revised Statutes. It simply seeks to increase the credit of the Director of the Mint with the Treasury Department.

I want to say to the House that the Treasury Department is very anxious that this bill shall be passed at once, because the volume of the coinage of the mint has increased to such an extent that the credit is now entirely inadequate to the present needs of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Is this bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. ASHBROOK. It is.

Mr. GILLETT. Then I object. I do not think we ought to have consideration to-day of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

EMERGENCY POWER BILL.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the power bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will not the gentleman allow me to have this telegram read? It will take only a minute.

Mr. SIMS. I insist on my motion. The gentleman can put his telegram in later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the emergency power bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12776, known as the emergency power bill, with Mr. HOUSTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12776. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12776) to provide further for the national security and defense and for the more effective prosecution of the war by furnishing means for the better utilization of the existing sources of electrical and mechanical power and for the development of new sources of such power, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Two amendments are pending.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] might get some time on that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized as opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. When we closed last evening there were really three propositions presented to the committee. One was the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] to incorporate the word "carbonizing" before the word "lignite."

Mr. HAMLIN. That amendment was adopted. And then the amendment that was pending was the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to strike out——

Mr. ESCH. All after the word "necessary."

Mr. HAMLIN. All after the word "necessary."

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] also has an amendment pending to strike out the words "the carbonizing of lignite."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Let us have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 4, line 9, after the word "necessary," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. ESCH. That amendment should come after an amendment which has already been adopted, following the word "necessary." That amendment was to insert the words:

For the purpose of increasing the production of war materials and meeting emergencies arising from war conditions.

So the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa would come in after the word "conditions."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Wisconsin is correct. I had overlooked that momentarily when my amendment was offered. I ask unanimous consent to change my amendment to strike out all after the word "conditions."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as stated by him. The Clerk will report his amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 4, after the word "conditions," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. In what line?

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "conditions" in the amendment offered by Mr. SNELL, which was agreed to, strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, before debate begins I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment or any other amendment to subsection (1) of section 2 be closed in 15 minutes. We debated the same subject quite a while yesterday.

Mr. CANNON. I wish the gentleman would make it 20 minutes. I do not think I will use all of my 5 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Make it 20 minutes, so that the gentleman from Illinois may have 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee please restate his request?

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment and all other amendments to subsection (1) of section 2 close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto and to subsection (1) of section 2 close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not think I shall occupy all of the time allotted me. I simply want to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and also the amendment offered by my good friend from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, which is to strike out the word "lignite." The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], if adopted, will be to preclude the Government from utilizing any of the by-products derived from the coking of coal or from the utilization of lignite in any way. Yesterday afternoon, in a little colloquy which I had with him, I suggested that it would not be right to waste the by-products produced in burning the fuel necessary to create the power which the Government so much needs, and must have, at this time. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] said:

Oh, what is the gentleman thinking of? Does not the gentleman know that these by-products are being wasted now?

Mr. HAMLIN. Ought they to be wasted?

The gentleman from Iowa answered "no." However, in the revision of his remarks for the RECORD this morning he changed that answer, as he had a right to do, so as to read:

I do not know. Not if there is any use for them.

Then I said:

Why not save them, then?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If you have any use for them, it would be well to save them, but you have not any use for them. The Government is getting all these materials it wants now—

And so forth.

Then I said:

We have been importing millions of dollars' worth of these by-products every year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

I was not mistaken in my statement, provided the information given to me is true, and I take it for granted that it is true. In corroboration of my statement I want to read an extract from a hearing had before the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. CANNON. By whom?

Mr. HAMLIN. By Mr. Darling. I propounded this question to him, and this was what was said:

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought I understood from this statement, Mr. Darling, that there were some by-products to be gotten—perhaps you have mentioned it—that formed the basis of certain dyes.

This is in reference to the statement of lignite.

Mr. DARLING. Yes; that comes from the oils and tars. Aniline dyes come from the lighter oils, and other dyes from the heavy oils.

Mr. HAMLIN. Haven't we been short on those things in this country?

Mr. MANNING. We have been very short on the benzol, which is the next step in coal-tar production. In other words, there are tens of thousands of by-products from coal and many more thousands of compounds. We go from the base coal to coal tar, then to benzol. Then you branch out to your aniline dyes, to your explosives, to your perfumes, to your medicines, to your prussian blues, etc.

Mr. DARLING. Germany before the war—we paid over $22,000,000 per year for coal-tar products that she sent in to us. Now we have got to turn the tables the other way.

I shall read a little further in a moment, but I want to stop here to say that if Mr. Darling is correct that absolutely corroborates my statement which I made yesterday, that we have been importing millions of dollars worth of these coal-tar products that we can get from the carbonization of lignite and the coking of bituminous coal.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What I corrected the gentleman about yesterday was to say that we had not been importing these things since the war. What the gentleman has read from the hearings was before the war.

Mr. HAMLIN. Neither did I say that we have been importing millions of dollars worth since we got into the war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. You said "we are."

Mr. HAMLIN. No; I said "we were," or at least that is what I meant to say, and certainly the gentleman should not have misunderstood me, because I said in the same connection that we could not import them now, because we have to use the ships for other purposes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The real reason why we are not importing them is not the lack of ships, but because we are able to produce these dyes in this country, due largely to the protective tariff on dyes, which we passed recently.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely mistaken. That tariff has not been changed one iota since we got into this war, and we were importing an average of $22,000,000 of these tar products before the war, bringing them from Germany, but we are not doing it now.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The beginning of the dye industry in this country was after the passage of the so-called Payne bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not care to go into the history of the dye industry. I am only interested in one fact, that we were importing $22,000,000 worth of these products before the war from Germany. We are not doing it now. That is not due to the tariff, but a lack of ships and because we would not trade with Germany, and that very fact has forced us to produce as best we may our own dyes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We are producing to-day about 200 colors, and we had plenty of ships when the Hill bill was passed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, to continue reading from the hearings:

Mr. HAMLIN. And we have got the raw material to do it with, if we only develop it.

Mr. DARLING. Yes, sir; and the man who builds a beehive from now on ought to be taken out and strung to a limb. And the processes are not difficult. I think the patents on these aniline dyes have expired and the chemists know the way to get these things. It is just a question of putting money in and getting them.

Mr. MANNING. Prior to the war the United States depended absolutely upon German dyes. The statement had been made that the United States would have to depend upon its own dye industry, and Secretary Lane called a conference in his office of some 23 of the chemical manufacturers of the country, and some of the textile manufacturers, to consider what aid the Government could give to the development of a dye industry, and the only suggestion that they made at that time was a protective tariff provision.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And which Congress in its wisdom passed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not since the war.

Mr. Manning continues:

I made the statement to controvert that suggestion, that if the war with Germany lasted two years the United States would build up its own industry and be independent of Germany.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is just what I said.

Mr. HAMLIN. But it will not be due to the tariff.

Mr. CANNON. The war makes it prohibitive.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes. If the gentleman says that the war operates as a prohibitive tariff I am going to agree with him. I think the interests of the country are now enjoying a greater protection than in all their previous history, and it is not due to a protective tariff, but due to the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, I am not going to be diverted into a tariff discussion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pause a moment, it has been claimed by the Democratic campaign committee that the credit of the dye industry is by reason——

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, the gentleman can not lead me into the discussion of political questions when we are considering an important measure for the prosecution of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky). The present occupant of the chair has just taken the chair, but is told that there was an arrangement for 20 minutes debate, and that the division of time has been arranged for.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the Chair is correct, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for one minute on the subject of the fourth liberty loan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks for one minute to address the committee on the fourth liberty loan. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, acting with our allies, we must win the world war and win it quickly.

Gen. March has told us that it is possible to end the war in 1919 if we can get an army large enough in the field soon enough. It is proposed to send to France by the summer of 1919 an Army of at least 4,000,000 of men. An early victory will greatly depend upon how thoroughly and speedily we equip and supply this vast body of soldiers with all of the essentials of successful warfare.

The main essentials of succesful warfare are men and money. The selective-draft system is furnishing us with the men to form a grand and victorious army. It remains for us who stay behind to furnish all the money that is needed to equip and sustain these men with all that is necessary to help them win the great struggle for liberty, humanity, and civilization.

A sacred and solemn obligation rests upon each and every one of us to aid the fourth liberty loan to the full extent of his ability. Every adult person in this Republic should buy at least one bond, of small or large denomination. No one should plead poverty or be guilty of neglect in this hour of national peril.

Two great considerations should stimulate enormously the sale of the new issue of liberty bonds. The first is personal and selfish, the second is purely patriotic. In the first place, the liberty loan is the best and safest financial investment that can be made. Backed as it is by the wealth of the richest country in the world, the liberty loan stands without a peer. It is the premier bond of the world. Based on reliable statistics, the wealth of the United States is estimated at $230,000,000,000, with an annual estimated income of $40,000,000,000.

In 47 years the population of our country has increased 72,000,000, and for the same period its wealth has increased $200,000,000,000, equivalent to over $2,800 for each of the 72,000,000 increased population.

To put the figures in another form—in 1870:

Wealth of United States (estimated)	$30,000,000,000
Total debt of United States	$2,330,000,000
Wealth of United States per capita	$780
Debt of United States per capita	$60
Population of United States	38,000,000

At the present time:

Wealth of the United States (estimated)	$230,000,000,000
Total debt of United States, including liberty loans of 1917 (approximately)	$9,500,000,000
Wealth of United States per capita	$2,250
Debt of United States per capita	$86.50
Population of United States (estimated)	110,000,000

The increase from 1870 to date:

Total wealth	$200,000,000,000
Wealth per capita	$1,470
Population	72,000,000

The wealth is now about seven and two-thirds times greater than in 1870, and the national debt has increased only about four times. In comparison to the wealth, the debt is quite small and would be comparatively small if doubled, tripled, or quadrupled. Even if the present debt were quadrupled, it would then amount to only just the income of our country in one year. This income, be it remembered, is about $40,000,000,000, representing a net annual increase in the national wealth of several billions of dollars.

The backbone, the head, and heart of our financial and industrial system is the banking power of the United States. Measured by all its resources this power exceeds $40,500,000,000. In the grand total of this power are the resources of 7,688 national banks and 20,423 State banks, trust companies, and savings institutions. The national banks of the United States have total resources in excess of $18,200,000,000, and the State banks and other financial institutions of more than $22,275,000,000.

The New York banking system, with total resources of approximately $10,890,000,000, more than one-fourth of the entire banking resources of the country, occupies first place. Pennsylvania, with $3,840,000,000, holds second place.

The total supply of capital, approximately estimated, in the United States in 1913 was $6,500,000,000; in 1915, $8,000,000,000; in 1916, $15,000,000,000; and in 1917, $18,200,000,000.

The Federal Reserve System has now a gold reserve of more than $2,000,000,000, the very greatest gold reserve ever held by any banking system in the world at any time.

All this colossal wealth and unexampled financial strength have been derived from our marvelous agricultural and industrial resources and activities.

The Department of Agriculture estimates that the crop of spring and winter wheat for 1918 will approximate 899,000,000 bushels, nearly 250,000,000 bushels more than was produced in 1917.

As wheat and other cereals form the basis of our agricultural greatness, iron and coal are the foundation of our industrial prosperty and strength. In 1917, the United States alone produced more coal than England, France, Germany, and Belgium combined produced in 1913, the year before the war began. We also smeltered more pig iron and produced more steel than all these countries together.

Our metal and mineral resources are the marvel of the world. More than half the estimated iron ore of the earth is in North America, and four-fifths of all this is imbedded in the boundaries of the United States.

Whether we consider the foundations of our prosperity, the earth and the richness and fullness thereof, or our accumulated wealth of money, and all forms of financial credits, our strength is and will remain unbroken and unparalleled.

The figures that I have given you relating to the wealth of our country and its annual income should convince you that a liberty-bond investment is the safest and soundest in the world. A war of 20 years would not destroy its value as a security. It is the premier bond of the world, a direct obligation, a first mortgage on the resources of the wealthiest country on the earth, and is, moreover, almost free from taxation, State or Federal.

The first great consideration, heretofore referred to, which should stimulate and sustain the sale of liberty bonds, has been discussed and figures have been given. The personal and selfish motives of the purchasers of these bonds have been considered, and it has been shown that no safer, sounder investment can be made than that offered by the liberty loan.

A second great consideration ignores the selfish and materialistic point of view, and appeals direct to the conscience and to the patriotism of all of our people. In the final analysis this is the supreme consideration. It scorns all mercenary feelings and appeals to the noblest and grandest in our natures. It places the man above the dollar, humanity above wealth, and our country above our pocketbooks. It subjects all vulgar passions at once to the great principle of love.

No cowardly impulse, no sectional selfishness, no narrow view of patriotism, no partisan prejudice, no sordid stinginess should ever remotely influence our conduct in private or public life when providing for the common defense and promoting the general welfare of our country. Rather let us invoke at all times the lofty and patriotic spirit of the Revolutionary fathers and of the saviors of the later Republic, who held no cost too heavy and no sacrifice too great when the sacred rights of humanity were to be proclaimed and the great cause of liberty was to be defended and maintained.

I repeat that no other considerations should be urged and no other inducements offered than the desire for private gain and the great love of the Republic to cause speedy and enormous sales of the fourth liberty loan bonds. Let us oversubscribe this issue a hundredfold, if need be, as a message to Germany and to the world that America is patriotic to the core and that a most perfect unity in intention and high resolve animates our people.

CAUSES OF THE WAR.

As I understand the meaning of this war, it is not a mere conflict of physical forces, of millions of men contending in deadly combat on battle fields and in battle trenches. It is a mighty conflict between contending principles in government, between modes of thought, and forms of philosophy. It is, in the main, a gigantic contest between democracy and free institutions on the one hand and monarchy and military despotism on the other hand. It is even more than this. It is a colossal struggle in which world freedom and the rights of small States to exist are fundamentally involved.

The assassination of an Austrian grand duke by a simple-minded, fanatical Serbian youth was the beginning, but not the cause of the great world war. It was simply the match that lit the flame that threw the world into conflagration. The elemental causes of the war are to be found deeply imbedded in German military philosophy, in Prussian despotism and desire for world dominion, in a false and fraudulent diplomacy handed down from the days of Frederick the Great, and in the belief of the German Kaiser that he is the anointed of God and that the German people are the chosen seed. These intellectual principles, these spiritual elements formed the fertile soil in which was germinated the world catastrophe and from which it received its budding and its blossoming.

While a student at the University of Berlin some 20 years ago I heard Heinrich von Treitschke lecture. Treitschke was professor of history in the University of Berlin, and used his position to propagate his political principles. His style was elegant and beautiful and the war philosophy that he proclaimed was at once brilliant and bitter. The substance of this philosophy was that war is a biological necessity and an ordinance of God. Among the more striking statements in his works are these:

War is both justifiable and moral, and the ideal of perpetual peace is not only impossible but immoral as well.

The living God will take care that war shall always return as a terrible medicine for the human race.

Among all political sins the sin of feebleness is the most contemptible; it is the political sin against the Holy Ghost.

Treitschke was called by the Kaiser "our national historian," and it is not inaccurate or unfair to describe him as the real founder of the world war, for his radical war philosophy, proclaimed in his lectures and in his writings, permeated all German intellectual life and gave strength and impetus to all the war movements of Germany. "His works," says one writer, "became cyclopedias of patriotism, and, being vigorously and entertainingly written, were and are widely read. Their aphorisms have become a part of German political scripture, their philosophy the creed of German statesmen."

My recollections of Treitschke are as fresh and vivid as if I had heard him but yesterday, and I remember the surprise and horror with which I listened to the unfolding of his brilliant and bitter war philosophy in which he proclaimed the doctrine of biological necessity and of the immorality of seeking to abolish that which God had ordained. On all the war fronts of Europe, America and the allies are fighting the teachings of Treitschke embodied in the armies of the Kaiser.

The teachings of Treitschke are founded upon the thoughts and sayings as well as the deeds and acts of Frederick the Great and of Bismarck, the arch progenitors of Prussian militarism and despotism. Treitschke boldly proclaimed that public and private morality were not the same, and that States were justified in doing things that would be considered immoral in individuals. He justified this contention by the statement in a letter from Frederick the Great to his minister, Radziwill, in which occurs this sentence:

If there is anything to be gained by it, we will be honest; if deception is necessary, let us be cheats.

Frederick the Great told Voltaire, who taught him French and good manners, that truth and honesty were things for priests and ministers but not for warriors and statesmen. We are fighting this ignoble doctrine on all the battle fields and in all the battle trenches of Europe to-day.

In his first inaugural address, in 1789, Washington made this declaration:

The foundation of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality.

In this war we are pitting George Washington against Frederick the Great, and—you will excuse me for saying it—I have bet all my money on George Washington.

The fine sentiment of Washington was reflected in this sentence from the address of President Wilson in his message to Congress of April 2, 1917:

> We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized States.

One of the great purposes of this war is to justify Washington and Wilson and brand with eternal condemnation Frederick the Great of Prussia by establishing the doctrine that there is no difference between public and private morality, and that States are not justified in doing what is immoral among individual citizens.

Treitschke taught and Germany believes that a war waged for the purpose of destroying small States and "molding separate fragments into one great political unit," even if a war of conquest, is justifiable. America and the allies deny this and are fighting for the rights of small States to continue to exist and to be happy. The American doctrine is illustrated by the existence of Cuba at our very doors, a Lilliputian Republic, not larger than a Texas county, but as independent and happy as any empire or commonwealth on earth. The German doctrine is illustrated by outraged and mutilated Belgium, whose international rights Germany had pledged herself to protect, but whose treaty was converted into "a scrap of paper," because Germany did not believe that Belgium had a real right to exist if it pleased Germany to destroy her.

Treitschke's cruel theory of war is approved and echoed in the literature of Germany by his contemporaries, as well as by those who followed him.

Bernhardi, in his work entitled "Germany and the Next War," says:

> War is a biological necessity of the first importance, a regulative element in the life of mankind which can not be dispensed with, since without it an unhealthy development will follow which excludes every advancement of the race, and therefore all civilization.

Again, he says:

> Efforts directed toward the abolition of war must not only be termed foolish but absolutely immoral, and must be stigmatized as absolutely unworthy of the human race.

Numerous other German writers, warriors, and statesmen teach the same cruel and merciless philosophy.

Haeckle taught that "force takes priority over right."

Clausman says:

> All idea of philanthropy in war is a pernicious error.

Gen. Hartman said:

> When the national war breaks forth, terrorism becomes a necessary military principle.

Erzberger is quoted as saying in the Reichstag:

> This war ought to be as pitiless as possible.

Again, one of the great causes of this war is Pan-Germanism, that would acquire the territories and destroy the political independence of smaller States by force of arms. Many German writers and statesmen are bold in their assertion of this right as a matter of supreme necessity in the inevitable growth of great central States.

Gen. Wrochem, at a meeting of the German Defense League at Danzig, March, 1913, said:

> A developing, onward-striving people like ourselves requires new land for its energies; and if peace will not secure it, then war only remains.

J. L. Reimer, in a work entitled "Ein Pangermanisches Deutschland" (A Pan German Germany), writes in 1905:

> It is precisely our craving for expansion that drives us into the paths of conquest, and in view of which all chatter about peace and humanity can and must remain nothing but chatter.

Klaus Wagner, in his work Kreig or War, in 1906, writes:

> Let us bravely organize great forced migrations of the inferior peoples. Posterity will be grateful to us. We must coerce them. This is one of the tasks of war; the means must be superiority of armed force. Superficially such forced migrations and the penning up of inconvenienced peoples in narrow "reserves" may appear hard, but it is the only solution of the race question that is worthy of humanity. * * * Thus alone can the overpopulation of the earth be controlled; the efficient peoples must secure themselves elbow room by means of war, and the inefficient must be hemmed in and at last driven into reserves where they have no room to grow * * * and where, discouraged and rendered indifferent to the future by the spectacle of the superior energy of their conquerors, they may crawl slowly toward the peaceful death of weary and hopeless senility.

This merciless philosophy and ambition of Pan Germanism is one of the great causes of this war. We may assert it with truth to be the great paramount cause, for Pan Germanism is the great comprehensive principle that includes all minor causes.

Again, we are fighting the theory of the divine right of kings to rule the peoples of the earth. Cromwell and his Ironsides thought they had destroyed this theory forever when they beheaded a Stuart king—Charles the First of England. But we have the doctrine more boldly and brazenly proclaimed than ever in the wild and insane pretentions of William of Germany. The following is a passage from the proclamation of the Kaiser to the Army of the East in 1914, after the beginning of the great war:

> Remember that you are the chosen people! The Spirit of the Lord has descended upon me, because I am the Emperor of the Germans!
>
> I am the instrument of the Almighty. I am his sword, his agent. Woe and death to all those who shall oppose my will! Woe and death to those who do not believe in my mission! Woe and death to the cowards!
>
> Let them perish, all the enemies of the German people! God demands their destruction; God, who, by my mouth, bids you to do His will!

This sounds like Mohammed and the Koran. No wonder the Germans could conclude so easily a treaty with the Turks. Place this passage in the middle of the Koran and it would require the genius and learning of an oriental scholar to tell where Mahomet ended and William began.

The principles asserted in this proclamation of the Kaiser are in complete antagonism to the principles proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence, when it is said that "all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed." In this war we are pitting the Declaration of Independence against the proclamation of the Kaiser, and, again, I have my money on the Declaration of Independence.

The German Kaiser and German statesmen deny that Germany desired this war or began it, but the facts of history completely refute their contention. Besides, a secret official document filed at Berlin, in the German war office, in 1913, reads, in part, as follows:

> Neither ridiculous shriekings for revenge by French Chauvinists nor the Englishman's gnashing of teeth nor the wild gestures of the Slav will turn us from our aim of protecting and extending German influence all over the world. It is our sacred duty to sharpen the sword that has been put into our hands and to hold it ready for offense as well as for defense. * * * We must accustom them (our people) to think that an offensive war on our part is a necessity. We must stir up troubles in the north of Africa and in Russia. In the next European war it will also be necessary that the small States shall be forced to follow us or be subdued. In certain conditions their armies and their fortified places can be rapidly conquered or neutralized. This would probably be the case with Belgium and Holland.

This official document, filed a year before the war began, speaks of stirring up trouble in Africa and in Russia. The whole tone and tenor of the report indicates a spirit of aggression and a willingness to begin war upon the slightest provocation or upon no provocation whatever.

HOW THE WAR CAME TO AMERICA.

I have been discussing the meaning of the war as it relates to European nations. I have outlined briefly the underlying principles that caused Germany to declare war upon her neighbors and to tear up her treaty with Belgium like a scrap of paper. I have tried to show that Pan Germanism, rabid and rampant, availed itself of the simple pretext of the killing of an Austrian grand duke, and of the consequent troubles of her ally, Austria, with Serbia, troubles that could have been easily settled by fair and impartial statesmanship, to throw the world into convulsions.

I now come to a brief discussion of how the war came to America. After all, this phase of the discussion will interest us most keenly. Intelligent people everywhere are already thoroughly familiar with the causes of our participation in the world conflict and a detailed analysis and discussion of these causes are not necessary. Suffice it to say that the submarine policy of the German Government, resulting in the violation of our international rights and in the murder of our citizens upon the high seas, brought America into the conflict.

The chronological order of events, as related to the U-boat campaign, leading up to a declaration of war by America against Germany, is as follows:

1. December 24, 1914: Admiral von Tirpitz threw out hints in a newspaper interview of a wholesale torpedoing policy.
2. February 4, 1915: The German Government proclaimed a war zone, within which any ship might be sunk unwarned.
3. February 10, 1915: Mr. Wilson told the German Government that it would be held to a "strict accountability" if any American rights were violated in that way.
4. April 22, 1915: The German Embassy published in New York newspapers a warning against taking passage on ships which our Government had told our people that they had a perfect right to take.
5. May 7, 1915: The Lusitania was sunk.
6. May 13, 1915: Mr. Wilson wrote his "first Lusitania" note.
7. May 28, 1915: Germany made reply, defending the sinking of the Lusitania.
8. June 9, 1915: Mr. Wilson wrote his "second Lusitania" note.
9. July 21, 1915: Mr. Wilson wrote his "third Lusitania" note, following more unsatisfactory German rejoinders.

10. August 19, 1915: The Arabic was sunk, whereupon Von Bernstorff gave an oral pledge for his Government that thereafter German submarines would not sink "liners" without warning.

11. March 24, 1916: The Sussex was sunk, a passenger vessel with Americans on board.

12. April 10, 1916: Germany cynically told the United States that she could not be sure whether she sank the Sussex or not, although admitting that one of her submarines was active close to the place of disaster.

13. April 18, 1916: President Wilson threatened Germany with breach of diplomatic relations if Sussex and similar incidents were repeated.

14. May 4, 1916: Germany grudgingly made the promise that ships would not be sunk without warning.

15. January 31, 1917: Germany tore up her promise and notified Mr. Wilson that she would begin "unrestricted submarine warfare."

16. February 3, 1917: Mr. Wilson gave Count Bernstorff his passport and recalled Ambassador Gerard from Berlin.

Diplomatic relations had now been broken, and we were in a state of armed neutrality. War might still have been avoided if still other American ships had not been sunk, as follows:

17. March 16, 1917: The Vigilancia, an American vessel, was sunk and five Americans were lost.

18. March 21, 1917: The Healdton, an American vessel, was sunk and seven Americans were lost.

19. April 1, 1917: The Aztec, an American vessel, was sunk and 28 Americans were lost.

Some of these vessels were outside the prohibited German war zone. Some of them were coming home, were without cargoes of any kind, and were sunk in a spirit of pure wantonness and frightfulness.

In all, up to our declaration of war against Germany, 226 American citizens, many of them women and children, lost their lives by the action of German submarines, and in most cases without the faintest color of international right.

Nothing remained for a red-blooded Congress, representing a brave and self-respecting people, to do but declare war upon an outlaw nation that was unwilling to respect the binding obligations of international law, and that had shown an utter disregard for the simplest rights of humanity and for the plainest precepts of civilization.

If the direct and immediate cause of our declaration of war against Germany be asked, answer may be given that Germany murdered our citizens upon the high seas, in violation of our well-defined international rights.

It is the primary duty, the sacred and solemn obligation of any nation to protect the lives of its citizens, and the nation that will not perform this duty and fulfill this obligation is not entitled to the respect and support of its citizens.

Once, at a Grand Army of the Republic celebration, Col. Ingersoll used this strikingly beautiful and brilliant sentence:

> A country that will not protect its citizens is a disgrace to the map of the world. A flag that will not defend its defenders is no better than a dirty rag, is an insult to the skies, and contaminates the very air in which it floats.

This has been the sentiment of every brave and masterful race of this earth. It was the sentiment of ancient Rome. It is the sentiment of modern England, modern France, modern Germany, modern America. It will be the sentiment of every brave and self-respecting nation until its citizens become degenerates and cowards.

In ancient times, when a Roman citizen was captured by barbarians or pirates, it was only necessary for him to pick up the hem of his toga, the peculiar dress of a Roman and the symbol of his Roman citizenship, and shake it at the barbarians, using three words, "Civis romanus sum"—I am a Roman citizen—to guarantee his safe escort to Rome. I want the time to come soon in the history of my country when an American captured by bandits in Mexico will only have to throw his head back proudly and defiantly and say "I am an American citizen" to guarantee his safe escort to the Rio Grande.

Aside from the murder of our cititzens we were justified in declaring war against Germany upon the ground of national self-defense. In recent years Germany has not hesitated to express her contempt for America and to throw out hints of defiance and use expressions equivalent to threats. She has derided our civilization, mocked our national pretensions, and refused to acknowledge the Monroe doctrine; and, as an official defiance, the Kaiser recently told Ambassador Gerard that after this war Germany would stand no nonsense from America. This itself was equivalent to an imperial threat against our country.

On the 24th of September, 1917, in the United States Senate, Senator LEWIS quoted Admiral Dewey as reporting the following statement as made by the German admiral, Von Goetzen, to him at Manila in 1898:

> About 15 years from now (1913) my country will start a great war. She will be in Paris about two months after the commencement of hostilities. Her move on Paris will be but a step to her real object—the crushing of England. Some months after we finish our work in Europe we will take New York, and probably Washington, and hold them for some time. We will put your country in its place with reference to Germany. We do not purpose to take any of your territory, but we do intend to take a billion or so of your dollars from New York and other places. The Monroe doctrine will be taken charge of by us, and we will dispose of South America as we wish. Don't forget this—about 15 years from now.

It was very kind and generous of the German admiral to let us know so long in advance of the intended invasion of America by Germany. It gave us time for preparation, and we are now rapidly preparing for a warm reception to the Hun when he decides to come.

But the law of national self-defense does not require that we wait for the Germans to attack us after their intentions have been clearly expressed and it is well established that they intend to attack us. I am in favor of teaching the arrogant German Kaiser that if he or any of his descendants insults our flag or threatens the invasion of our territory, it will not be necessary for Germans to come here. If they will wait a month and France will give us standing room, we will go over there after them. If they do not care to meet us at the Hudson or the Mississippi, we will meet them at the Rhine. The sooner they learn this the greater respect they will have for us and the better it will be for all concerned.

In conclusion let me say that in this great world war we are fighting not only for principles but for peoples as well.

We are fighting for innocent, outraged, brave, and bleeding Belgium, whose heroic King merits apotheosis, and whose martyred people and their sufferings will remain enshrined forever in the memory and affections of mankind.

We are fighting for France, the brilliant and beautiful among the nations, whose chivalric sympathies sent Rochambeau and Lafayette as ambassadors of freedom to our shores. One hundred and forty years ago we were "bled white" and stood at death's door. France sent us men and money and enabled us to live. To-day France is bled white and stands at death's door. As a grateful, self-respecting Nation it is our sacred duty to send France men and money in order that she may live. And I say to you, knowing the full meaning of my words, that if with this history in front of us, with this debt of national gratitude hanging over us, we, a powerful Republic, fabulously rich in men and in money, should stand silently by and watch the Imperial German Government with a mailed fist drive a deathblow to the heart of this brave and brilliant and beautiful Republic, our former friend and benefactor, throughout all the ages yet to come we would not only deserve, we would receive, the scorn and contempt, the hatred and execration of mankind.

My friends, we have declared war against the Imperial German Government, and Germany must and will be whipped. She must be conquered if it takes 20 years to do it.

We have a registered man power of 10,000,000 men. We have a possible man power of 20,000,000 men. We have a conservatively estimated national wealth of $230,000,000,000. And before I will consent that our flag shall be hauled down in dishonor and disgrace; before I will consent that the brave boys that we are sending to the trenches of Europe shall be ordered back in humiliation and shame, I will vote in Congress to send every man of the twenty millions to the field and cast every dollar of the two hundred and thirty billions into the scales.

The world does not love Prussian militarism and autocracy and will not tolerate them. The world does not love the political philosophy of Frederick the Great and of Bismarck, of Treitschke, of Bernhardi, and of Nietzsche, and will not endure it. The world loves liberty, and that liberty may be permanent and secure forever upon the earth for all men the hosts of freedom are to-day shaking the planet with solemn and awful tread, and millions of the world's best and bravest are falling into the arms of death as leaves fall in autumn upon the earth. And that liberty, as a priceless heritage to all the children of men, may be forever secure, that democracy may be forever safe upon the earth, America, the mother of republics, the protagonist of republican virtue in the world, has declared war and has dedicated to its successful and victorious conclusion the lives, the fortunes, and the sacred honor of all her sons.

My friends and my countrymen, the war that we have declared is the most just and righteous in the history of the world. The dearest rights and the most sacred meaning of liberty, humanity, and civilization are at stake. Let us see to it that America plays a sovereign and illustrious rôle in the great concert of the nations. Let there be no division in our own ranks.

Let every brain think and every heart beat for America and her allies. Let this be the prayer to ascend to Heaven each day from every patriot lip:

Great God, who ruleth the destinies of nations, who seeth at once the fall of a sparrow and the flight of worlds, preserve forever to us, and to our posterity, and to all mankind the country of Washington, the Republic of Jefferson, and the Union of Abraham Lincoln.

Go with our brave boys, O God, into the trenches of Europe, and guide and protect them with Thy loving care. Fill their minds with patriotism, their hearts with heroic courage, and their souls with pious love for Thee.

Crown their standards with victory, O God, and if it please Thee return them in health and happiness to their country and their countrymen, where their names shall be inscribed forever in the annals of the Republic as the veterans of an army that crossed the high seas to unite with the free armies of other free peoples that liberty, humanity, and civilization might endure forever upon the earth! We beseech Thee, O God!

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for one minute, not to be taken out of the time allotted on this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for one minute, not to be taken out of the allotted time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in this time I desire to read this telegram from East Chicago, Ind., dated September 28, 1918:

EAST CHICAGO, IND., September 28, 1918.

WILL H. WOOD,
Congressman Tenth Indiana District,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Our quota on third loan was seven hundred eighty thousand. Our quota on fourth loan is one million seven hundred fifty thousand. We have made our quota and one million and a quarter more, and still going.

LIBERTY LOAN COMMITTEE,
WALTER J. RILEY, Chairman.

[Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to say in passing, gentlemen, that the city of East Chicago was the first city in the United States to go over the top in the third liberty loan—more than twice their quota of $780,000 on the first day of the drive. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the bill before us is denominated a power bill. Its purpose, as stated by the gentlemen who have brought it forward, is to enable the President to obtain additional power for factories engaged on Government work, and by the purchase and enlargement of existing power plants, or by constructing new ones. With this purpose, so far as power is needed for Government work and can not be furnished by private parties through private capital, I am entirely in accord. I would not have any factory engaged on Government work closed for a moment for lack of power, and am quite ready to take any measures necessary to prevent this happening.

The doubts that arise over this bill occur in the first place from the meager information that we have as to the necessity for Government action. The committee which reported the bill had some department representatives before it who gave their opinion that large sums were necessary to be appropriated by the Government for this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, it is always easy to find a department official who believes that immense sums ought to be expended by the Government in some line with which he is connected. Usually his testimony is given in good faith, but no committee ought to take such testimony as sufficient. It is the duty of every committee to institute an individual investigation of its own to ascertain whether the money is really needed. This the committee has not done. It did not even attempt to find out whether private capital would furnish the necessary funds and build the plants, as in all probability could be arranged if the Government agreed to make use of the power. It made no investigation whatever as to whether application had been made to the War Finance Corporation for funds, although that corporation was created expressly to take care of just such cases and was provided with abundant funds.

It looks very much as if this bill had been introduced and supported by department officials because they did not like the restrictions which the War Finance Corporation imposed upon the money which it loaned. On the other hand, gentlemen shout that this bill is a war necessity. We who are not on the committee have no way of finding out whether it is or not, and we can not afford to take chances upon important Government work being held up and our armies deprived of the material which is necessary to win victory in the war.

It is perfectly evident, however, that as long as this method is pursued with reference to reporting bills that hundreds of millions of dollars will be unnecessarily expended and immense sums will be absolutely wasted.

While, as I have said, the bill is ostensibly for the purpose of obtaining additional power, it contains many provisions which have nothing whatever to do with that subject, and among others is the provision in the paragraph under consideration, which authorizes the construction of plants for the purpose of making briquettes from lignite coal, for making gas, coke, and the by-products from coke ovens. This is the provision which I have moved to strike out.

Mr. Chairman, I have viewed the proposition involved in the provision which I moved to strike out as one of the most fantastic yet presented to this House. I do not doubt but what my good friend from North Dakota can show that it would be a good thing if the Government should spend money to manufacture lignite briquettes for the people of that vicinity, but for over 10 years they have been experimenting making lignite briquettes in that region, and they have failed to get any proposition on a commercial basis. They could not manufacture them as cheap as coal could be shipped in. That is the situation to-day.

What connection has it with a power bill in any way? What do they want of a power plant in the southwest part of North Dakota? I can not imagine anything, unless it is to cultivate and plow the ground by electric power. They have no large manufacturing institutions. For that matter, what do they expect to do with a power plant in Colorado? Do they expect that the cowboys will use the power plant? They have plenty of coal of all kinds in that State and water power going to waste.

The fact is, we have no need for power plants from coal in the western region. In the mountains thousands of horsepower could be obtained at a slight expense. But it is argued that it would help the local communities to develop the mines of Colorado and North Dakota. This Government can not appropriate at this time the money for everything that would be beneficial in all the various communities in this country. I do not doubt that it would be helpful to the citizens of North Dakota to manufacture briquettes, and I do not doubt that the money could be spent all over the country where it would be beneficial, but that is no excuse for spending it at this time. In the West we have not labor enough to carry on the farming, and if the Government would furnish us the labor and machinery to cultivate the land it would be far more wisely spent than to manufacture briquettes in South Dakota.

Now, with reference to this matter of constructing additional ovens to manufacture toluol. The gentleman from Missouri intimated that I said we had not imported any of these coal-tar products before the war. What I said was that we had not been importing them since the war. We did import large quantities of them before the war, but it is not necessary we should import them now. It was not necessary at any time we should import them if there were proper tariffs in force, and since a tariff has been put on them it has not been necessary to import them, because all of them can be produced in this country. Even now in over half of the coke ovens of the country these products are going to waste because there is no demand for them. We say waste because they are not used, but if we have no use for them, then in a strict sense they are not being wasted. Now, we can not use all the by-products of all the coke ovens. We perhaps could use more than we do now, but private capital is perfectly willing if the Government says it will take these products to furnish them.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman say that toluol is going to waste, that there is a plentiful supply of it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My colleague, Mr. GOOD, in speaking on the floor yesterday, said that the testimony of one of the officers of the Army before his committee was to the effect that they had a plentiful supply.

Mr. WINGO. Of toluol; that that statement was made before the committee?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman the ex parte testimony, for I might call it such, that has been given before the Committee on Mines and Mining and before the committee introducing this bill does not represent the real state of facts at all. The fact is, there was no complete hearing of the matter.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman wants to be fair to the committee?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. We have had this question up on other hearings, where there were no printed hearings, and to whom would the gentleman go to get the facts if not to the War Industries Board? To whom would the gentleman go?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Experts from the War Industries Board testified the Government was receiving——

Mr. WINGO. We heard the experts of the War Industries Board on this subject quite recently on this very question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Col. McRoberts, of the Ordnance Procurement Division, testified before the Appropriations Committee that arrangements had been made to secure ample supplies of toluol. Even if he should have been oversanguine in this respect it would be perfectly easy to make arrangements with private parties which would insure a plentiful supply. It is obtained from the by-products of the coke ovens, which, as I have already stated, are now for the most part going to waste, simply because those who operate the ovens believe there is no use for them.

Mr. Chairman, the lack of any disposition on the part of many of the House committees to limit appropriations to sums that are absolutely necessary and to cut out all projects which are meritorious in their purpose but not essential to carrying on the war is a strange feature in the proceedings of a war-time Congress. With our appropriations amounting up into the billions we have here a bill appropriating $175,000,000 without a syllable of testimony to show any necessity for any such great sum. I trust that a provision will be made later on whereby the Appropriations Committee, which usually scans these projects carefully, will be given an opportunity to refuse this appropriation and compel a specific statement of the amount needed for each item. As the bill stands it is simply an invitation to corruption, graft, and waste, and is but another example of the methods so commonly pursued, which have swelled our expenditures to a point where there is little doubt in my mind a billion of dollars could be taken off and the war just as effectually carried on. Some day there will be a revision, and the time can not come too soon for the good of the American people.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there were 5 minutes of the 20 minutes to go to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Of course, if the gentleman from Illinois cares to discuss it, I prefer to wait.

Mr. CANNON. I will defer to the gentleman if he desires to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 7, noes 16.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the announcement of that vote develops the fact that there are 23 gentlemen present. To my mind this proceeding is developing into a farce——

Mr. CANNON. Absolutely.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Dewalt	Heaton	Merritt
Anthony	Dickinson	Heintz	Miller, Minn.
Aswell	Dies	Holland	Moore, Pa.
Bacharach	Dill	Hollingsworth	Morin
Baer	Dominick	Hood	Mott
Barkley	Dooling	Howard	Mudd
Bell	Doremus	Humphreys	Neely
Beshlin	Doughton	Husted	Nelson
Borland	Drukker	Hutchinson	Oldfield
Bowers	Dyer	Jacoway	Oliver, N. Y.
Britten	Eagan	Johnson, S. Dak.	Olney
Brodbeck	Edmonds	Johnson, Wash.	O'Shaunessy
Browne	Ellsworth	Jones	Overmyer
Browning	Elston	Kahn	Padgett
Burroughs	Emerson	Kearns	Paige
Butler	Estopinal	Kennedy, Iowa	Parker, N. Y.
Caldwell	Fairchild, Geo. W.	Kennedy, R. I.	Peters
Campbell, Kans.	Farr	Kettner	Phelan
Cantrill	Fess	Key, Ohio	Platt
Caraway	Flood	Kiess, Pa.	Porter
Carew	Flynn	Kitchin	Powers
Carter, Mass.	Fordney	Knutson	Pratt
Cary	Foss	Kreider	Price
Chandler, N. Y.	Francis	La Follette	Purnell
Chandler, Okla.	Fuller, Ill.	LaGuardia	Ragsdale
Church	Fuller, Mass.	Lea, Cal.	Rainey, John W.
Clark, Fla.	Gallivan	Lee, Ga.	Ramsey
Clark, Pa.	Gard	Lehlbach	Randall
Classon	Glass	Linthicum	Rankin
Coady	Glynn	Little	Riordan
Connally, Tex.	Godwin, N. C.	Littlepage	Robbins
Cooper, Ohio	Goodall	London	Roberts
Cooper, W. Va.	Goodwin, Ark.	Lufkin	Robinson
Cooper, Wis.	Graham, Ill.	Lundeen	Rowe
Copley	Graham, Pa.	McClintic	Rowland
Costello	Gray, N. J.	McCormick	Russell
Crago	Greene, Mass.	McCulloch	Sanders, Ind.
Cramton	Gregg	McKenzie	Sanders, La.
Currie, Mich.	Griest	McKinley	Sanford
Curry, Cal.	Griffin	McLaughlin, Pa.	Saunders, Va.
Dale, N. Y.	Hamill	Maher	Scott, Iowa
Dale, Vt.	Hamilton, N. Y.	Mann	Scott, Pa.
Darrow	Harrison, Miss.	Martin	Scully
Davis	Harrison, Va.	Mason	Sears
Delaney	Haskell	Mays	Sells
Dempsey	Hayes	Meeker	Shackleford
Sherley	Steele	Templeton	Watson, Pa.
Sherwood	Steenerson	Thomas	Weaver
Shouse	Stephens, Nebr.	Thompson	Welling
Siegel	Sterling, Ill.	Tillman	Whaley
Slayden	Sterling, Pa.	Tilson	White, Me.
Slemp	Stiness	Tinkham	White, Ohio
Small	Sullivan	Treadway	Wilson, Ill.
Smith, Chas. B.	Sweet	Vare	Wilson, Tex.
Smith, Thos. F.	Swift	Venable	Winslow
Snyder	Switzer	Vinson	Woodyard
Stafford	Tague	Walton
Stedman	Talbott	Ward

The SPEAKER pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12776, and finding itself without a quorum under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 200 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he presented the list of absentees for entry in the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its sitting.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the House is the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 58.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois, as he is a good parliamentarian, if the motion of the gentleman from Iowa did not also include striking out lignite?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. CANNON. Was the debate closed?

Mr. WINGO. It was closed on the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has been closed.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand that I assented to the proposition that all debate should be cut off on this paragraph. If so, I can not help it. Now, then, I want to move to strike out the words "of any fuel," on line 14, page 4. These words would include peat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 4, line 14, after the word "combustion," strike out the words "of any fuel."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill of the following title:

H. R. 12714. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

EMERGENCY POWER BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) For the purpose of increasing the capacity or productivity of any private power plant within the boundaries of the United States to install in any such plant any structure, machinery, or appliances that he may deem useful to that end, either through agents or contractors employed by him, or by providing the owner or operator of such plant with funds to be applied to that purpose; to lease the machinery, appliances, and structures thus installed or any parts thereof to the owner or operator of such plant for a term not to exceed the war period and such reasonable time thereafter as he may deem expedient in the interest of the United States, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable; and to enter into contracts requiring or permitting the lessee to purchase such appliances, machinery, and structures, or parts thereof, at or before the termination of such lease at their then value or upon such other terms as he may deem equitable for the protection of the interests of the United States and of the community served by such lessee. Whenever any such structures, machinery, or appliances shall have been installed and until the sale or other disposition thereof, the title thereto shall remain in the United States and shall be free and exempt from any liens, mortgages, judgments, or other encumbrances, whether created by act of the owner or operator of such plant or by operation of law. And upon and during any default in any payment of any sums due the United States under such lease or contract the President shall be empowered at all times to enter upon the premises upon which such machinery, structures, or appliances shall be installed and there to maintain and to operate them or any of them for the use of the United States free from any rent or other charge, or to take possession of and remove them or any of them from the premises.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 20, strike out the words "owner or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 23, strike out the words "owner or."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 23, strike out the words "a term of not to exceed."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I submit that is all one amendment down to the first line of page 5. They ought to be put together. I have a substitute for the whole amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I submit it is not all one amendment, because it is in the alternative.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. SNELL. What amendment are you voting on at the present time?

Mr. SIMS. It says "a term of not to exceed."

Mr. SISSON. That does not mean anything if you strike that out. It would be nonsense.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, lines 23 and 24, strike out the words "a term of not to exceed."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the language at first reported, "not to exceed the war period and such reasonable time thereafter," which was already amended so as to make it the term of "the war period, not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period," was all one amendment. If it is proposed in that way I have a substitute for it, which will limit it to the war period.

Mr. SISSON. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is not divisible. It is one of two propositions, the one that the committee reported and the one on the original bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Therefore it is not divisible.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not report more than the amendments on lines 23 and 24.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is not a separate amendment. It is all one amendment.

Mr. SISSON. That is not divisible, Mr. Chairman, because there are two propositions. If the Chair will read it, he will find that it says, "Or any parts thereof to the owner or operator of such plant for a term of not to exceed the war period," and so forth. Now, the committee strikes out that language, "a term of not to exceed" and "such reasonable time" and inserts in lieu thereof all this language, "or for such period thereafter not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period," taking the place of the language in lines 23 and 24, stricken out, that being one proposition. The committee must vote to keep in the language which was the original bill or vote to strike it out and then adopt the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair permits, the gentleman has answered his own contention when he says it comprehends two propositions, what has been inserted to take the place of "and such reasonable time thereafter." Now, the language in italics, which takes the place of "such reasonable time thereafter," does not take the place of "a term not to exceed," because it is left practically in that shape with the committee amendment adopted; but the committee has reported this measure to provide that this shall continue for the war period, and instead of "for such reasonable time thereafter" it is to continue "for such period thereafter not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period." Of course, it is two distinct propositions. The Chair has ruled correctly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that this motion to strike out and insert is not divisible, and that all of this amendment ought to be voted upon together as one amendment. The Clerk will report the entire amendment.

Mr. CANNON. From where to where?

The CHAIRMAN. The words stricken out, marked in the bill, and the italics inserted. That is the amendment.

Mr. SISSON. Beginning with line 23, "a term of not to exceed" and "and such reasonable time" is the language stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: Page 4, lines 23, 24, and 25, and line 1 of page 5, strike out in lines 23 and 24, page 4, "a term of not to exceed," and in line 24, page 4, strike out the words "and such reasonable time" and insert in lieu thereof "or for such period," and after the word "thereafter" insert "not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute for that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey for the committee amendment: Page 4, lines 23, 24, and 25, and line 1 of page 5, after the words "war period" on page 4, lines 24 and 25, strike out "or for such period thereafter," so that the language will read, "for the war period, or for any shorter period, as he may deem expedient," etc.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Now, Mr. Chairman, this brings up the question of how long this act shall last—whether it shall last for five years after the war period, which is six months after the announcement of the treaty of peace, or whether it shall end with the war period.

In this particular case there is no sort of doubt that it ought to end at the end of the war period. By this clause of section 2 the United States is allowed to increase the capacity of a private power plant by installing structures, machinery, or appliances, either by its own agents or contractors, or providing the operator of the plant with funds for that purpose, and when they put those appliances in a private power plant, whether it be machinery or other appliances, it provides that they may lease those appliances to the operator of that private power plant.

Now, that lease should end with the war period, because the owner is going to get his plant at that time. No doubt he keeps it all the while. It is only increased in his hands, and at the end of the war period he may not want to have this extra machinery. It ought to be determined then. His plant ought not to be tied up for five years after the war by a lease to him of these extra structures that have been put in his mill on terms providing that he shall pay rent for five years after the war, after war business is done, and when he may have no use for it. It ought to be determined as at the end of the war period between him and the United States, and there is no sort of doubt about it; and this amendment therefore provides that the lease shall be only for the war period, or for any shorter period, as the President may deem expedient, in the interest of the United States.

It brings up the whole question of how long this interference with a private power plant shall last, and the question that was opened, when I spoke in general debate on the bill, is brought up on this clause in the most favorable form, because I do not believe that any mill or power plant ought to be tied up with a lease on its appliances for five years after the war.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would rather have those who have heard me on this subject vote on my amendment than those who have not.

Mr. CANNON. I want a quorum to hear the gentleman. It will take a quorum to put over this legislation that means a million dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-six Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Bell	Browne	Byrns, Tenn.
Anthony	Beshlin	Browning	Caldwell
Aswell	Borland	Brumbaugh	Campbell, Kans.
Bacharach	Bowers	Burroughs	Campbell, Pa.
Baer	Britten	Butler	Cantrill
Barkley	Brodbeck	Byrnes, S. C.	Caraway

Carew	Good	Lundeen	Sanders, Ind.
Carter, Mass.	Goodall	McAndrews	Sanders, La.
Cary	Goodwin, Ark.	McClintic	Sanford
Chandler, Okla.	Gordon	McCormick	Saunders, Va.
Church	Graham, Ill.	McKenzie	Scott, Iowa
Clark, Pa.	Graham, Pa.	McKinley	Scott, Pa.
Classon	Gray, N. J.	McLaughlin, Pa.	Scully
Coady	Greene, Mass.	Madden	Sells
Connally, Tex.	Gregg	Maher	Shackleford
Cooper, Ohio	Griest	Mann	Sherley
Cooper, W. Va.	Griffin	Martin	Sherwood
Cooper, Wis.	Hamill	Mason	Shouse
Copley	Hamilton, N. Y.	Mays	Siegel
Costello	Harrison, Miss.	Meeker	Slayden
Crago	Harrison, Va.	Merritt	Slemp
Cramton	Haskell	Miller, Minn.	Small
Currie, Mich.	Hastings	Miller, Wash.	Smith, C. B.
Curry, Cal.	Hayes	Moore, Pa.	Smith, T. F.
Dale, N. Y.	Heaton	Morgan	Snyder
Dale, Vt.	Heintz	Morin	Stafford
Darrow	Holland	Mott	Steele
Davis	Hollingsworth	Mudd	Steenerson
Delaney	Hood	Neely	Sterling, Ill.
Dempsey	Howard	Nelson	Sterling, Pa.
Dewalt	Hull, Iowa	Nicholls, S. C.	Stiness
Dickinson	Humphreys	Nolan	Sullivan
Dies	Husted	Norton	Sweet
Dill	Hutchinson	Oldfield	Swift
Dillon	Jacoway	Oliver, N. Y.	Switzer
Dixon	Johnson, S. Dak.	Olney	Tague
Dominick	Johnson, Wash.	O'Shaunessy	Talbott
Dooling	Jones	Padgett	Taylor, Colo.
Doremus	Kahn	Paige	Templeton
Doughton	Kearns	Parker, N. Y.	Thomas
Drukker	Keating	Peters	Thompson
Dupré	Kelley, Mich.	Phelan	Tillman
Dyer	Kennedy, Iowa	Platt	Tilson
Edmonds	Kennedy, R. I.	Porter	Tinkham
Ellsworth	Kettner	Pou	Treadway
Elston	Kiess, Pa.	Powers	Vare
Emerson	Kinkaid	Pratt	Venable
Estopinal	Kitchin	Price	Vinson
Fairchild, G. W.	Knutson	Purnell	Voigt
Farr	Kraus	Ragsdale	Walton
Ferris	Kreider	Rainey, H. T.	Ward
Fess	La Follette	Rainey, J. W.	Watson, Pa.
Flood	LaGuardia	Ramsey	Weaver
Flynn	Langley	Randall	Welling
Fordney	Lea, Cal.	Rankin	Whaley
Foss	Lehlbach	Reavis	White, Me.
Francis	Lesher	Riordan	White, Ohio
Fuller, Ill.	Linthicum	Robbins	Wilson, Ill.
Fuller, Mass.	Little	Robinson	Wilson, Tex.
Gallivan	Littlepage	Rodenberg	Winslow
Gandy	Lobeck	Rouse	Wood, Ind.
Gard	London	Rowe	Woodyard
Glynn	Longworth	Rowland	Zihlman
Godwin, N. C.	Lufkin	Russell

The committee rose; and Mr. FOSTER having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 12776, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, when 175 Members, a quorum of the Committee of the Whole, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have a minute and a half left of the five minutes allotted to me; and as many Members have come in who were not here before, I ask that five minutes additional may be given me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes additional time. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If those Members who were not here before will refer to the bottom of page 4 they will see that the time allowed in this clause of this section was originally not to exceed the war period and such reasonable time thereafter as the President may deem expedient. The committee amended it by changing that language so as to read:

> For the war period, or for such period thereafter not exceeding five years or for any shorter period as he may deem expedient.

I have moved to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "or such period thereafter not exceeding five years," so that the language will read:

> For the war period or for any shorter period as he may deem expedient.

I desire to give my reasons for making this motion. My first reason is that we have no jurisdiction except the war power, and the war period is six months after the proclamation of the treaty of peace, and that may be six months or a year after the real termination of the war, and after the need for manufacture has ceased. Under the Constitution these powers should not extend beyond this time. Five years is a most unreasonable time, and it may be not five years and six months, but five years and a year and a half.

Now, note what this clause allows: It allows the President to enter into a private power plant, belonging to a private individual, a private owner, and put in new machinery there, either against the will of that owner, by his own agent, or else by advancing funds to the owner for that purpose.

After he has done that he may allow the owner to operate that machinery—how long? Why, that extra machinery is to be operated for the benefit of the public during the war period. The President has no power after that. Some other disposition must then be made of it. Is any owner going to agree? Is it fair to ask an owner to pay rent based on war receipts and war prices for five years after the war? I say no. The lease ought to end.

Then the President may enter into contracts permitting the lessee to purchase these structures at or before the termination of the lease, at their then value, or upon other terms. The valuation may be postponed until the end of the lease, five years after the war, and then he may be asked to pay the value which it is supposed will be a larger value than when the war had ended.

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out the fact that after the Civil War for several years prices remained high and business good. Then they fell. If we wait until wages and prices are low and have fallen off, the United States may not get anything for its machinery.

Again, this says that the title shall remain in the United States. Here is a man with a private power plant, and the bill says that the title of a part of that plant is put in the United States and shall remain in the United States five years after the war. It is neither fair nor within our power.

Again, it says if the owner defaults in payment of the sum due for this extra machinery, the President can enter upon the premises in which they are installed—that is, on the whole power plant—may take it away from him and there maintain and operate the premises, or any of them, for the use of the United States free from any rent or other charge. Who ever heard of saying that because the United States puts in extra machinery in a plant it should have the right to go in and seize and hold the whole property free of any charge after the war?

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. I wanted to ask the gentleman if there was any reason advanced in the committee for desiring to retain possession for five years?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The only reason I remember was that it was thought that the value would be more nearly normal after the five years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-five Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Cooper, W. Va.	Flood	Hood
Anthony	Cooper, Wis.	Flynn	Houston
Aswell	Copley	Fordney	Hull, Iowa
Bacharach	Costello	Foss	Hull, Tenn.
Baer	Cox	Francis	Humphreys
Barkley	Crago	Freeman	Husted
Bell	Cramton	Fuller, Ill.	Hutchinson
Beshlin	Currie, Mich.	Fuller, Mass.	Jacoway
Blackmon	Dale, N. Y.	Gallivan	Johnson, S. Dak.
Borland	Dale, Vt.	Gard	Johnson, Wash.
Bowers	Darrow	Garland	Jones
Britten	Davis	Glass	Kahn
Brodbeck	Delaney	Glynn	Kearns
Browne	Dempsey	Godwin, N. C.	Keating
Browning	Dent	Goodall	Kehoe
Brumbaugh	Dewalt	Goodwin, Ark.	Kelley, Mich.
Burnett	Dickinson	Gould	Kennedy, R. I.
Burroughs	Dies	Graham, Ill.	Kettner
Butler	Dill	Graham, Pa.	Kiess, Pa.
Byrns, Tenn.	Dillon	Gray, N. J.	King
Caldwell	Dominick	Greene, Mass.	Kitchin
Campbell, Kans.	Donovan	Greene, Vt.	Knutson
Candler, Miss.	Dooling	Gregg	Kreider
Cantrill	Doremus	Griest	La Follette
Caraway	Doughton	Griffin	LaGuardia
Carew	Drukker	Hamill	Langley
Carter, Mass.	Dyer	Hamilton, N. Y.	Lea, Cal.
Cary	Edmonds	Harrison, Miss.	Lehlbach
Chandler, N. Y.	Ellsworth	Harrison, Va.	Lever
Chandler, Okla.	Elston	Haskell	Linthicum
Church	Emerson	Hastings	Little
Clark, Pa.	Estopinal	Hayes	Littlepage
Classon	Fairchild, G. W.	Heaton	Lobeck
Coady	Farr	Heintz	London
Connally, Tex.	Ferris	Holland	Lufkin
Cooper, Ohio	Fess	Hollingsworth	Lundeen

McClintic	Paige	Scott, Iowa	Tague
McCormick	Parker, N. Y.	Scott, Pa.	Talbott
McKenzie	Peters	Scully	Taylor, Colo
McKinley	Phelan	Sells	Templeton
McLaughlin, Pa.	Platt	Shackleford	Thomas
Madden	Porter	Sherwood	Thompson
Maher	Powers	Shouse	Tillman
Mann	Pratt	Siegel	Tilson
Mansfield	Price	Slayden	Tinkham
Martin	Purnell	Slemp	Treadway
Mason	Ragsdale	Sloan	Vare
Mays	Rainey, H. T.	Small	Venable
Meeker	Rainey, J. W.	Smith, C. B.	Vinson
Merritt	Ramsey	Smith, T. F.	Walton
Miller, Minn.	Randall	Snyder	Ward
Miller, Wash.	Rankin	Stafford	Watson, Pa.
Moore, Pa.	Riordan	Steagall	Weaver
Morin	Robbins	Stedman	Welling
Mott	Roberts	Steele	Welty
Mudd	Robinson	Steenerson	Whaley
Neely	Rodenberg	Stephens, Miss.	White, Me.
Nelson	Rowe	Sterling, Ill.	White, Ohio
Nolan	Rowland	Sterling, Pa.	Wilson, Ill.
Oliver, N. Y.	Russell	Stiness	Wilson, Tex.
Olney	Sanders, Ind.	Sullivan	Winslow
O'Shaunessy	Sanders, La.	Sweet	Wood, Ind.
Overmyer	Sanford	Swift	Woodyard
Padgett	Saunders, Va.	Switzer	Wright

The committee rose; and Mr. FOSTER having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 12776, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and 173 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he presented a list of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

EMERGENCY POWER BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to have the attention of the Members present for a moment. I have twice made the point of no quorum. I have done it in perfect good faith. I am charged with the responsibility as one member of the Appropriations Committee to consider a $7,000,000,000 deficiency bill. Owing to the consideration of that bill I have not had the opportunity, except in a hop-skip-and-jump way, to read the report and hurriedly read this bill. It is a wonderfully important bill. Properly amended, it ought to pass. As it is, in my judgment, it looks to meet conditions after the war is over more than it does to war conditions. I think there should be a full attendance of the House and the committee, at least a quorum, so that a quorum can dispassionately consider the bill. We are awfully busy here, and we are in touch with our constituents, and the campaigns are on. It is almost impossible to keep a quorum. I understand that; but I myself have not been home since last Christmas holidays. I am not criticizing any individual Member or criticizing the House; I am speaking of conditions.

Just let me call the attention of the committee to this bill. It is confessed in the report that the water-power bill that we have already passed is a peace measure. And yet it took much time to pass it. I presume it will remain in the Senate until after election. I think it ought to be considered.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to inquire if the water-power bill the gentlemen refers to was not a measure that we were assured was a war measure?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but it is confessed now in this report to be a peace measure.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman has been here a long time, and is well acquainted with the procedure of the two Houses. Does the gentleman think or have any idea that this bill will become a law until after election?

Mr. CANNON. I do not.

Mr. GARNER. I do not think anyone has the slightest idea that this bill will have the least consideration and perhaps will not be reported to the Senate until after the election.

Mr. CANNON. I believe that the committee will agree with me in the statement that all the while since the declaration of war I have been quite as zealous, independent of my election or anybody else's election, in going the limit to vote all necessary powers in legislation and appropriations, and I shall continue along that line. I do this in justice to myself, because some uninformed party might say I wanted to make a point of no quorum and all of this, that, and the other. I am willing to consider this bill. I wish I had time to analyze it; but, taking the evidence of the Secretary of War, it appears that additional power is needed in three places, namely, New Jersey, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh, great centers for war production, for the production of war material. If gentlemen will turn and read the report of the committee on this bill they will find, on page 11 up to page 15, inclusive, over 250 places mentioned for the Government to create additional power plants, some of which nearly all of us have not heard of. Why, we have already refused an amendment by this bill to strike out a provision to create plants to utilize as a war measure the lignite coals in the far West, including peat and all other fuels. The amendment was voted down.

Why, in this respect it is a peace, not a war, measure. Now, I just want to call attention, while I am granted the right, upon this very paragraph that we are considering and in connection with the pending amendment. If gentlemen will turn their attention to the bottom of page 4 and top of page 5, the proposition is to give five years after the close of the war to dispose of these properties. I do not believe the President has ever proposed it. When the war ends the bill provides that the President shall within five years or a shorter period dispose of these properties. I quote the exact language:

> Not exceeding five years, or for any shorter period as he may deem expedient in the interests of the United States, upon such other terms as he may deem equitable for the protection of the interests of the United States and of the community served by such lessee.

After he has leased it for any time of five years——

Mr. DECKER. What page?

Mr. CANNON. This is page 5, in this very paragraph. Take notice—"for the protection of the interests of the United States and of the community served by such lessee." Oh, let us take account of stock. If this bill is to pass—I do not see how it can pass to-day; this is Saturday, and I am glad we have got Sunday to study it and all of us to look into it—but if it is to pass, while I am not criticizing the President, I think if we can increase his knowledge as to what is going on—he can not know all the details of what is going on, but he has got to trust his generals; he has got to trust transportation on land and sea; he has got to trust all the industries; he has got to trust all the commissions. God never made a man who could have personal knowledge all along the line, and I think we ought to protect ourselves and protect the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in finding out what is in this bill and what has been enacted, what is the power, because there is so much of it—and I voted for all of it—but I say we ought to take time and consider it calmly, coolly, and patriotically, having our attention all the while directed to the necessity of legislation for war, not for peace. First win the war, and when peace comes then legislate for peace. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 333) to aid in combating "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases.

EMERGENCY POWER BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise, to move to strike out the last word?

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise as a member of the committee, and I desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks debate has been exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there has been only five minutes used between the first time the point of no quorum was made by the gentleman from Illinois and the second point of no quorum was made.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, to facilitate matters I would like to ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes on this amendment. I am opposed not only to the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] but also to the amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to be permitted to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman had 10 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I suggest it would be a good thing that debate on this, which is a material matter in the bill, be extended without objection, and I should like to have three minutes or five minutes to close in favor of the amendment. I think that is right.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina and Mr. BARNHART rose.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BARNHART. I rise to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory. The House has just acted, the roll has just been called, and there has been no business attended to since—there has just been a speech made.

Mr. CANNON. If there is no quorum present—suppose there are only three Members present?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to a count.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to object to the unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is counting for a quorum. [After counting.] One hundred Members are present.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire, if the gentleman will reserve his objection at any rate for a moment, it does seem to me right that on this very important question there should be time allowed for debate, half an hour or an hour, or whatever time——

Mr. WALSH. I suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey that we can only act on one request at a time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will have 10 minutes; that is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have objected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Yes; I object.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I had the right to speak in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIMS. He is entitled to recognition.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled that debate is exhausted on this subject and the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to recognition on his pro forma motion to strike out the last word and the gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. May I inquire who opposed the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]? Who spoke in opposition to it?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not matter whether anyone spoke in opposition to it or not. There were two speeches and debate was exhausted.

Mr. WALSH. The rules say that there shall be five minutes in favor and five minutes against.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think that is in force unless something else is asked for and granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that debate has been exhausted, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I agree with everything the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said as to the importance of this bill. But I wish respectfully to call the attention of this body to the fact that this bill has had careful consideration in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I wish also to call the attention of this body to the fact that this bill has had the attention of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the attention of the Secretary of War, the attention of the Secretary of the Navy, the attention of Mr. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator, and the attention of Mr. Baruch, the chairman of the War Industries Board. I wish to call your attention to the fact that it is a matter of vital importance to the winning of this war. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said that there are only a few places where power is immediately needed—that the Secretary of War said that. That is true. He mentions Pittsburgh——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman says that this has had the careful attention of the Secretary of War. I should like to call his attention to what the Secretary of War said, namely, "I have examined the bill casually only."

Mr. DECKER. Well, that is not the point. I mean what I say and I mean it respectfully. He did not say he had not examined the subject carefully. It is true that the Secretary of War, when asked about the details of the bill, never claimed to have written the bill, never claimed to have gone into the phraseology of the bill and the technicalities of it, but it has been a matter of deep concern and vital interest to the Secretary of War. It is a matter of worry and a heavy load on the shoulders of Mr. Baruch, the head of the War Industries Board at this time of crisis.

The gentleman from Illinois refers to the fact that one of the witnesses has said that the main need was in a few places—in New York, New Jersey, and Pittsburgh, and a few places like that. Yes; but where are those places? Those are the places where they are making the cannon; those are the places where they are making the eaglets to put the submarines out of business. Those are the places where they are making the shells to drive autocracy from the face of the earth.

And what more important thing could there be?

Now, then, just a word about the bill. When you were talking about those technical definitions yesterday and day before I did not care much about it, because, like the majority of you, I do not think it makes much difference about some of those technicalities. But this proposition has been carefully considered by our committee, the one which the gentleman has just moved here, and I want to submit to this House in all seriousness, because you are going to answer for it—you are going to have to answer for it—that there will be a day of reckoning in this country, and I want to state to you—I deem it my duty as a member of this committee to state to you—what you are voting on when you vote this amendment up or vote it down. You can give me time or you can cut it off. I will do the best I can in the time you give me. In the first place, the bill as written says this, that the President shall have the right, in the interest of winning the war and getting the power to aid manufacturers, to go into a power plant and make additions or to build a new one if necessary, but mainly to make additions. That is the object of the bill, to be frank with you. Some of these expenditures will be great.

As some of you refer to this gentleman Mr. Gans, I will say that I am not the greatest lawyer on earth, but I have heard him before the committee, and I think he is a pretty good lawyer, and he and Mr. Baruch are mainly the authors of this bill. The original bill provided that after the Government had put up this equipment it could lease it to the private owner or operator during the period of the war and as long thereafter as was necessary to protect the interests of the Government. Now, do not get scared at Government ownership there. Every man who came before our committee—the Secretary of War, Mr. Baruch, and all the rest of them—said it was not a Government-ownership question, and we did not want to consider it from that standpoint. It was from the standpoint of victory, and victory alone.

But here is the situation: If you put down a hard-and-fast rule that every one of these leases has got to terminate at the close of the war, what happens? One of two things happens. We will suppose the gentleman from Texas owns a power plant, and suppose the President in his wisdom makes an addition to it, and suppose this amendment prevails and the President can only lease it to you until the end of the war, and at the same time have the right to make a contract with you that you shall have the option of purchase at the close of the lease, what happens? That equipment which he puts in your plant is not worth a nickel to anybody on earth, is it? However, I would not say it was not worth a nickel, because it is worth a whole lot after you tear it down and move it away.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have his time extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DECKER. I thank the gentleman. Now, then, at the end of the war, as I said before, the plant is worth more to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] than anybody else, because it is on his premises, and he can use it in connection with the rest of his equipment. He may be a patriotic citizen and would like to pay the Government all it is worth. But he may not have the money necessary at the close of the war. Or he may be an unpatriotic profiteer, and want to buy it just as cheaply as he can at the close of the war. If this amendment prevails the President can sell it probably to no one but him, and he is apt to sell it at the gentleman's price, if the gentleman wanted to be grasping and miserly.

Now, then, the committee amendment is better than the one offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The committee limited it to five years, and I respectfully submit that that is much better than limiting it to the close of the war. But I still submit that the best way that you can leave the bill is to leave it in the way it was drawn by the administration and trust the President of the United States and the men whom he will put in charge of it. There is no chance for them to go into Government ownership and operation of public utilities. That can not be done. It just gives them a chance to protect the interests of the United States in connection with this equipment which the Government installs. How many of these companies will have enough money to pay in five years to the Government what this property is worth? You will have to admit that the Government will have a great many things to look after during the five years following this war.

Why not leave it as it was written and say that the President shall draw the lease for the duration of the war and for as long thereafter as his judgment leads him to believe that it is good for the interest of the United States in this connection? It is not a question of Government ownership or a question of policy, but a question of what is the best way to protect the money which we are putting into these plants and getting as much of it back to our taxpayers as possible.

Therefore, gentlemen of the committee, I most earnestly oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]. I think that amendment would absolutely create chaos. It would produce absolute chaos.

I believe that the amendment of the committee, while better, should also be voted down, and that you should trust the President of the United States to protect the interests of the people in this case, and not have the Government put a lot of money into these plants and then let the owners of the plants buy them in at a song. I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the somewhat frantic attempts of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] to throw fear into the ranks of those here who have been listening to and taking part in the discussion of this measure for the last two days.

In his statement he says that unless we pass this measure, this hodgepodge of legislation, without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t" we will have to answer for it. Who is it that has appeared and most strenuously argued for the passage of this legislation? They say one of the attorneys is an expert. He may be, but he is not an expert in drafting legislation. The other gentleman named was Mr. Bernard Baruch. Is he an expert in legislative drafting?

Now, I submit that if it is wise for the Congress to say that the Government can take over a vast system of railroads to serve all the people of the country and provide that they shall be taken over upon the condition that they shall be returned within a certain time after the war has ceased, it certainly is wise for us to put some safeguards into this measure.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not a question of returning something to these private owners that we have taken from them. It is a question of giving them something that the taxpayers have paid for.

Mr. WALSH. This is the section that provides for increasing the capacity or productivity of any private power plant, and "any private power plant" includes a municipal power plant, and the only interests that are to be served under the language of the bill are the interests of the United States and of the communities served by the lessees. Nothing is said as to the interests of the industries which may be served by these power plants. What shall happen in the case of a power plant that has been enlarged or extended which is engaged in war work or in making munitions and is not furnishing power or light to a community? Are their interests to be entirely disregarded? Must they be held in abeyance for five years after the war?

Why, Mr. Chairman, from the very language in which the measure is reported by the committee, as was instanced here yesterday when we began the five-minutes debate on this measure, or during the early stages of it, there are places where amendments are manifestly required.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman a question where he referred to private power plants which are making munitions. The very section we are discussing is to permit the Government to lease to those very manufacturers plants if the Government should install a unit or any portion of it for a term not exceeding five years—to the men themselves who put up and own the industry. It is a matter of justice to them, of course, because in making contracts for power service the longer you have got in matters of this sort the better contract you can make.

Mr. WALSH. Then why limit it to five years?

Mr. SIMS. That is what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] contended. The amendment limits it to five years. The gentleman from Missouri was opposing the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. DECKER. And the committee amendment, too.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman did not say anything about the committee amendment.

Mr. DECKER. Oh, yes, I did.

Mr. TOWNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TOWNER. Whom did the Chair recognize?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think a misapprehension exists on the part of those who support the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]. This is not a provision that extends any lease. It is not a provision for the benefit of the Government. As I understand the amendment, it is a provision for the benefit of the owner or the operator of the plant. The first subsection provides for constructing a plant if necessary. The next subsection contains a provision for the installing of machinery in the plant. The third subsection is for the expansion of the plant, by which the Government may furnish money to assist in enlarging it. The next provision is for the purpose of taking over the plant. Now, these provisions are all harmonious, and, in my judgment, well thought out. I see nothing to object to in this particular provision, and I think the amendment suggested by the committee a wise one. I do not see any necessity for any change. In my judgment, it would be perfectly legitimate, and it would be in the interest of the Government and the people if there were not even a five-year limitation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks that under the provisions of this section the owner of the plant where this property is installed has got to take a lease of it from the Government?

Mr. TOWNER. I think so; yes.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will examine the language he will see that it will not bear that construction.

Mr. TOWNER. But that has nothing to do with the provisions now under consideration. The bill provides that these appliances may be inserted in any privately operated plant. Then it goes on to say that they may lease this machinery and these appliances to the operator of the plant. That is for the benefit of the operator, for the benefit of the owner. Now, it may be vastly to the advantage of the owner if he can secure the use of the appliances and machinery that the Government has installed in his plant for a longer period than until the termination of the war, and it may be vastly to his advantage if he can secure the right and privilege to use it for a period of not exceeding five years.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TOWNER. I have just a moment or two. I hope the gentleman will excuse me until I finish. It seems to me that this provision is so manifestly for the benefit not only of the Government but of the owner and operator of the plant that there ought not to be any hesitancy about supporting the amendment of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, let me say this: These provisions are all of them war measures. This amendment of the committee is not to increase the war powers of the Government. It is for the benefit of the owner as well as the Government. It is an amendment in the interest of conservatism. It is an amendment in the interest of those people who believe that the Government ought not to go any further than is absolutely necessary. It is an amendment for the benefit of the owner or the operator of the plant, whoever he may be, and so I see no reason whatever to support the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. Can not the gentleman think of instances where it might be to the interest of the owner and to the interest of the Government as well—for what is fair and just is always in the interest of the Government—that this lease should be for a longer time than five years?

Mr. TOWNER. I suppose there is no doubt about that. But the committee amendment is an extension of the time provided in the original bill, and while it might have gone further, I support the action of the committee as wise, as far as it goes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I move to strike out the last two words. I was interested in what the gentleman from Missouri said as to this bill having had very careful consideration by the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I do not know what the gentleman calls careful consideration. The fact is that this bill was reported within one day after the hearings closed. It had no real consideration whatever, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee [Mr. SIMS], because the committee did not make a single change in the bill sent to them, except only in a few committee amendments, all of which have so far been beaten. That is the "careful consideration" that this bill has received at the hands of the committee.

Gentlemen will recall that a few days ago the greatest revenue bill that this country or any other country has ever enacted—a bill containing 200 pages—was passed by this House without one single amendment, except amendments recommended by the committee. In the bill now under consideration, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] well describes as a hodgepodge, within four pages nine amendments have already been adopted. Why, the report on this bill was never submitted t the committee. It was a newspaper article written some weeks ago by the distinguished chairman of this committee, and not even looked over by himself, according to his own statement, before it was printed. Yet gentlemen call that sort of thing careful consideration. Why, I doubt whether the President of the United States has ever read this bill. The Secretary of War admits that he has only casually glanced at it. Yet we are asked to pass this bill exactly as it stands, a bill which has had no consideration whatever. We ought to recommit this bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and have some intelligent consideration given to it. It is almost an insult to the intelligence of this House when such a measure and such a report as this are brought in here. There is no man in this House, I think—least of all myself—who would withhold for a moment any proper power from the President of the United States; and in so far as electrical power may be lacking, I shall vote for any well-considered bill and for any amount of money that is necessary to carry on our war preparation, but to be asked under these circumstances to vote for this hodgepodge, which has had one day's consideration by the committee, is, as I said before, little less than an insult to the intelligence of this House.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised at the statements of the gentleman from Ohio, for I think he has always been considerate and conservative and a very useful Member of the House. I do not propose to withdraw or modify that statement; but I am surprised that the gentleman is so opposed to the bill, and that he wants it recommitted on the ground that its architecture, its phraseological architecture, mind you, does not measure up to his literary standards. The conditions of climate and season make it absolutely necessary to pass this great war measure as soon as possible, so that the necessary machinery may be obtained and installed and go into use in time to prevent the stoppage of the building of ships and the lessening of the manufacture of guns and ammunition. Yet the gentleman wants it referred back to the committee which, he says, have given it no consideration whatever. I do not know why the gentleman made that statement. There is nothing in the record to justify such a statement.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman deny that the bill was reported to the House one day after the hearings closed?

Mr. SIMS. The bill was reported one day after the hearing of the engineer commissioner of the power section of the Fuel Administration. All the other hearings had been printed long before, except Dr. Garfield's.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did the committee consider this bill for more than one day?

Mr. SIMS. The committee considered this bill for about two weeks, in executive session, almost every day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, the committee was having hearings, and the report shows it.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has heard of a matter that I would not have thought that he would refer to, for the reason that I told him myself. It does not hurt me a particle; therefore, I will state the facts. About two weeks ago the editor of the Annalist in New York asked me to prepare an article of about 2,000 words, giving the objects and purposes of this bill, and I did so. I kept a typewritten copy of it, and when I began to write the report I used that part of it in stating the objects and purposes of the bill. I do not know whether it was ever printed or not. There was a typographical or clerical error in it.

The gentleman pointed out an error, but he was not deceived by it; he could tell from every word in the report what the meaning was. It showed that it was an error and that it did not mean "to develop power in a way which was not so economical or satisfactory for utilization."

Now, let us talk plainly about this. Some people are opposed to Government-constructed plants that would enable such plants after the war to compete with other power plants and bring down the profits of existing plants or that might compete with them. The bill is for the war period only, but the President may make contracts continuing for five years or for a shorter period. As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] says, there may be cases where by giving the operator a 10-year lease instead of 5 he may be able to pay back all the Government has put in, when he would not be able to do it within the 5 years or 4 years or 3 years, and therefore save the Government in having to bear the excessive war cost by reason of construction during the war period.

The owners of power plants—water-power plants, carboelectric system or otherwise—are interested in preventing the building of more competing plants in their respective regions. They are in part to blame—I do not mean the Members of the House—but I know whereof I speak; and while the country stands in danger of being held up in its war program by not being able to build ships to send our soldiers abroad and to carry ammunition for their use, by preventing the steel companies from manufacturing steel for the United States to build the ships, and by preventing the coal mines being operated as expeditiously and as fully as possible, yet gentlemen stand here and talk about the Senate not passing the bill until after the election. The same language was used in reference to the wire-control bill when some were dying for a recess, that the Senate would not pass it in three or four weeks' time, or possibly as many months. That bill left the House, went to the Senate, and was passed in three days without a single, solitary amendment to it. The Senate is just as patriotic as we are and have made a splendid record for dispatch of the public business during this session of Congress. Let us do our duty, and I am sure the Senate will do its duty.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I thoroughly understand just exactly what certain language in this bill means. I want to call to the attention of the committee the language beginning on page 5, line 8—all of that section, and I want you to look at that language carefully. I want the attention of the chairman of the committee in order that I may get from him whether or not the construction I put upon it is correct; whether the language is susceptible of that construction:

> Whenever any such structures, machinery, or appliances shall have been installed and until the sale or other disposition thereof, the title thereto shall remain in the United States and shall be free and exempt from any liens, mortgages, judgments, or other encumbrances, whether created by act of the operator of such plant or by operation of law. And upon and during any default in any payment of any sums due the United States under such lease or contract the President shall be empowered at all times to enter upon the premises upon which such machinery, structures, or appliances shall be installed and there to maintain and to operate them or any of them for the use of the United States free from any rent or other charge, or to take possession of and remove them or any of them from the premises.

I presume that applies to property bought by the United States Government, but it does not say so.

Mr. SIMS. It applies to the property that the Government has created, aided, or assisted in constructing.

Mr. SISSON. If the Government shall enter upon the premises upon which machinery, structures, or appliances shall be installed, desiring to increase production of that commodity, it buys or places in that plant property in the nature of fixtures on the real estate. For illustration, suppose I buy from the gentleman from Tennessee a piece of property worth $100,000. I pay $50,000 cash and give my note with a mortgage on the plant for the balance. After that is done the Government takes charge of the property and enters into a contract with me, what attitude is the gentleman from Tennessee in in reference to the balance of the purchase money when it comes due?

Mr. SIMS. It can be collected like any other debt.

Mr. SISSON. Let us see whether you can or not.

There is no lien on it, no mortgage or judgment against the Government. Therefore it is made to apply to the property of the lessee. It is bound to be a lien on the lessee's property, which might disturb the Government in its possession and its operation of the plant. Therefore, in order to guarantee to the Government secure operation of the plant for manufacturing munitions you defeat every mortgage creditor, and there is not a line or a syllable in this bill in reference to giving notice by the Government to the lessee or to the creditor. There is no way to safeguard the creditor in regard to any property that the Government may acquire a lease upon, and the creditor might be ruined. He must stand by and stand mute. Because in so many words you say it shall be free and exempt from any mortgage, judgment, or other encumbrances, whether created by the act of the operator of such plant or by operation of law. These matters are suspended. That is my construction of that.

Mr. SIMS. I can not agree to the gentleman's construction; it seems to me that the language is plain, that it means the machinery installed, the title of which shall remain in the United States; the title is to be in the Government itself.

Mr. SISSON. Then, if it is true that the title to the property is in the Government itself, if it is property which the Government itself buys, is the Government trying to defeat its own indebtedness?

Mr. SIMS. The Government is not buying it, it is installing machinery at its expense, and retains the title to it.

Mr. SISSON. I understand that, but it does not matter who buys it. If the Government buys it and pays for it, if it buys it for the owner or tells the owner, if you will buy it we will pay for it; then the Government ought to make the contract good. In other words, there ought not to be any contract that is not made good, if it is true what the gentleman indicates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Debate on this amendment has already closed, and the gentleman is simply raising a technical question that will not affect adversely the rights of any. Are we going to take care of possible and imaginary injuries to a man whose property has been vastly benefited by Government expenditures?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know whether it is going to be vastly benefited; that is the very thing I want to get at.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. I will now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. As I understand lines from 8 to 14, to which the gentleman referred specifically, say the structures and appliances which the Government installs.

Mr. SISSON. Well——

Mr. DECKER. Of course, the Government should retain the title. In other words, it is just a statement that if the money was spent for putting them up, we will have the first lien.

Mr. SISSON. I do not object to that; that is absolutely unobjectionable; nobody objects to it; but the Government itself then ought not to ask for this protection, because the Government ought to pay its own obligations. If this is intended to prevent the sale or acquisitions of money out of property which has been sold upon which a mortgage is in existence, the Government takes it over; the Government ought not to defeat the creditor.

Mr. DECKER. It would not do that; and let me explain why.

Mr. SISSON. If that is true, then the Government itself ought to pay its own obligations.

Mr. DECKER. The Government pays its own obligations.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman may perhaps have arrived at a mistaken construction of this——

Mr. SISSON. Perhaps I have.

Mr. TOWNER. As to the use of the word "structures." I apprehend the gentleman construes it might be buildings that belong to the company. I think not, because that means only the additions the Government makes, and all these further words——

Mr. SISSON. If the Government enters into a contract with this man, the Government can protect by contract the placing of permanent improvements upon the land. I assume, of course, the Government is going to have sense enough to protect itself or its attorneys in the contract which it makes. What I am endeavoring to find out is if the Government proposes to deal fairly with people, and we must assume it will, this language is unnecessary, unless it expects to give to the agent of the Government the right to be severe with people.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me finish the statement, if the gentleman will.

Mr. SISSON. Very well.

Mr. TOWNER. This exemption, because it is nothing more than exemption, says that notwithstanding that fact, for instance, a structure might be, of course, an addition to the reality, might be subject, if this limitation was not made, to such encumbrances.

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. This says if the Government shall put these structures up, add this machinery, they shall be all exempt from any lien that may be made by the owner or operator of the plant. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SISSON. One moment. I have only five minutes, and I can not yield all of my time. Now, listen: If the purpose of this is to exempt the improvements placed on the real estate at the expense of the Government so that the guaranties of the company or the individual, or maybe the Government, which acts as their agent, becomes subject of the property, it ought to say so, and the language can be made perfectly plain if that is what the committee intends to mean, that it shall mean that no man shall get any title to the improvements which the Government itself puts up, or the Government itself stands for and stands sponsor for, by virtue of the local law of any State, by virtue of putting the improvement or factory upon it, that the man owning the real estate who has a mortgage or deed of trust against the real estate shall obtain no title in the property that the Government places upon it——

Mr. TOWNER. That is what this does and only says he shall not convey or make——

Mr. SISSON. If that is the purpose of this language, I have no objection; but if the language shall have the construction that I placed on it first, and which might be placed upon it, then it is dangerous.

Mr. SIMS. We can always imagine things.

Mr. SISSON. I am not imagining anything, but the best way to prevent trouble in the future is to safeguard the rights of every man and to write the statute so that there can be no sort of difficulty.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I imagine that there is not a quorum present, what does the gentleman imagine?

Mr. SISSON. I know there is not one here.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-three Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, how many did the Chair announce?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifty-three.

Mr. SIMS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SIMS. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. SIMS. I ask the Chair to appoint the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the committee rising, and I decline to serve.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 3, noes 44.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. On the point of no quorum there are 53 Members present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Beshlin	Browning	Campbell, Kans.
Anthony	Booher	Brumbaugh	Candler, Miss.
Aswell	Borland	Burnett	Cantrill
Bacharach	Bowers	Burroughs	Caraway
Baer	Britten	Butler	Carew
Barkley	Brodbeck	Byrns, Tenn.	Carter, Mass.
Bell	Browne	Caldwell	Cary

Chandler, Okla.	Glynn	London	Scott, Pa.
Church	Godwin, N. C.	Lufkin	Scully
Clark, Fla.	Good	Lundeen	Sells
Clark, Pa.	Goodall	McClintic	Shackleford
Classon	Goodwin, Ark.	McCormick	Sherley
Coady	Gould	McKenzie	Sherwood
Connally, Tex.	Graham, Ill.	McKinley	Shouse
Cooper, Ohio	Graham, Pa.	McLaughlin, Mich.	Siegel
Cooper, W. Va.	Gray, N. J.	McLaughlin, Pa.	Slayden
Cooper, Wis.	Greene, Mass.	McLemore	Slemp
Copley	Greene, Vt.	Madden	Sloan
Costello	Gregg	Maher	Small
Crago	Griest	Mann	Smith, Thomas F.
Cramton	Griffin	Martin	Snell
Currie, Mich.	Hamill	Mays	Snyder
Curry, Cal.	Hamilton, N. Y.	Meeker	Stafford
Dale, N. Y.	Harrison, Miss.	Merritt	Stedman
Dale, Vt.	Harrison, Va.	Miller, Minn.	Steele
Darrow	Haskell	Moore, Pa.	Steenerson
Davis	Haugen	Morin	Sterling, Ill.
Delaney	Hayden	Mott	Sterling, Pa.
Dempsey	Hayes	Mudd	Stiness
Dent	Heaton	Neely	Sullivan
Dewalt	Heintz	Nelson	Sweet
Dickinson	Hicks	Nolan	Swift
Dies	Holland	Oliver, Ala.	Switzer
Dill	Hollingsworth	Oliver, N. Y.	Tague
Dixon	Hood	Olney	Talbott
Dominick	Howard	O'Shaunessy	Taylor, Colo.
Donovan	Humphreys	Padgett	Templeton
Dooling	Husted	Paige	Thomas
Doremus	Hutchinson	Parker, N. Y.	Thompson
Doughton	Jacoway	Peters	Tillman
Druckker	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Tilson
Dyer	Johnson, Wash.	Platt	Timberlake
Edmonds	Jones	Porter	Tinkham
Ellsworth	Kahn	Powers	Treadway
Elston	Kearns	Pratt	Van Dyke
Emerson	Kehoe	Price	Vare
Estopinal	Kelley, Mich.	Purnell	Vinson
Evans	Kennedy, Iowa	Ragsdale	Voigt
Fairchild, G. W.	Kennedy, R. I.	Rainey, Henry T.	Walton
Farr	Kettner	Rainey, John W.	Ward
Ferris	Key, Ohio	Ramsey	Watson, Pa.
Fess	Kiess, Pa.	Randall	Watson, Va.
Flood	Kitchin	Rankin	Weaver
Flynn	Knutson	Riordan	Welling
Fordney	Kreider	Robbins	Whaley
Foss	La Follette	Roberts	White, Me.
Francis	LaGuardia	Robinson	White, Ohio
Frear	Lea, Cal.	Rowe	Williams
Freeman	Lee, Ga.	Rowland	Wilson, Ill.
Fuller, Ill.	Lehlbach	Russell	Wilson, La.
Fuller, Mass.	Lever	Sanders, Ind.	Wilson, Tex.
Gallivan	Linthicum	Sanders, La.	Winslow
Gard	Little	Sanford	Woodyard
Gillett	Littlepage	Saunders, Va.	Zihlman
Glass	Lobeck	Scott, Iowa

Thereupon the committee rose; and Mr. FOSTER having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 12776, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and that 171 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and that he presented therewith a list of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, all time has been exhausted, and considerable more was given by unanimous consent, on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] to the committee amendment, or in lieu of the committee amendment—I have forgotten how it was put—on the bottom of page 4, and I now ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like one minute only in which to reply to the argument made against my amendment.

Mr. SEARS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that all debate on this amendment close in two minutes, the time to be occupied by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. WINGO. On this amendment or this section?

Mr. SIMS. On this amendment and amendments to the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. That does not get you anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. I object.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SIMS. Let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SIMS. "The gentleman from Tennessee" did not make the motion. I want a vote on this amendment. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] asked for two minutes, and I agreed he might have it. I want a vote on this amendment. I want to appeal to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. NICHOLLS] that we have a vote on this amendment.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. If the gentleman from Tennessee will agree to vote on it in two or three minutes, I am willing to agree to it.

Mr. SIMS. The vote will come in just a moment.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. All right. I withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have not tried to delay this bill, and I am very sorry the point of no quorum has been made, because I would rather discuss matters here before a few Members who are here than have Members vote who come from outside who do not know anything about it.

It has been suggested that this provision is for the benefit of the operator of the plant. If they will read the hearings, they will find it is not. Mr. Baker, the Secretary of War, said that he wanted to keep the plants so as to be able to know what to do with them after the war, and he was rather in favor of permanent ownership. Mr. DILLON thought they might go down in value so that the Government would lose money and he wanted to speculate on the value of keeping them. Mr. MYERS said that he wanted to straddle the question of Government ownership. I do not want to straddle that question. Six months after the declaration of peace means a year and a half after the war probably, which means ample time for Congress to dispose of plants if nobody else does. And it is neither constitutional nor sensible nor just that an owner be told that he must take a lease for five years of these new structures that we put in his plant; that "if he does not pay the rent he must let the Government take possession, and in any case he must let the Government speculate on what the value of these new structures shall be." It is a private power plant and the owner is entitled to get it back on proper terms at the end of the war.

That is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, Mr. WALSH, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. ANDERSON rose.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, a vote on the committee amendment, which perfects the paragraph, is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 2.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. PARKER of New Jersey rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for subsection 2.

The CHAIRMAN. There is another committee amendment pending.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Before that I desire to offer an amendment amending section 2 by the insertion of certain words.

Mr. WALSH. You have to vote on the committee amendment first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "owner or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 17, strike out the word "pe" and insert in lieu thereof the word "be."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], a member of the committee. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 4, line 16, after the words "private power plant," insert "or plants in connection therewith for the production of gas, coke, toluol, benzol, coal-tar products, and any other useful products that may be produced through or in connection with the coking of coal or lignite or through or in connection with the combustion of any fuel.

Mr. WINGO. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. I thought we passed that paragraph this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the paragraph we have just been considering an amendment to.

Mr. WINGO. We have been considering an amendment to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Subsection 2.

Mr. WINGO. I make the further point of order that we have voted on the item in amendment already.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is all one section.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me one minute to explain why it is? It is necessary because we have been providing that——.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] will suspend. The Chair understands the amendment has not been offered at this place.

Mr. WINGO. I may be in error. Where is the language it is proposed to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That does not strike out anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is recognized.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to point out to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the members of the Committee of the Whole the fact that we limited the function of a private power plant exclusively in the production of power. If there be private power plants in which the Government installs machinery they may want to put in that machinery not for the increase of the production of power but for the improvement of the work done there in connection with the power in by-products. All of this amendment would have been unnecessary if it had been adopted in the definition of a power plant, as I proposed in the beginning. If it is not adopted the Government would not be able when it went into a private power plant to improve the gas works in connection with it unless this provision is put in this bill, and it will have to be put in every clause.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman's amendment is a good one. The gentleman uses the original language?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I did draw it so as to use the original language.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest that the gentleman put in "carbonizing of lignite."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes. I shall have to offer it in several places in order to perfect the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota calls for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 3.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have a little amendment here to perfect the text.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee with pleasure.

Mr. SIMS. At the end of line 5, page 5, strike out the word "at," and then on line 6, page 5, strike out the words "their then value or" and insert "for such an amount and." This has been submitted to Mr. ESCH and Mr. WALSH and others and it improves the bill. I do not want to discuss it further.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will please repeat his amendment.

Mr. SIMS. The amendment is this: At the end of line 5, page 5, strike out the word "at," and in the beginning of line 6 strike out the words "their then value or" and insert "for such an amount and." There is no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMS: Lines 5 and 6, page 5, strike out the words "at their then value or" and insert in lieu thereof "for such amount and."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. What does this amendment do?

Mr. SIMS. It is necessary on account of another amendment that will be offered as a substitute for section 3 to strike out the words "the then value," so that the contracts may be made for such an amount as then may be found to be just and not upon "the then value." It has been thoroughly considered, and we believe it should go in.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is nothing in this bill that fixes the amount.

Mr. SIMS. But the substitute section does. It provides that the contract may provide for the amount to be paid instead of "the then value."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. As I understand it, you are considering now section 4. Is that it?

Mr. SIMS. No; subsection 2 of section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for section 2.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a preferential amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. SIMS. As soon as the gentleman from Massachusetts offers his amendment I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. I rise for the purpose of moving that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending before the committee. The gentleman has not the floor for the purpose of making that motion.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that that motion is always in order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman had recognition from the Chair for that purpose he would be recognized to make the motion, but the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] was recognized.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Then I withdraw it for that purpose, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 4, lines 20 and 21, strike out the words "by providing the operator of such plant with funds to be applied to that purpose" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "by advancing to the operator of such plant upon such security and such terms of payment of principal and interest as he may prescribe.

Mr. CANNON. Is that on page 4?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 4, lines 20 and 21.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I feel like saying, as I said before, that I see no objection to it. But it is unsafe to say that much on the spur of the moment; but believing, as I do, that the gentleman from Minnesota is a friend to the bill and wants to perfect it I shall not object.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the provision "by providing the operator of such plant with funds to be applied to that purpose" is so general as to involve, perhaps by implication, the making of a gift. It involves no assumption at all of repayment. What I want to do is to have it indicated that, so far as the Congress is concerned, it desires that the money shall be repaid in so far as it is possible, in the discretion of the President, to have it repaid.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state his amendment again? I did not catch it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I propose to insert in lieu of the language stricken out this language: "By advancing to the operator of such plant funds to be applied to that purpose upon such security and upon such terms of payment of principal and interest as he may prescribe." That leaves the question of the terms entirely within the discretion of the President, but it does indicate that the repayment is to be made.

Mr. DECKER. What do you strike out and put that in in place of?

Mr. ANDERSON. The words "By providing the operator of such plant with funds to be applied to that purpose."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I can see no objection to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. DECKER. Just a moment——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri rise to oppose the amendment?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DECKER. I am not sure that I understand the meaning of this amendment, but I think it my duty to call the attention of the House to one of the purposes of this bill, and I am afraid the gentleman's amendment contravenes that purpose. If the gentleman's amendment means that in all events the principal and interest shall be paid back by the man to whom the money is advanced, then you defeat the purpose of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. DECKER. Because we might just as well face conditions as they are. This is the situation as testified to by the chairman of the War Industries Board and other public men charged with the responsibility of providing for the necessities of the war. There is a great need for more power. The men who own these power plants say—I know none of them personally—that from a financial standpoint they can not make the additional improvements necessary to furnish the power, because the cost of the equipment is so high, the money market being monopolized by the Government, that they can not get the money to increase their plants. But the lack of money is not the only thing. The abnormal cost of equipment will not, in their judgment, justify a reasonable interest on the investment, and if you put in here an iron-clad requirement that they must pay it back dollar for dollar with interest, then it will defeat the principal purpose of the bill, because in another place in the bill we provide that if we loan money to these people and request them to spend that money in equipping their plants so that we may have the power necessary to win the war, and if it afterwards develops that they have suffered loss, we will not require them to pay back the full amount, but will make an adjustment between what the property is really worth to them as a financial investment and what it actually cost.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is taken care of in subsection 3 of this section anyway. It has no relation to this particular provision.

Mr. DECKER. But it is absolutely in conflict with that section. I think it indicates the intention of Congress that this money shall be paid back dollar for dollar with interest. If it means that, then it conflicts with the section, which you admit is there, and defeats the very purpose of the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman be satisfied if from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota there be eliminated the words "terms of payment of principal and interest," thus leaving it practically to read as follows:

By advancing to the operator of such plant funds to be applied for that purpose upon such terms as the President may prescribe.

Mr. DECKER. "Upon such terms"?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. That bill gives to him the full authority.

Mr. DECKER. The bill as it is now written provides how money shall be paid and what shall be done with it, and that we shall have the property. But the way the bill is now drawn, we can advance the money if they want it. We can put up the property at our own expense, knowing when we put it up that when the war is over it will not be worth as much as it costs, but knowing that we, the Government of the United States, are able to stand a loss when a private individual would not be able to stand it.

Mr. ESCH. This does not obligate the operator to pay it back, because it leaves it to the President to fix the terms, and we strike out the word "provide," and I think that is wrong. I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that it should be "advance" instead of "provide," and we should leave the rest to the discretion of the President. We are doing that all through the bill.

Mr. DECKER. But the amendment as written provides that the principal and interest shall be paid back.

Mr. ESCH. I think the gentleman can modify his amendment to obviate that objection.

Mr. DECKER. I think that should be modified to meet that objection, because this says to the President, "Mr. President, you can loan this money to them to win the war, but you have got to provide terms whereby they will pay back the principal and interest." If they could borrow the money to pay back the principal and interest they would go ahead and make these improvements themselves, but the evidence is that no business man is willing to borrow money for this purpose, because it is not a business proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the amendment. As I indicated a moment ago, the section as it now reads authorizes the President to provide the owner or operator of a plant with funds to be applied to the purposes specified in the section. Now, the word "provide" does not carry any assumption or any intendment of repayment. There are three methods of procedure prescribed in this section: First, the President may construct the plant; second, he may loan to the operator of the plant or advance to the operator of the plant the funds necessary to extend it, and those two propositions are preferential; in the third place, he may do what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] suggests—he may advance money to the operator of the plant under an agreement that certain extensions are to be made, and that the repayment of an amount equal to the depreciation as a result of the war, between the value of the plant at the time it is constructed and at the end of the contract period, shall be waived. Now, these three methods are alternative, and the last one is to be used only in case the plant is not constructed by the Government or the money is not advanced to the operator upon the basis of repayment. There is no question in the world but that the subsection 2 of this section contemplates that the money advanced shall be repaid, but it does not say so; and it ought to say so, because if it is possible to loan the money to the operators of these plants upon the basis of repayment, obviously that ought to be done, and it ought to be done in every case where it can be done. It seems to me the argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] has no force at all in this situation, because the method which he suggests can be invoked, if it is necessary to do it, under subsection 3. It ought not to be invoked unless there is no other way of accomplishing the purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 14, after the word "law," insert the following:
"Provided, That a declaration shall be made by the United States, through its officer making the installation and recorded in the office where the mortgage of said property would be recorded, declaring the intention to retain the title, describing the property and place of its location."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have examined that amendment, as I did the other, briefly, and it seems to me that there is no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for subsection (2).

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for subsection (2), offered by Mr. WALSH:
"(2) To install in any existing private power plant such machinery or appliances or to erect such structures as he may deem necessary to increase the capacity or productivity of such plant upon such terms and conditions as he may determine: Provided, however, That no contract, lease, or agreement shall be entered into for a term exceeding five years after the termination of the war period: And provided further, That prior to the expiration of such term the title of the United States to such appliances, machinery, or structures shall be disposed of by the President in such manner as he may determine to be for the best interests of the United States."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the committee has been in session late for Saturday afternoon and has worked faithfully. We have had the best of good feeling; and while we might go on for an hour or an hour and a half, we can not finish the bill this afternoon. In view of the fact that the present amendment is a substitute for the entire subsection and can be printed in the RECORD so that Members can study it before voting on it, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12776, the emergency power bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely, on account of important business and making liberty-loan speeches.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I was requested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] to ask unanimous consent that the following letters be printed in the RECORD, a letter by Mr. Tumulty and one from W. J. Cochran.

Mr. WALSH. On what topic?

Mr. SIMS. I have not read the letters closely.

Mr. WALSH. I reserve the right to object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, September 30, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KRAUS: A bill (H. R. 13024) to amend the war-risk insurance act; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 13025) to provide for the establishment of a sanatorium at Lava Hot Springs, Idaho, for the treatment of persons in the military or naval forces of the United States, or who may be discharged therefrom for disability, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: A bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. McARTHUR: A bill (H. R. 13027) granting an increase of pension to Jessie P. Thompson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 13028) granting a pension to Mary Arthur; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COADY: A bill (H. R. 13029) for the relief of William Dugent, alias William Brown; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Resolutions of a public meeting held at Baltimore, Md., asking for a constitutional amendment prohibiting polygamy; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petitions of Mrs. Lena D. Snyder and of Mrs. Lilly A. Kimmell, both of Los Angeles, Cal., for the enactment of legislation to effect war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 30, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thee because we are seekers after the truth. We have walked in holy fellowship with Thee in the path of nature, and from life's minute beginning up at last to man we have seen the mark of the divine power. We have followed Thy providence in human history. We have seen from that stream the tendency that makes for righteousness. We believe that Thou art leading on with all the forces of nature and of nature's King and Priest. We pray that Thou wilt guide us this day in the discharge of its duties, that in seeking a nation's destiny and a nation's highest welfare we may seek it in harmony with the will of God. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., September 30, 1918.

TO THE SENATE: Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD, a Senator from the State of Alabama, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

WILLARD SAULSBURY,
President pro tempore.

Mr. BANKHEAD thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed the Secretary to read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding session.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11231) to regulate the hours of duty of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. CROSSER, and Mr. CARY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 334) making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government for the month of October, 1918, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were subsequently signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 11259. An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply;

H. R. 12714. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919; and

H. J. Res. 333. Joint resolution to aid in combating "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gulon	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Baird	Hale	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hardwick	Martin, Ky.	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Henderson	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Benet	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers	Sterling
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Thompson
Colt	Jones, Wash.	New	Townsend
Culberson	Kellogg	Norris	Trammell
Cummins	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Curtis	Kirby	Penrose	Vardaman
Drew	Knox	Phelan	Wadsworth
Fernald	La Follette	Poindexter	Walsh
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pomerene	Watson
France	Lewis	Reed	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Shafroth	Wilfley
Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams
Gronna	McKellar	Shields	Wolcott

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] are engaged in a conference with the House Members over House bill 11945.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators have answered. There is a quorum present.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I was informed by telephone this morning that the President desires to address the Senate at 1 o'clock p. m. to-day. In view of that telephone message I send to the desk a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to inform the President that the Senate will be pleased to receive his communication at 1 o'clock p. m. on this date, and that the same committee receive him on his arrival at the Capitol and escort him to the Senate Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. LODGE, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. POINDEXTER as the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENROSE presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the passage of H. R. 12139, creating a commission to investigate the problems of reconstruction, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of the Rotary Club of Butte, Mont., praying for a Federal investigation of the conditions in the State of Wyoming affecting the production, transportation, and marketing of petroleum products, especially gasoline, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

GIFT FROM THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT (S. DOC. NO. 286).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I report from the Committee on Printing the resolution which I send to the desk, authorizing the printing of the proceedings in the Senate on the acceptance of the vases from the French Government. I understand that the French ambassador is desirous of obtaining copies of the proceedings, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. The printing will cost only a few dollars, and it provides that the proceedings be printed as a Senate document.

The resolution (S. Res. 311) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the proceedings in the Senate upon the acceptance of the vases presented by the French Government be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations.

DISTRICT FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11231) to regulate the hours of duty of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. KING, and Mr. DILLINGHAM conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 334. Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government for the month of October, 1918, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BENET. Mr. President, although I dislike to do so, I rise to a point of personal privilege.

On Saturday the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] had some discussion as to where I had been listed on polls they had taken of the Senate. I merely wish to say that until I spoke in the Senate on Saturday no one here or anywhere else had any right to say where I stood on suffrage or to list me on any poll. I had never expressed my position directly or by implication to anyone, and I do not wish any uncertainty to exist on that point.

I would not have said anything about it except for the statement in the New York Times of yesterday that my "defection" from the suffrage ranks had caused consternation in those ranks.

I wish now to repeat that if any man or woman put me on any list as prosuffrage they had no authority for so doing, and until I stated my position here Saturday no one had any right to put me on any list as being against the suffrage amendment, because I had not expressed my conclusion to any man or woman.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed, and the calendar is in order under Rule VIII, this being Calendar Monday.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, House joint resolution 200.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I closed my speech in behalf of the selective-draft act, as follows:

Mr. President, there are three primary steps this Nation should take promptly to convince our enemies of the futility of continuing this terrible struggle:

First. Select, drill, train equip, and make ready at the earliest possible date an army of a million men.

Second. Conserve our natural resources and human power by destroying throughout the Nation the liquor traffic.

Third. Stamp our professions of democracy with the seal of sincerity by enfranchising the integrity, intelligence, purity, strength, and lofty patriotism of our women.

We will soon have a million men and more on the battle line, and the German armies are now going toward Berlin. The end of the liquor traffic has been decreed, and before another year rolls around the last saloon in the United States will be closed forever. When the last vote is cast on House joint resolution 200 the Congress of the United States will have proclaimed to the world that this shall be a real, genuine democracy.

I was not so hopeful of it last Saturday, but I feel that that will be true in view of what I understand is going to take place to-day.

If this resolution fails now, it fails for lack of Democratic votes. The Democratic campaign cry, "Stand by the President in the conduct of the war," will again be proved by the record to be a political slogan rather than a patriotic appeal. Again will the record, made from the beginning of the war, show that Republicans have acted wholly as Americans, and given to the President more whole-hearted and generous support in what he deemed best for the prosecution of the war than the Democrats. This will continue till the war ends in a complete victory for our cause.

When Wyoming, in 1869, gave its women the right to vote, it decreed the ultimate enfranchisement of all women in this Republic and throughout the whole civilized world. This Nation can no more continue with the women of one State enjoying the highest boon of citizenship while the women of another State are denied that right than the Nation could remain half slave and half free. And so, with the passage of this resolution by the Congress will the men of the Nation have the opportunity to declare as a part of the fundamental law of the land that their mothers, wives, sisters, and sweethearts, who have helped build and fashion this Republic to be the savior to the world civilization and freedom, shall hereafter help to control, direct, and govern its destinies.

Woman suffrage is coming because of its inherent justice. You can no more stop it than you can reverse the decree of Sinai. It rests upon the eternal principles of right, and, even if we do defeat it now, it will be adopted before long. The objections to it need but to be stated to be refuted by reason and experience.

How did man become possessed of the right of suffrage? Not on account of his sex, but by reason of his brute strength. If woman had been the stronger physically, no one will dare say she would not have had the right of suffrage from the beginning.

Some object and say it will bring women into politics. So it will, but this will be well and good for politics. Women have elevated and purified politics wherever they have taken part in it. If men did not have the right to vote, their probable influence on politics would be a forcible objection to granting them that right. Not so as to women.

They say women will not vote. Neither do men. By enfranchising women we add very largely to those who do take an interest in public affairs and thus make surer the stability of our democracy.

Some oppose woman suffrage, strangely enough, because of woman's great influence now. I want her to have suffrage because her influence will be greater and more effective when she has the power to enforce it.

Others oppose it because they do not think the polls a fit place for women to be. That is a confession strongly against male suffrage and shows the need of a reforming influence. The effect of the presence of women at the polls in every suffrage State is a strong argument for suffrage. It not only shames the bad in men, but it brings out the good, and has greatly improved conditions.

Another objection is that women will be expected to discharge all public duties now imposed upon men and that they can not do it. Not so. Some men do one thing, some another. Some are relieved from certain duties and some are not. Some do what women ought to do. The right to vote will not carry with it the duty to do all things any more with women than it does with men.

Men and women differ temperamentally, physically, and mentally, and therefore women should not vote, say some. Why? They do differ, but this very difference is a powerful argument for suffrage. Laws must deal with women as well as men, and both should have a part in making them. Womanly knowledge, sympathy, intuition, and experience are needed to solve the problems affecting men and women, and more so to-day than ever before.

It will break up the home, say others. It never has done it. On the contrary, it strengthens home ties, brings a sweeter companionship, and develops a higher citizenship.

Will it lessen man's respect or chivalry toward women? No. If it did it would prove the man lacking in that regard for the duties of citizenship that each should have. If it has any effect in this regard it increases man's respect and regard for those who are sharing with him the duties of citizenship and doing well their part for State and Nation.

It is now urged with much vehemence that woman suffrage will greatly increase the ignorant vote of the country. If the States do their duty it will not only not increase the ignorant vote but it will greatly increase the intelligent vote. By the census of 1910 there were about 22,000,000 educated women over 21 years of age and about 2,000,000 illiterate ones. Is not it a good thing to add these 22,000,000 intelligent voters to the 24,000,000 educated male voters if you want intelligence in passing upon the great and complicated problems of modern civilization? It seems so to me. The States can exclude by proper regulation the ignorant woman as well as the ignorant man, and so, as a matter of fact, the adoption of this amendment will almost double our intelligence without adding to our ignorance at all. Thus it will add to the strength of that bulwark of a republic, an educated citizenship.

A man of great ability and high standing seriously contended before the committee that woman's duty to bear children should prevent us from giving her the right to vote. I can not grasp the force, logic, or justice of such a claim. On the contrary, it appeals most strongly to me as an argument for granting her this right. God, in His infinite wisdom, has imposed upon woman the divine burden of going down into the valley of the shadow of death to perpetuate the human race. That very fact proves to me that no one can be more safely intrusted with the welfare of the human race than woman.

Objection used to be made that it would be unfair for the small States to force such an amendment upon the large States. That was a reflection on the Constitution itself, but it has no force now since New York, the greatest State in the Union, with its millions, has adopted woman suffrage.

Some dare to say that the women are pro-German, and therefore this resolution should be defeated. That is a common assertion now when one has no argument to offer and is nothing less than a vile slander against the women of this country, who, longing for peace, are freely and cheerfully giving their sons, husbands, and loved ones and insisting that they shall fight until a victorious peace shall bless the world. No more helpful news can go to the German war lords than that the United States Congress has refused to give the women of this country a voice in governmental affairs, and no more discouraging news can be sent to the people of those countries who are fighting with us for liberty and democratic government.

Some oppose this resolution because the Socialists favor woman suffrage. Such a course consistently followed would defeat every progressive and humane proposal advanced during the last 20 years. What was denounced as socialism 22 years ago is now the law of the land, and political parties vie with each other in seeking credit for enacting the same. Socialists do favor it. Practically three-fourths of the Republican Senators and Representatives favor it. Over half the Democrats favor it. All political parties and their candidates declared for it. Why not make it unanimous? That might prove that it is not a socialistic measure.

Some learned men who loudly proclaim their devotion to the Constitution and our form of government urge most vehemently that this amendment should not be passed because it does not go directly to the people. That is an insidious attack upon our form of government and a serious reflection upon the Constitution itself. That Constitution adopted by the people themselves decrees the method to be pursued in amending it. That we are following. We believe in our Constitution; we adhere to the principles of our great democracy, and we are willing to abide by the will of the people expressed in the duly constituted way. If three-fourths of the legislatures of the Union do not ratify this amendment, we cheerfully abide the result.

The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], whom I admire for his courage and devotion to what he believes to be right, says that he is opposed to this resolution because he is a Democrat, meaning, as he has often expressed it, an old-fashioned Democrat.

The old-fashioned Democrat is a rara avis. He is hopelessly behind in the swift mutations of modern thought and world events, and his objections to the new order of things are like beating the air with words.

He also opposes this resolution, because he believes it will be detrimental to the interests of his section and make more difficult the solution of the problems which will confront it after the war is passed. Looking at it from his standpoint, as nearly as I can, it seems to me that if we add the education, intelligence, humanity, and refining influences of the splendid women of the South to that of the men, these questions can and will be better and more easily met. I have always believed that it is wise to add to the aggregate wisdom of the people and that by so doing we are able to solve any problem that may confront a democracy.

Some, admitting all that can be urged on the merits of woman suffrage, are clinging to the shreds of the doctrine of State rights and propose to vote against this resolution. The doctrine of State rights has become a mere convenience. It is invoked when we do not want a thing and cast aside when we do. There may be some excuse for invoking that doctrine in construing the Constitution when we are legislating, but there is no such excuse when we are proposing amendments to that Constitution. There is but one State right guaranteed by the Constitution, and that is given by the clause "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." In every other respect the Constitution can be changed in the manner provided therein, and no State can justly complain of what three-fourths of the State legislatures may decree. The anomalous condition brought about by the present situation is an overpowering argument for a change. There is nothing sexual that would give suffrage to man and not to woman in any State of the Union. There is no reason why women should vote in one State and not in another. There is no just reason why a woman in one State should have the right to vote for all the officers of the Government, from constable to President of the United States, and a woman of equal intelligence in another can not vote for any. Why should a woman lose her right to vote by crossing an imaginary line or gain that right by doing so?

Those natural or physical qualifications over which the individual has no control should be dealt with by the national sovereignty to insure just and uniform treatment. It is entirely proper for the States to determine for themselves residence requirements and educational and other such qualifications for exercising the right to vote, but no State should have the right to say that a citizen can not vote because he is a male and another that she can not vote because she is a female.

This is not a local question. It is one of national and supreme interest, and the Nation should control it.

We are not doing a thing that affects one State in one way and another in some other way. The average woman in Missouri is the same as the average woman in Washington, just as the average man in one State is the same as the average man in another State. There are no peculiar conditions in any State affecting sex. It is the same everywhere. Sexual qualification for voting is not a part of an inferior sovereignty. Not only is the Nation interested in it because of securing just and equal treatment of its citizens, but it is interested in having the intelligence, humanity, and patriotism of all of its citizens used in meeting the complex questions that confront us.

It is urged that woman can not fight in war, and so should not be allowed to vote in peace. That objection is met by what they have done in this war in which the battle line at home is as essential to victory as the battle line at the front. They have won this war. The armed power of Germany could not have been stayed except with the heroic efforts and sacrifices of the women of Christendom; and it is but a feeble recognition of such services to permit them to share in the duties and responsibilities of peace in the countries they have saved for humanity, liberty, and democracy from the despotism of autocracy. President Wilson is eminently right when he says:

> The services of women during this supreme crisis of the world's history have been of the most signal usefulness and distinction. The war could not have been fought without them, or its sacrifices endured.

Mr. President, times are changing. There is a new order of things. We must meet this in an up-to-date way. Woman suffrage is not only a demand that must be heeded, but it is a vital need in this new order. When this war closes, our Nation will be confronted by the most serious and far-reaching questions that it has ever faced. The real test of our institutions and principles of government will come with the readjustment that must follow. We will need all the intelligence, all the humanity, and all the whole-hearted patriotism of our entire citizenship to carry us through. The earnest, loyal, united effort of our men and women will meet this crisis for the welfare of our people and the glory of our institutions just as that united effort is going to win this war. The great leaders of England know this need and admit it.

As I heard the able, wise, and patriotic junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] speak so earnestly and clearly of the need of early preparation to meet after-the-war problems, I could not help but contrast his attitude with the great statesmen of England. He thinks we should not delay making ready to meet these questions. I agree fully with him. He seems to attach no importance to the aid of the patriotic women of the country in solving these problems. He is going to vote against even giving the States a chance to say whether, under the Constitution that we hold up as the corner stone of real democracy, one-half of our citizenship shall have a direct part in working out these matters of vital importance to our industries and the Government itself. The women who furnish the fighters, as well as doing their full part in this war, he does not seem to consider worthy to take a direct part in the work of peace. The justice and reasonableness of such a position, I am sure, is clear to him; but it is wholly beyond me.

His able and learned colleague, who was most insistent that this Nation send the women's boys to the blood-soaked battle fields of Europe and who now declares upon all occasions that those boys must keep on fighting and dying until German autocracy and power are utterly destroyed, is most strenuous in his efforts to maintain autocracy over the best half of our citizenship. I am with him in his desire and effort to destroy German power and autocracy, but, to my feeble mind, his attitude toward our women is unwise, inconsistent, and wholly unjustifiable. What a contrast is the position of the great men and leaders of monarchical England.

Mr. Asquith says:

What moves me still more is the problem of reconstruction after the war. Questions which will necessarily arise in regard to women's labor and women's functions are questions in regard to which I, for my part, feel it impossible consistently with either justice or expediency to withhold from women the power and the right of making their voices distinctly heard.

Lloyd-George, the premier of England, thus expresses his views:

Women's work in the war has been a vital contribution to our success. It would have been impossible to produce that overwhelming mass of ammunition at the Somme had it not been for the work of women. Are you going to fling them out without a voice in determining the new conditions? It would be an outrage. That is why the woman question has become very largely a war question.

If English women can help, ours can do more.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET] says that he would vote for this resolution if he could be shown that it is necessary to win the war. It is not necessary to win the war, because the women are too patriotic to make it necessary. They will not quit work, they will not stop sacrificing, and they will not cease sending their boys to fight for the country if their wishes are not granted. That the passage of this resolution will help to win the war, that it will dishearten the enemy, that it will strengthen our allies, that it will vindicate democracy and give a new impetus to democratic thought and aspiration is not only the judgment of our women and many of our best and most patriotic men, but of the President of the United States and the Commander in Chief of our armies and navies, who ought to know and who does know better than anyone else what the effect of our action on this resolution is likely to be. He says:

Much of the morale of this country and of the world will repose in our sincere adherence to democratic principles, and the passage of the suffrage amendment at this time is an essential psychological element in the conduct of the war for democracy. Our action on this amendment will have an important and immediate influence upon the whole atmosphere and morale of the nations engaged in the war, and every day I am coming to see how extremely important that side of the whole thing is.

What better authority does the Senator from South Carolina desire than that?

The time is here, the hour has struck for us to allow our people in the way provided by the Constitution to enfranchise that great body of our citizens who are better fitted by intelligence, education, capacity, refinement, lofty motives, high aspirations, and native ability to discharge the duties of citizenship in this great Nation than any other class upon whom this right has ever been bestowed. The women of this country demand the right and power of the ballot. They are entitled to it, not as a special privilege but as a well-earned and well-deserved function of citizenship.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the right of women to vote has its justification in the political axiom of Thomas Jefferson that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed—a principle universally acknowledged in America and generally believed to be more or less in issue in the world contest now going on.

Macaulay says in his great history that—

None of those Virginian patriots who vindicated their separation from the British Empire by proclaiming it to be a self-evident truth that all men were endowed by the Creator with an inalienable right to liberty would have had the smallest scruple about shooting any negro who had laid claim to that inalienable right.

Some other historian will relate that for a century and a half after it was proclaimed, the nation which gave to the world the truism to which reference has been made continued to deny to one-half its people—that is, its women—any voice in the government to which they were subject or in the laws to which they were obliged to yield obedience—continued to deny them even after their sex was enfranchised by the government against which the principle was originally invoked in vindication of the revolt of the colonies through which our independence was attained.

The opponents of woman suffrage decline to follow the Jeffersonian aphorism to its logical conclusion because of the dire results to society they conceive such a course will bring. None of the evils they dread have manifested themselves among the people of Wyoming, whose women have voted for almost a half a century, nor in Colorado, where woman suffrage has prevailed for nearly a generation. For the greater part the considerations upon which the antisuffragist justifies his attitude, when he permits himself to reflect upon the subject at all, relate to matters of speculation either as to existing or future conditions.

Distinguished members of this body have asserted on the floor, in substance, "The women of my State do not want to vote and would not if given the opportunity." Such I understand to be the purport of remarks heretofore made by the senior Senator from Virginia and the senior Senator from Georgia. How has the fact been ascertained and upon what basis is the prognostication made? Are the women of Virginia or of Georgia essentially different from their sisters of California or Montana or New York or Texas or Arkansas? Despite the many racial strains in our blood we are a homogeneous people. The melting pot has, in the main, done its work well. I speak of those removed from the emigrant by at least one generation.

It is to be expected that in an environment and in an atmosphere permeated with the view that women give offense by harboring the natural desire to exercise the right that marks men as free, many women will exhibit an indifference and some an antagonism to their own enfranchisement. As a rule, the man who expresses the view that the women of his State do not desire to vote sees in them only the reflection of his own convictions or prejudices and voices his hopes rather than his knowledge. It is yet to be recorded that the women of any State in which they enjoy the right to vote have, in numbers not wholly negligible, urged that it be recalled. Moreover the prejudiced mind is very likely to mistake indifference for opposition. Many women betray an unconcern about public, and particularly about partisan, political contests. Why should they be expected to be deeply interested in affairs in the direction of which they are forbidden to have any real or at least effective part? Set them free and they will exhibit the same eagerness to play their part in democratic government, and at least the same mastery of the problems with which they are called upon to deal, as men do.

It must not be forgotten that from the day the Republic was established even unto this hour statesmen and publicists, journalists and orators, have been admonishing men not to neglect to exercise the privilege of the ballot. Argument and expostulation have both been exhausted in the endeavor to impress upon men the high character of the privilege they enjoy in the franchise and the solemn duty they owe to their country to exercise it. Notwithstanding the efforts of generations in this direction, it is doubtful if in the entire country 80 per cent of those duly entitled to the ballot vote at final or 40 per cent at primary elections.

The obligation to register is one of which the voter stands in constant need of reminding. The press at every recurring election spurs the laggard voter with reiterated admonitions that "if you do not register you can not vote." Importunate candidates for local offices hunt up the delinquent and see that he observes the requisite formality. Campaign managers take up the quest. Still the number who escape is always considerable and in an "off year," as shown by the election returns, is always large. If half the effort that has been made to induce men to vote were put forth to prevail upon women to overcome any indifference of which they may be guilty in that respect, it would have dwindled into unnoticeable proportions.

Mr. President, no one is more conscious than I of the utter futility of anything I may say in further discussion of this measure, so far as the impending vote is concerned. I improve the opportunity, accordingly, to say a word to the women voters of the country upon the more than usually imperative duty to register for and to vote at the ensuing election. Under any circumstances the privilege is inestimable in character. If you study the institutions of a foreign country and learn that the people thereof choose their own officers and, through representatives selected by them, make their own laws, you learn that its citizens are a free people. Freedom and the franchise are thus indissolubly linked. It is by no means mere rhetoric to say that in this country every citizen is a sovereign. In voting he declares his will as to what laws shall be enacted and who shall be charged with the execution of them. His will, so recorded, within constitutional limits, a plurality of his fellow citizens concurring, is equivalent to that of any sovereign in the sense that all must yield to it.

But with the high privilege of the franchise goes the correlative duty to exercise it. If the entire electorate should express itself freely at the polls, the vast multitude who have no private interests to subserve, who are concerned only in the enactment of wise and just laws and in an honest and capable administration, as well as those who are looking for some special profit to themselves from the result, practically all reasonable doubt of the wisdom of their action would be removed. At least the liability to error that may mean disaster must be increased in proportion as the choice is surrendered to those whose judgment is warped by selfish interests. If the ordinary citizen is lax in the discharge of the all-important duty of voting, all manner of evils creep into the State, for those who seek to turn its machinery to their own profit will not fail to be on hand with all whom they may be able to control or influence.

The obligation on all who enjoy the privilege of the franchise to exercise it patriotically is especially imperative in this hour. To the women of the country to whom the right of suffrage has been extended I appeal particularly not to neglect the opportunity that is before you. Now, as never before, the country stands in need of the highest order of ability in the halls of Congress; the wisest, most capable, and efficient men procurable in executive places; and, above all, men actuated by one common, overruling purpose to labor unitedly to bring to a speedy and triumphant close this awful war and thereafter to effect such arrangements and conventions as shall assure the world against a repetition of its horrors.

Every day affords additional evidence that the insidious propaganda of the enemy is still being carried on in our midst. You need no assurance that his agents will not fail to improve the present opportunity to introduce confusion into our councils and thus to impede our progress toward Berlin and add to the perils of our brave sons at the front. The traitors will all be at the polls, the loyal women should not fail to be there as well.

In the fierce strife that characterizes party contests it is quite conceivable that in many instances the votes of those of faint hearts or weak heads, the easy victims of the artful and practiced German propagandist and trouble maker, may decide the election. Eliminate that possibility or reduce the chances to the limit by being there yourself, and remember that unless you register you can not vote. You may not have been ardent in the cause of woman suffrage in your State, you may even have been among those who believed for one reason or another that the policy under which you have become an elector is an unwise one. That is neither here nor there now. An obligation has been cast upon you which you can not escape without being false to your country. How you should vote it is not the purpose of this address to point out. But the country is entitled to the best judgment of each of its citizens, and all its citizens entitled, under the law, to express themsevles at the polls, as to whether the further conduct of the war should be intrusted to those who have thus far been charged primarily with the direction of it and with the enactment of the legislation necessary to carry it on, or whether they should give place to others who profess to be able to devise and enact wiser laws for its conduct and to provide more sagacious leadership for its direction.

The women of America have already written a glorious page in the history of the greatest of wars that have vexed the world. They, like Cornelia, have given, and freely given, their jewels to their country.

I was deeply touched while at my home recently by the enthusiasm displayed by a refined little woman in telling me of the hazardous and responsible duties of her only son—scarcely more than a boy—at the front, as recited by him in a letter she had recently received. Pride in the part he was playing in the great tragedy, in the event of which all that we hold dear is involved, had submerged apparently every vestige of apprehension concerning his fate.

It was at one time contended that women should not vote because they can not bear arms, though they bear children. It is now realized that wars can not be waged without the labors and sacrifices of those who remain at home. Their contribution, though less dramatic, and, be it freely said, less deserving of either praise or gratitude, is nevertheless indispensable.

Women have been foremost in every movement in this country looking to the vigorous prosecution of the war. The slackers have not been found among them. They will, with the same devotion, discharge the duty that now confronts them to vote and to register that they may vote.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It being nearly the hour of 1 o'clock and the President of the United States being in the Capitol of the United States, the committee heretofore appointed will escort the President to the Senate Chamber.

At 1 o'clock p. m. the President of the United States was escorted by the committee to a seat on the right of the Vice President, and the members of his Cabinet occupied the seats on the floor provided for them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, the President of the United States. [Prolonged applause.]

The President addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. Vice President and gentlemen of the Senate, the unusual circumstances of a world war in which we stand and are judged in the view not only of our own people and of our own consciences but also in view of all nations and peoples will, I hope, justify in your thought, as it does in mine, the message I have come to bring you. I regard the concurrence of the Senate in the constitutional amendment proposing the extension of the suffrage to women as vitally essential to the successful prosecution of the great war of humanity in which we are engaged. I have come to urge upon you the considerations which have led me to that conclusion. It is not only my privilege, it is also my duty to appraise you of every circumstance and element involved in this momentous struggle which seems to me to affect its very processes and its outcome. It is my duty to win the war and to ask you to remove every obstacle that stands in the way of winning it.

I had assumed that the Senate would concur in the amendment because no disputable principle is involved but only a question of the method by which the suffrage is to be extended to women. There is and can be no party issue involved in it. Both of our great national parties are pledged, explicitly pledged, to equality of suffrage for the women of the country. Neither party, therefore, it seems to me, can justify hesitation as to the method of obtaining it, can rightfully hesitate to substitute federal initiative for state initiative, if the early adoption of the measure is necessary to the successful prosecution of the war and if the method of state action proposed in the party platforms of 1916 is impracticable within any reasonable length of time, if practicable at all. And its adoption is, in my judgment, clearly necessary to the prosecution of the war and the successful realization of the objects for which the war is being fought.

That judgment I take the liberty of urging upon you with solemn earnestness for reasons which I shall state very frankly and which I shall hope will seem conclusive to you as they have seemed to me.

This is a peoples' war and the peoples' thinking constitutes its atmosphere and morale, not the predilections of the drawing room or the political considerations of the caucus. If we be indeed democrats and wish to lead the world to democracy, we can ask other peoples to accept in proof of our sincerity and our ability to lead them whither they wish to be led nothing less persuasive and convincing than our actions. Our professions will not suffice. Verification must be forthcoming when verification is asked for. And in this case verification is asked for,—asked for in this particular matter. You ask by whom? Not through diplomatic channels; not by Foreign Ministers. Not by the intimations of parliaments. It is asked for by the anxious, expectant, suffering peoples with whom we are dealing and who are willing to put their destinies in some measure in our hands, if they are sure that we wish the same things that they wish. I do not speak by conjecture. It is not alone the voices of statesmen and of newspapers that reach me, and the voices of foolish and intemperate agitators do not reach me at all. Through many, many channels I have been made aware what the plain, struggling, workaday folk are thinking upon whom the chief terror and suffering of this tragic war falls. They are looking to the great, powerful, famous Democracy of the West to lead them to the new day for which they have so long waited; and they think, in their logical simplicity, that democracy means that women shall play their part in affairs alongside men and upon an equal footing with them. If we reject measures like this, in ignorance or defiance of what a new age has brought forth, of what they have seen but we have not, they will cease to follow or to trust us. They have seen their own governments accept this interpretation of democracy,—seen old governments like Great Britain, which did not profess to be democratic, promise readily and as of course this justice to women, though they had before refused it, the strange revelations of this war having made many things new and plain, to governments as well as to peoples.

Are we alone to refuse to learn the lesson? Are we alone to ask and take the utmost that women can give,—service and sacrifice of every kind,—and still say that we do not see what title that gives them to stand by our sides in the guidance of the affairs of their nation and ours? We have made partners of the women in this war; shall we admit them only to a partnership of sacrifice and suffering and toil and not to a partnership of privilege and of right? This war could not have been fought, either by the other nations engaged or by America, if it had not been for the services of the women,—services rendered in every sphere,—not merely in the fields of effort in which we have been accustomed to see them work, but wherever men have worked and upon the very skirts and edges of the battle itself. We shall not only be distrusted but shall deserve to be distrusted if we do not enfranchise them with the fullest possible enfranchisement, as it is now certain that the other great free nations will enfranchise them. We cannot isolate our thought or our action in such a matter from the thought of the rest of the world. We must either conform or deliberately reject what they propose and resign the leadership of liberal minds to others.

The women of America are too noble and too intelligent and too devoted to be slackers whether you give or withhold this thing that is mere justice; but I know the magic it will work in their thoughts and spirits if you give it them. I propose it as I would propose to admit soldiers to the suffrage, the men fighting in the field for our liberties and the liberties of the world, were they excluded. The tasks of the women lie at the very heart of the war, and I know how much stronger that heart will beat if you do this just thing and show our women that you trust them as much as you in fact and of necessity depend upon them.

Have I said that the passage of this amendment is a vitally necessary war measure, and do you need further proof? Do you stand in need of the trust of other peoples and of the trust of our women? Is that trust an asset or is it not? I tell you plainly, as commander-in-chief of our armies and of the gallant men in our fleets, as the present spokesman of this people in our dealings with the men and women throughout the world who are now our partners, as the responsible head of a great government which stands and is questioned day by day as to its purposes, its principles, its hopes, whether they be serviceable to men everywhere or only to itself, and who must himself answer these questionings or be shamed, as the guide and director of forces caught in the grip of war and by the same token in need of every material and spiritual resource this great nation possesses,—I tell you plainly that this measure which I urge upon you is vital to the winning of the war and to the energies alike of preparation and of battle.

And not to the winning of the war only. It is vital to the right solution of the great problems which we must settle, and settle immediately, when the war is over. We shall need then a vision of affairs which is theirs, and, as we have never needed them before, the sympathy and insight and clear moral instinct of the women of the world. The problems of that time will strike to the roots of many things that we have not hitherto questioned, and I for one believe that our safety in those questioning days, as well as our comprehension of matters that touch society to the quick, will depend upon the direct and authoritative participation of women in our counsels. We shall need their moral sense to preserve what is right and fine and worthy in our system of life as well as to discover just what it is that ought to be purified and reformed. Without their counsellings we shall be only half wise.

That is my case. This is my appeal. Many may deny its validity, if they choose, but no one can brush aside or answer the arguments upon which it is based. The executive tasks of this war rest upon me. I ask that you lighten them and place in my hands instruments, spiritual instruments, which I do not now possess, which I sorely need, and which I have daily to apologize for not being able to employ. [Applause.]

Upon the conclusion of the address, at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of the Senate and accompanied by the members of his Cabinet, retired from the Chamber.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I hope that a vote may be obtained on the pending resolution this afternoon and that the trying and troublesome question which confronts the Senate at this time may be disposed of so that we may attend to other business. Believing that it is possible and probable that the Senate will vote during the day, I do not desire the joint resolution to come to a vote without expressing to the Senate and for the benefit of my own constituency why I believe the joint resolution should not be passed.

There has been a great deal said in the pending debate as to why women should be given the right to vote. It has been contended that women have the character, the virtue, and the intelligence that should place them in governmental matters upon the same plane as man. To those arguments I have no answer to make. I recognize the intelligence of my helpmate in life and all other women. I recognize their virtue and their patriotism, and it would be idle for any man to stand on the Senate floor and combat this question from that standpoint.

It is because I believe that this Government is the greatest democracy of the world, that for a hundred years and more it has set the example of a true democracy to the people of the world and pointed the way to the freedom of other nations; it is because I believe it is through the power and the influence and the destiny of this Nation that the peoples of the world will be led to a true democracy that I oppose the passage of this joint resolution.

What does democracy mean? Does it mean the government of the mob? Does it mean the unrestricted right of government without process of law and without limitation? There is no more cruel master in the world, never has been and never will be, than the mastership of an unrestricted and irresponsible majority. The true basis of a democratic government has rested in this country for a century and a quarter, and will continue to rest as long as our Government survives, on the intelligent response to the Government for the interests of the people who are governed.

It is idle to say that the people of the United States, the greatest Government in the world, could establish a satisfactory and a free government for the people of Bulgaria, of France, or of Russia. Government is intended to carry out the will of the people, not the will of the majority of the people of all the world, because the people of all the world in the aggregate mass have not the same desires, the same virtues, the same necessities; and true government must in the last analysis reflect the needs, the desires, and the wishes of the people who are immediately governed. I do not suppose for a minute that any statesman would propose a United States of the World, where the majority of the people of the world would control the destinies of the minority of the people of the world. Now, applying that principle to ourselves, bringing the illustration nearer home, has the time come in our great Republic when the destinies of our people in their personal rights, in their home protection, shall be governed by a majority of the people of the United States, or shall the people in the local communities continue to have an opportunity to reflect their views, their wants, and their desires in the individual government of which they are an immediate part? That is the issue that is presented to the Senate. It is not a question of whether a woman should vote or whether a man should vote; it is not a question of whether a boy should vote or whether a soldier should vote; it is the great fundamental question of free government, of democratic government, responding to the wish of the governed.

If that be true, if we are to establish these principles in the interest of the people who are governed, then in this great Republic of ours we can not abandon local self-government; we can not abandon the integrity of the State government, because when that is abandoned we then have outlying provinces, police districts, that do not reflect the laws of the country but are merely a part of the machinery for the enforcement of law. If it be the case that we propose to continue to maintain the separate governments of the States in order that we may continue to maintain the great principles of democracy for the people of those sovereign States, then I say the Senate should pause and consider before it launches into the future this instrument that may be the final overthrow of the very life and integrity of these State governments.

If you adopt this joint resolution, its conclusion can not be reached during the period of this war. No man would be so bold as to predict that at the best the ratification of this amendment could occur within the next three or four years, for every man upon this floor knows that there are States in the Union that are as fundamentally opposed to the pending resolution as there are Senators on the floor of the Senate who are fundamentally opposed to it. The result of your action in submitting the amendment can not bear fruition unless this war runs far beyond the period which the military men of our Nation predict will be the termination of the war.

If it is essential and vital to the democracy of our land that the integrity of these State governments should be maintained and preserved for ourselves and for our posterity, then, I ask you, Mr. President, what are the great principles of government that must be sustained and regarded in order that the political life of the States may be maintained?

I take it that there are three fundamental principles on which independent government rests; there are three pillars of democracy that if any man destroys any one of them in the end he will destroy the fabric and the life of the State. One is the power to control the local police system of the States. By that I do not mean merely the police officer; I mean as well as the police officer the police laws. By the police laws I do not mean merely those laws that relate to the good behavior of the citizens of the States; that require men to be law-abiding and to remain within the letter of good morals; but by the police laws of the States I mean that system of laws by which the personal life of the citizen is directed and by which the personal liberty of the citizen is maintained. In my judgment, that can only be done by the reflection of the will of a community that is in touch with the desires and the necessities of the people of that community. When you pass an amendment to our Federal Constitution and give to the Federal Government powers that were not given in the beginning, powers that destroy the police power of the State, you tear down one of the pillars that sustains the temple of liberty.

There is another power that you can not surrender to the Central Government without endangering the integrity of the State government, and that is the power of local taxation. That is not involved in the pending resolution, and yet it is threatened under the Dome of the Capitol to-day. It has often been said, and truly said, that the power to tax is the power to destroy; and when you place the power of taxation in reference to local affairs in the hands of the Central Government then you place in the hands of the Central Government the power to destroy the integrity of your local governments. To-day there is pending in the Senate a bill proposing to tax the salaries of State officers and to levy Federal taxation upon the securities of a sovereign State. It is only a moderate degree of taxation; as has been said, it is a no more burdensome tax than is being laid upon Federal officers; but the Federal officer is a creature of the Federal Government, and the Federal Government will not destroy the Federal officer, because if it did so it would destroy the Government itself. When, however, you tell me that you can exercise the power of taxation to tax the salary of the governor of my State to the same extent that you properly tax my salary, then I tell you that if you can tax that salary 2 or 4 or 6 per cent, you can tax it 100 per cent, and make it impossible for the governor of a State to serve his people unless he does so without compensation, and so on all down the line of State officers.

When you say that you are prepared to surrender to the Federal Government the right to tax the securities of the State governments for war purposes in order to create a vacuum that Federal securities may have a larger market for sale, on the surface a very proper motive—and I do not question the patriotic sentiments of the men who propose it because it appears to be in the interest of carrying on the war—you do something that the Federal Government has never done before.

When you recognize the right and the power of the Federal Government to levy a tax of 2 per cent or 10 per cent on the income derived from State securities you recognize the power of the central Government to levy a tax of 100 per cent and destroy the opportunity of a State to finance itself; you destroy the opportunity of the State to live; to continue to exist.

Already you have attacked, either directly or indirectly, two of the pillars of democracy that have sustained this great Republic since the beginning, and the pending resolution would destroy the third, because the third pillar of democracy means this, that no government can exist as a free government, a sovereign government, a government responsive to and representative of the people governed unless that government within itself can control its own electorate. If you gave me the absolute power to fix the franchise in any State of the Union, I could determine in the end who would be the officers, who would control the government of that State. Suppose I went to a Northern State with the power to disfranchise all men save those who had leanings and sentiments toward the Hun. I could enforce in that way the election of traitors in the midst of a loyal people. Suppose I had the power to go to another State and disfranchise every man who could read and write. I could be sure by that method of having men elected to office to conduct a government that would not reflect the will or the virtues of an educated and intelligent people. Therefore, if you propose to surrender to the Federal Government the power to control the franchise in the States, in the end you will surrender to the Federal Government the power to dictate the officers that shall control the State; you will surrender to the Federal Government the power to reflect the will of a majority of the people of the United States in the laws of that community and not the will of the people of those States who must live under the laws and be governed by them. Now, which is democracy? Which is the democracy that this Government was organized to represent and to perpetuate—a democracy created by the will of a brutal majority, or a democracy that represents and reflects the will of the local people who are governed by local laws?

That is the true issue involved in this question. It is no new issue with us. It is an issue older than the Federal Constitution. It is an issue that the greatest statesmen of America realized and made perfect and possible when this Government was founded. There is no more possibility of the people of Alabama reflecting the sentiment, the needs, and the necessities of the people of California than there is of the people of Bulgaria reflecting the sentiment and needs and necessities of the people of Alabama. Why? Not because in either case there would be a desire to do injustice to the people, but because of lack of knowledge, lack of contact, lack of representation. No man, no matter how much intellect he possesses, can take wiser action than is governed by the facts that are in his possession. A Solomon himself could not properly legislate about subjects unknown to himself; and a legislative body that does not reflect the knowledge, the sentiments, and the will of the people to be governed can not give it an honest and a just and a democratic government.

I think I can say without question that, although in my State there is a minority—in my judgment rather a small minority—that favors the surrender to the Federal Government of the power of the States to control the franchise, the great majority of the people that I have the honor in part to represent desire to continue to maintain the control and exercise of the power to control the suffrage in the hands of the sovereign States, for the reasons I have just stated. That being the case, I do not think that because of war and the necessities of war we should be swept off our feet in this grave emergency.

On all matters pertaining to the Federal Government, pertaining to our foreign relations, pertaining to the maintenance of our armies in the field and the success of the great vital issues that are confronting the country, I stand in favor of making the arm of the Federal Government strong, powerful, and successful; but as to local affairs I know that after the final victory, after the German armies have been driven from the field and forced to agree to the peace that is required of them by ourselves and our allies, at the peace table the great principle of democracy for which our Government will stand and maintain will be the right of local self-government, and of people in certain areas, speaking certain languages, and of certain races, as far as possible having the privilege of governing themselves about all matters that do not directly affect their neighbor and their neighbor's rights. It is the only road to democracy. It is the only thing that can in the end spell the democracy of the world, and keep the final peace of the world. That is the principle for which our Government stands, because it is a great democracy. That is the principle that Great Britain and France will sustain at the final peace table. There can be no dispute about that. Then why, in this hour, should we be desirous of surrendering one of the great principles that govern local self-government—the right to control the local franchise?

Men may say that I may be influenced in my judgment about this matter, because there are two alien races in large numbers living within my State. I am free to confess that it does influence my judgment, because I realize that the life of my State may some day in the future depend on it. You say that this does not go to those questions; it is limited; it is only a single step in that direction. But I say, if it is a step in the wrong direction, why take the step at all? What is the necessity of taking the step?

The negro in Alabama is disfranchised partially by law; but there is no distinction in the law of Alabama between a white man and a black man. The black man has an equal opportunity to obtain the franchise. It is true that by reason of educational and property qualifications there are more white men who can obtain the franchise than there are black men who seek to do so, and that the racial problem is solved in that respect; but the racial problem must be solved, and must continue to be solved, as long as the two races live apart in their homes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. PHELAN. Do the colored women of the South own more property than the colored men, or have they better educational accomplishments?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not answer the Senator's question, because I am not informed on the facts. I think the probability is, though, that so far as educational qualifications are concerned they are probably on a par. They have an equal opportunity in the schools, an equal chance for learning, and an equal chance to make money; and many of them of both sexes have a degree of education. I think, however, you will find that where the family has earned money, the male member as a rule keeps the money in his name and not in the woman's name. That is not true, I think, as to the white people of Alabama; for I think you would find that at least half the property of the State—I mean the property belonging to individuals and not to corporations—stands in the name of the women.

Mr. PHELAN. The white women?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am very much interested in this race problem, and I am asking the questions in good faith. If it is true that the black men hold the property which belongs to the community, then there is no danger in admitting women to suffrage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, there would be danger.

Mr. PHELAN. They would not have the qualifications.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the Senator is begging the question. The Senator would buy our votes with an assurance that conditions may remain as they are, and have us abandon the great fundamental principles of government that men like myself and the families to which we belong in the South have maintained from the beginning. I will say to the Senator that our votes are not for sale at any price. We stand for these principles because we believe that the integrity of our race and our Government and the protection of our women require it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator's argument relate to an objection to the enactment of any constitutional amendment by the Federal Government?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would it apply to the case of prohibition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as that portion of the Federal amendment is concerned that authorizes the creation of a police power in the State to carry out the terms of prohibition it would apply. Outside of that I do not think it would. But that clause of the prohibition amendment that sought to set up a separate police power within the States clearly is in violation of the terms of democratic government and local government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is that applicable to the terms of the constitutional amendment that has passed the Senate and House with relation to prohibition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just answered the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does it, in the Senator's judgment, extend to the police power of the State?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have said that I think it does, in so far as it authorizes the creation of a new police force. I do not care, though, to abandon my argument for the discussion of that sort of a question. I have answered the Senator's question. Of course it does not apply to every constitutional amendment, because there may be amendments to the Constitution that relate directly or indirectly to the delegated powers of the Federal Government. The Federal Government was given the power to create a Congress. In that Congress a Senate was provided for. The original Constitution provided that the Members of the Senate should be elected by legislative votes. That was a Federal question—a question that concerned not the local government but the Central Government—and it was no infringement of the sovereign power of the State to provide that a Senator should be elected directly by the people of his constituency and not by a representative of them. The same is true as to the amendment of the Federal Constitution relating to an income tax. All governments must have the power of taxation, and that amendment merely broadened the power that had already been given to the Federal Government to levy taxes to sustain the Government.

Mr. President, I did not rise to take the time of the Senate to-day. As I said in the beginning, I hope this issue may be brought to a vote. I hope the conditions arising out of this issue may be carried away from Washington for the balance of the war. We have pressing on us matters of far more moment than the pending joint resolution. There is but one way in which the issue can be settled and taken away from Washington. That is to allow the Senate to express its opinion on the pending joint resolution.

I have no desire to take snap judgment on the men who favor the joint resolution, or to insist on a vote if their forces are not fairly represented but I understand they are. I would be equally opposed to having the joint resolution presented to the Senate by some one taking snap judgment on the opponents of the joint resolution and trying to pass the joint resolution by trickery rather than by force of intellect and votes. So far as I know, the men who are prepared to vote against the joint resolution are here, or they are represented by nontransferable pairs. So far as I know, the men on the other side, those in favor of the joint resolution, are here. If that is the case, I think it is the part of wisdom to bring the matter to a vote and dispose of the issue and take our work back to the great war measures which require our attention.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I regard the pending measure as epochal. Change is the order of time. Change is not always improvement, but it always marks progress.

To-day we are met in solemn council to pass upon a question that has agitated the mind of the public for years and years past. To-day it seems to me is the time to finally decide what the Senate has resolved to do. Let it be done here and now. The question has been agitated, the forces are ready, the fight is on, and to-day is the time when it can be decided for or against, and it ought to be done. Let there be responsibility fixed upon the individual Member by his vote and let him be praised or blamed in his community according as his people may feel about the necessity for the passage of this great measure. The time has come when it must be disposed of, and it ought to be done without further equivocation, without dodging, and without delay. It seems so to me.

I have not taken much stock in the arguments that have been advanced about State's rights being interfered with, about local self-government being obstructed, about the white race being deprived of its supremacy in the South hereafter, or of the danger of its integrity being impaired or destroyed if the joint resolution should be passed. There is no force or power in these United States that has contributed more to protect the integrity of the white race than the white women of the South. That can not be disputed. Everybody in the South knows that. Everybody in the United States of America who will think is bound to reach that conclusion. We have naught to fear along that line, then.

Why should we fear that the rights of the States will be taken away, that they will be abridged, that the people in the expression of their views will thereafter be obstructed? The Government of the United States is supreme over all, is given the power here by us and by the consent of the States under our own agreement and Constitution, proceeding in accordance with it, to prescribe that women shall be entitled to suffrage and to the exercise of it upon equal terms with men. Why should we fear to pass this resolution?

It is said, and has been aforetime and for all time said, that woman's place is the home; that her influence should be exercised there. That is true; has always been true. It is true now. Her influence has not only been exercised in the home, but it has been confined largely to the home, and so it will be when this resolution is passed. The home will not be deprived of her influence. Woman will not lose her influence, but it only shall be extended, and its beneficial effect felt throughout the United States; in the States where it may be, perchance, her influence or her determination or her conclusion or her reasoning is the thing that will govern in remedying any undesirable condition. Why should it not be so? I do not believe, as some of the southern Senators here argue, while I impugn no man's honesty or motives, and account for their conclusion and action on the ground that they have not kept abreast with the progress of the time.

I am a son of the South and proud of the South, her history and traditions; but I am not limited in love and admiration to any particular part of this great country of ours. I am proud of it all. We have been bound down there by convention; we have been bound down by custom; we have been bound by habits of our people, by our environment; and some of us have not been able to look beyond. That, I believe, is the trouble with some here to-day. But it should not be so.

Gentlemen of the Senate, I have lived all my life in the South. I suppose I was 21 years old before I ever saw a woman riding horseback astride, and I have not gotten used to it yet. We used to think that sort of a practice would not do in the country in which I lived, and the women were not permitted to ride that way. But afterwards I went out a little farther into the country, a little farther out West, where the same sort of a custom did not obtain; where it was different, and the women rode astride, cross saddle, in the West and the North and the East; and it did seem to me, after I got to thinking about it, that it was the right practice and the natural thing to do; but I have never yet been able to get entirely over that sort of a prejudice which was engendered in my mind in my early training.

It may be that some of us, just because of our training along particular lines, are becoming fearful that the State rights are going to be abridged by the passage of this joint resolution. It is not so with me. There has never been, in my opinion, any reason from an intellectual standpoint why woman should not be allowed to vote. She is, as a rule, as intelligent as the man with whom she associates. As a rule, it is so. Then, from that standpoint there can be no objection to her being allowed to vote along with him.

Will any man in the Senate dare say that any woman in the United States is not as much interested or more interested in the progress and development and prosperity of the country in the future than any man can be? From a standpoint of intelligence and from a standpoint of interest in the promotion of the country's welfare, there never has been any good reason why women should not be allowed to vote.

The only question that has disturbed the minds of some has been whether or not the extension of the franchise to woman would not be injurious to her as an institution. That is a thing which has disturbed us. It has disturbed some of our people, but we have observed the conditions yonder in the West. We have seen there where experience has proved, with women being allowed the vote, that it not only has not been injurious to her as an institution, but her participation in the affairs of government has proved beneficial to the State in improving the conditions where it has been allowed. Then, why not let us learn wisdom from experience? It seems to me that these things can not be disputed.

The argument advanced by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] about the States being deprived of their rights, about the taxation of the salaries of the governors and others I do not take much stock in. The taxes that are laid here for the support of the Government and the prosecution of the war are laid upon the incomes of the people, and there is no reason why the governor who makes his income by being governor of a State and drawing a salary should not pay upon that income, as should the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and all other officials whose salary is a part of their income. Why should it not be so?

As to the fear expressed that the Government having control in the determination of the qualifications of electors might interfere with elections and affect local affairs and conditions I do not care much for that argument.

It was said by one of the Senators that in the power given to control the election and limit it to a particular class of electors it might be possible to elect a traitor to the interests of the State and country under that condition. Aye, it might be so, but I say to you here and now, in the presence of all, it will never be possible when this resolution is passed, as it ought to be, to elect a traitor in the State or Nation when the women are allowed to vote. They do not take stock in traitors.

Some of the Senators have said that they have no special objection to this measure and personally would desire it, but they do not regard it as a war measure nor essential to the promotion of the public welfare just now, and therefore they are going to withhold their support. That seems to be a question that we must determine to-day. We have had the spectacle of the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States of America standing here in this presence to-day and solemnly assuring us what? Let us see. The President said:

> I regard the concurrence of the Senate in the constitutional amendment proposing the extension of the suffrage to women as vitally essential to the successful prosecution of the great war of humanity in which we are engaged. I have come to urge upon you the considerations which have led me to that conclusion. It is not only my privilege, it is also my duty, to apprise you of every circumstance and element involved in this momentous struggle, which seems to me to affect its very processes and its outcome. * * *

And further—

> And its adoption is, in my judgment, clearly necessary to the prosecution of the war and the successful realization of the objects for which the war is being fought.

That is the judgment of the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States of America and the peerless leader of thought of the nations of earth, and to our armies the world looks for victory upon the battle fields of France. He regards it necessary to the successful prosecution and winning of the war, and he is the Commander in Chief. Shall we dispute, then, about these other things here to-day if its passage will hearten, cheer, encourage, and inspire him, upon whose shoulders the burden of the mighty conflict rests, as well as bring this blessing so much desired and sought to the women of the country? Will we deny her when it is asked, finally?

I have not rushed the Nation into this great war with as much precipitancy as was exercised by some of the Members of the Senate. I was criticized severally because I did not believe in voting for the armed neutrality bill. That was at a time when the Nation was not at war. When I thought war could be averted without loss of prestige or honor. That was at a time when I believed the passage of the bill would put the Nation into war. That was at a time when I understood the President had all the power there was, and he afterwards exercised it, to arm the ships, and I also believed that the arming of the ships would prove absolutely ineffectual, as it did, and I did not intend to vote for it.

The measure never came to a vote. I was even accused of being guilty of a filibuster against it, which was not true. I spoke only 10 minutes against the proposition three days before the end of the session. I did not go into this war readily, but we are in the war; we must win the war; we will win the war; and the President of the United States says this further agency will help and improve conditions; that he regards it as absolutely necessary; and he appeals to the Senate of the United States to-day to stand by and help to win by doing this particular thing. I appeal to you Senators who have gone all the way in other matters at the President's suggestion and rushed precipitately at times, it seemed to me, to stand up now and vote for the passage of this resolution and help to win the war. It is necessary that it shall be done.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I am addressing myself to the question of woman suffrage, not from the standpoint of whether women are qualified to vote or not but to the question of what means should be employed in settling the question as to whether she should vote or not. The fundamental principle upon which democracy rests is local self-government, the power of self-determination. The Federal Government did not grant certain privileges and certain rights to the States, but these sovereign States, united in their articles of federation, created the Federal Government and delegated to it the power to be sovereign in those principles which in their nature were interstate and, of course, delegated to it questions involving international relations and reserved to themselves the right and power to exercise jurisdiction over all questions which in their nature were essentially intrastate or local.

The principle upon which local determination, the government and control of local affairs, depends is the suffrage; therefore the sovereignty of a State depends upon the power of that State to control and determine its electorate—its suffrage. If an alien or outside sovereignty is given, either by consent or force, the right to modify or qualify the suffrage within another sovereignty, the principle of sovereignty is yielded, because the right to modify and amend is the right to eliminate or destroy. This proposed amendment proposes to modify and in a degree control the suffrage of a sovereign State by another, and in its last section says that the Federal Government shall have the right to enforce this regulation, thereby declaring that the Constitution of the United States shall recognize the Federal Government as supreme and clothed with the authority by force to control the voting privileges of a sovereign State. This, then, is the destruction of the whole matter; this is the elimination and ultimate surrender of the essence, the heart of State rights. I do not contend that under the Constitution two-thirds of Congress first acting and then three-fourths of the States ratifying is not the constitutional way of modifying our Constitution, but I do contend that in so doing it is violative of every principle of American democracy. We all know what constitutes honesty in all civilized nations; we may legalize dishonesty, but when we do, it is violative of the universal consciousness of honesty. In proportion as we legalize dishonesty it is destructive of the universal consciousness of honesty.

No constitutional provision, no majority vote, can obliterate the fundamental fact that local self-government is the bedrock of democracy. It has been iterated and reiterated during this war that one of the essential principles for which the allies are contending is that the weakest State in all the aggregate of civilized nations shall have the right of self-government and self-determination in its local affairs and only insist that in those principles that pertain to international affairs shall any power be held supreme to that State.

In the enactment of the fifteenth amendment this principle of local self-government was revoked and, of course, disaster followed; the result was that being denied the right as a sovereign State for full and complete self-determination the very civilization of certain States was jeopardized, their institutions threatened, in fact, for a time were destroyed, necessarily involving a violation of other principles in order to remove the menace of so great an evil. It resulted in what is known as the "solid South," the effect of which was to deny us the privileges of political freedom of thought and action, progress and development politically, and unite us against a paramount threat always present, that of the destruction of every institution painfully built up through all the years of human effort to realize civilization; hence the wisdom of our forefathers in holding onto this fundamental principle and expressing it in the organic law of this country is amply vindicated. The progress and development of the South along all lines has been handicapped and retarded by the denial of this sacred principle in its sovereign capacity.

The fact that we were solid is not because we chose to be solid or because there were not certain political principles that we would like to have espoused and fought for, but because there was ever present the menace of a danger that absorbed and overshadowed all these. The sanctity of our fireside, the purity of our womanhood, those things were dearer to us than any possible commercial or financial or political principle. That is what has made the "solid South," and that is the question to-day that differentiates one section of the country from another section, and makes it impossible for the Federal Government to pass an act infringing upon State rights without doing incalculable harm to a section of the country.

The conditions peculiar to that section of the South did not exist in other States in the Union, hence they, not having the unfortunate elements that the South had, were given a freedom of action without jeopardy to their civilization that was denied us; it did them no harm nor did it do them any good; it did us no good but infinite harm; hence, being a citizen of a State that has seen the practical result of the violation of this fundamental principle, I would be unfaithful to my duty if I stood here and did not raise my voice in protest against the violation of this principle of American democracy. It is true we submitted to the States the question of prohibition; that was as violative of the principle of democracy as this, but the condition existing in each State in reference to whisky was uniform; therefore, though it was violative of the principle of democracy, whatever of good or evil might accrue from it would fall with like force upon each State.

I am not here arguing against the right of women to vote. I am opposing the methods by which they seek to obtain it. Each State in the exercise of its sovereign right can determine that question, and if the conditions in a given State are such as to make the exercise of the function by women disastrous, whilst in others it would be beneficial, I submit that the local governments of the States are best qualified to judge. What criticism could lodge against this country as to its democracy if we refuse as a Federal Government to attempt to usurp a principle which is distinctly the very fundamental principle of democracy? We must not forget that this is a federation of sovereign States, and in the exercise by each of self-determination as to its intrastate affairs or local affairs it is exercising the highest possible democratic privileges.

I for one shall never vote or give to a foreign power, another State, the right to modify, amend, or abridge the franchise and suffrage in another State. Sovereignty is the power to control the sovereign's affairs. Admitting the right of another sovereign power to amend, modify, and force that modification yields forever the principle of sovereignty. This very proposed amendment carries in it the words that Congress shall have the right to enforce this amendment, hence proclaiming State sovereignty dead, declaring the Federal Government in all intra and inter State affairs supreme, and we become at one stroke a Nation without the sovereign principles of local self-government.

Mr. President, we act as though we had forgotten that this is not a Nation in the common acceptance of the term, but a combination of sovereign powers, each within its own domain as sovereign as the Government that it by common consent erected.

As to the part that the devoted women of America are taking in this war, I know I voice the sentiment of every Senator on this floor when I say that the mainspring that is carrying the boys in khaki over the top, hurling the fiendish Hun back upon his own domain, is the picture of a devoted mother, sister, or sweetheart in the heart of hearts of the boys who are going over the top. Women have responded in the manner in which all the past ages have qualified her to respond in her magnificent rallying to the principles for which we stand. There is not a woman in all America worthy of the name of mother, which is infinitely beyond that of voter, who has not inspired her boy with the very principles upon which this Government rests—democracy, local self-government, the right to determine what is best along the line which the progress of the State shall move. That is the very principle upon which the Revolution was projected, and it is a principle which will never be yielded without the destruction of democracy.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the observations which I intend to make have, in my judgment, a very direct and immediate effect upon the winning of this war. They have to do with the raising of the necessary revenue for the winning of the war, and specifically to see if a method can not be pointed out through which a large mass of wealth that has heretofore escaped war taxation can not be constitutionally reached and should not be reached.

There are in the United States about 1,000,000 persons holding office under the States whose salaries aggregate approximately one and one-half billion dollars. There are now outstanding somewhere near $5,000,000,000 of bonds of the different States and their political subdivisions. Up to this time these salaries and the income from these securities have not sustained any part of the common burden of war taxation. The pending revenue bill, however, as it has passed the House of Representatives, subjects State salaries to tax as well as the income upon State bonds issued after the final approval of the measure. The present outstanding $5,000,000,000 of securities it is not proposed to tax.

Out of this situation two propositions for the Senate's decision emerge, one of law, one of policy, namely, has Congress power to impose these taxes; and if so, should the income from the outstanding five billions of wealth be included in the scheme of taxation we have under consideration?

The latter proposition may at this point be dismissed with the observation that the exigencies of the present situation are so grave that if Congress can constitutionally impose the tax it should do so.

The legal question, Mr. President, is a large and vastly important one, and the very general doubt expressed by the friends of such taxation in the House of Representatives and elsewhere as to the constitutional power of Congress to enact the measure in its present form impelled me to give the question consideration and to submit some suggestions and views concerning it in advance of a report upon the bill, with the hope that they may be useful in stimulating such full and thoughtful consideration as will aid the Senate in reaching a sound conclusion.

So far as the Constitution is concerned, the court has frequently declared that in terms it neither grants nor withholds the power to tax income on State securities. So far as the court is concerned it is my view that it has never decided the question nor the principle involved adversely to the exercise of the power in such circumstances as those in which the question is raised here and now.

I wish to clear the way for the presentation of a brief argument in support of the power of Congress to tax State salaries and the income from State bonds when necessary for the common defense in war by this admission.

I admit it has been time and again held by the court that the right to tax States and their instrumentalities does not exist in the Federal Government and that salaries of State officials and interest on State securities are within the protection of the principles supporting these decisions.

To those who wish to make a careful examination of the opposite view, the one that I am about to present, I recommend the extraordinarily able argument made by the Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH, of Idaho, in the Senate on the 10th day of February, 1910. That argument was addressed at that time particularly to the proposition that the sixteenth amendment did not affect the question, and for myself I think the Senator from Idaho conclusively maintained that proposition. I ask that the address of Mr. BORAH be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The address referred to is as follows:

INCOME TAX.

[Speech of Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH, of Idaho, in the Senate of the United States, Feb. 10, 1910.]

"Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a few weeks ago one of our most distinguished and justly celebrated of public men, Gov. Hughes, of New York, sent a message to the New York Legislature recommending against the ratification of the proposed amendment to the Constitution providing for levying an income tax without apportionment. It has been assumed by the public press, since the message of the governor, that it would be impossible, in view of his declaration, to secure the enactment of the amendment. So firm a hold has the governor of New York upon the public mind and so high is the esteem in which he is held as a lawyer that it was regarded as in a nature conclusive against the amendment. After some considerable consideration of the matter it occurs to me that there are at least two sides to the controversy, and, in my own opinion, the grounds stated for the rejection are not such as should prevail against the amendment. The governor stated in his message as follows:

"I am in favor of conferring upon the Federal Government the power to lay and collect an income tax without apportionment among the States according to population * * *. But the power to tax incomes should not be granted in such terms as to subject to Federal taxation the incomes derived from bonds issued by the State itself or those issued by municipal governments organized under the State's authority * * *. You are called upon to deal with a specific proposal to amend the Constitution * * *. This proposal is that the Federal Government shall have the power to lay and collect taxes on incomes 'from whatever source derived.'

"The contention of the governor being that if this proposed amendment should be adopted it would confer upon the Government the power to levy an income tax upon incomes derived from State and municipal bonds; and it would follow, although he does not so state, as a matter of logic and a matter of law, that it would confer the power to levy an income tax upon the salaries of State officers, executive, judicial, and legislative. In other words, the position of the governor is that it would confer upon the National Government the power to tax the instrumentalities and means of State government, and for that reason he opposes it.

"It is curious to observe, Mr. President, that this is precisely the same objection that was urged to the language contained in the taxing power of the National Constitution at the time of its submission to the thirteen States for ratification. It was contended upon the part of those who opposed its adoption that the language of the National Constitution was such as to enable the National Government to impose a tax upon the instrumentalities and means of State governments, to thereby embarrass the State Governments, and in the end to practically destroy them as independent and separate sovereignties. The argument was based in those days upon the plenary power which was given to the National Government to tax, it being contended that the language conveyed power to tax all property of whatever kind or from whatever source derived, and that this would give the power to tax the instrumentalities and means of the State.

"When Mr. Hamilton came to answer that argument in his Federalist articles he did not recede from the proposition that full power had been given to the Federal Government to tax. He stated that the power of the Federal Government to tax was without limit, unqualified, plenary, and that it should be so; that it was intended to be so; and that that was the only reasonable construction which could be placed upon it. He gave his reasons in the following statement, quoting from the thirty-first number of the Federalist:

"A government ought to contain in itself every power requisite to the full accomplishment of the objects committed to its care and to the complete execution of the trusts for which it is responsible; free from every other control but a regard to the public good and to the sense of the people.

"As the duties of superintending the national defense and of securing the public peace against foreign or domestic violence involve a provision for casualties and dangers to which no possible limits can be assigned, the power of making that provision ought to know no other bounds than the exigencies of the Nation and the resources of the community.

"As revenue is the essential engine by which the means of answering the national exigencies must be procured, the power of procuring that article in its full extent must necessarily be comprehended in that of providing for those exigencies.

"As theory and practice conspire to prove that the power of procuring revenue is unavailing when exercised over the States in their collective capacities, the Federal Government must of necessity be invested with an unqualified power of taxation in the ordinary modes.

"I am not going to assume that the effect of this tax would be any other than that which Gov. Hughes suggests. For the purpose of the remarks I propose to make to-day I shall assume that it would have the effect for which it is contended without discussing that question.

"The amendment which has been submitted reads as follows:

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.

"The words upon which the governor lays stress are 'from whatever source derived,' he believing them to include incomes from the sources I have suggested.

"I submit for the consideration of the Senate, first, that this amendment, if adopted, will add nothing to the power of the National Government to lay and collect taxes in the way of power; that the power of the National Government at the present time, as I have said, is full, complete, unlimited, and unfettered, save as to exports from the States, which has nothing to do with the argument here.

"It is true that there are two rules with reference to the manner in which the Congress shall exercise the power—that of uniformity and that of apportionment—but as to the power itself, putting aside for the moment the manner of its exercise, I submit that the power is at the present time vested in Congress without any limitation, unfettered in every sense of the term.

"Secondly, I invite the attention of the Senate to the proposition that the words 'from whatever source derived' add nothing to the force or strength of the amendment itself. When the Constitution says that the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, it conveys all the power that it would convey if it said 'shall have power to lay and collect taxes upon property from whatever source derived.' If we should have said in this amendment that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes upon incomes without apportionment, it would necessarily, in constitutional parlance, include all incomes of whatever nature or from whatever source derived.

"I reason from this basis: We find in the Constitution at the present time this power that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, and the court has held that it includes taxes upon all kinds of property and from whatever source it may be derived. Therefore the adding of the words 'from whatever source derived' does not amplify the power conferred or make it mean any other than it would mean if the words had been entirely omitted from the amendment.

"Third, the amendment did not deal, does not purport to deal, and was not intended to deal with the question of power. It intended to deal, and does deal, alone with the manner of exercising that power which is already complete, that which is already without any limit. The sole obstacle to be removed by those who sought to change the Constitution was that of apportionment. No one has ever contended that it was not within the power of Congress to lay a tax upon incomes. That power has belonged to Congress from its organization, under the original taxing power of Congress. Whether apportioned or unapportioned was a matter of discussion, and concerning which courts and lawyers differed; but the power to impose an income tax upon all property, 'from whatever source derived,' was never doubted, so far as I know, by either court or lawyers in this country.

"As a basis, therefore, of my argument to-day, I desire to show that the power of Congress to tax is at the present time unlimited, and has been so construed; that, so far as express provisions of the Constitution are concerned, there is no reason why we could not impose a tax upon State bonds and municipal bonds or upon the salaries of State officers at the present time. If the governor were asked why we do not impose a tax upon State bonds at the present time, to what provision of the Constitution would he direct our attention? If the governor were asked what limitation is there upon the taxing power of Congress, to what provision of the Constitution or language therein would he direct our attention?

"If the governor were asked upon what principle the Supreme Court has held that you can not tax the instrumentalities of the State, to what principle would he direct our attention? If he were asked what change is being made by this amendment in that principle upon which the court has held that you can not tax the income from State bonds, what change could he possibly suggest?

"In other words, Mr. President, the principles upon which the Supreme Court has held that notwithstanding the completeness of the taxing power now in Congress you can not tax the instrumentalities of a State are principles which are embedded in, interwoven with, and a part of the texture of the whole instrument, are in no sense changed by this amendment, nor could they be by any words which are contained in it.

"The Supreme Court of the United States, in Pacific Co. v. Soule (7 Wall., p. 433), said:

"The taxing power is given in the most comprehensive terms. The only limitations imposed are that direct taxes, including the capitation tax, shall be apportioned; that duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform, and no duty shall be imposed upon articles exported from any State. With these exceptions—

"That is, uniformity and apportionment and exports from States—

"the exercise of the power is in all respects unfettered.

"It will be conceded that the question of exports is not involved in this controversy, and can not be. Then, if we apportion an income tax at this time, under what prohibition or limitation of the Constitution are we inhibited from laying it upon State bonds? I ask that question so as to disclose more fully as I proceed that the reasoning is based upon principles which are not affected by this amendment, and which can not possibly be so, because of the language employed.

"Again the Supreme Court said in Veazie v. Fenno (8 Wall.):

"Nothing is clearer from the discussions in the convention and the discussions which preceded final ratification by the necessary number of States than the purpose to give this power—to levy taxes—to Congress as to the taxation of everything except exports in its fullest extent. * * * More comprehensive words could not have been used. * * * The words used certainly describe the whole power, and it was the intention of the convention that the whole power should be conferred.

"In Mr. Pomeroy's work on the Constitution (vol. 1, p. 188), he says:

"Because the Nation is thus paramount its taxing power is supreme; it may be applied to all subjects; it may be exerted upon all individuals, and upon every species of property.

"That is the announcement by a constitutional writer of the principle which has been embedded in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States from the time the great Chief Justice Marshall first took hold of the taxing clause and construed it. Yea, more, it has been a part and parcel of the accepted jurisprudence of this country since Alexander Hamilton interpreted the Constitution in the articles known as the 'Federalist.'

"I ask, if to-day under the present taxing clause of the Constitution we can tax all property of whatever species, from whatever source derived, what inhibition is there against our taxing every State bond of the State of New York, and the municipal bonds of New York, at the present time, so far as the provision of the Constitution is concerned? Certainly no one will contend that the present taxing clause is not full enough to cover all property, of whatever kind and from whatever source derived. It has always been so construed. If it were to be construed alone, it would undoubtedly be sufficient to enable us to tax State bonds. But it can not be construed standing alone; neither could this amendment. The rules of construction which control this present unlimited taxing clause would control in the same way and for precisely the same reasons the proposed amendment.

"In the late case of Nichol v. Ames (173 U. S., p. 515), the Supreme Court said:

"It (Congress) has power from that instrument (the Constitution) to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, and the only constitutional restraint upon the power is that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, and that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration directed to be taken, and no tax or duty can be laid on articles exported from any State. Thus guarded, the whole power of taxation rests with Congress.

"Again, in Bank v. Billings (4 Peters, p. 514), Chief Justice Marshall said:

"The power of legislation and, consequently, of taxation operates on all persons and property belonging to the body politic.

"Mr. Hamilton, in his Report on Manufactures, said:

"The National Legislature has express authority to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, with no other qualifications than that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to numbers ascertained by a census or enumeration taken on the principle prescribed in the Constitution; and that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. These three qualifications excepted, the power to raise money is plenary and indefinite.

"Thus the whole power of taxation rests with Congress. When you exclude exports from States and conform to the rule of uniformity and of apportionment, there is no limitation upon the taxing power of the National Government as it exists at the present time. I submit that it would be difficult to find language which would convey more than the full and complete power which is now conferred by the Constitution.

"I say, therefore, that already Congress is given absolute power; and if the reasoning of the distinguished governor were correct, the language being full and complete, conveying all power, we could tax State bonds and municipal securities and State salaries at the present time.

"But there is another controlling reason why we can not do so, which reason is omitted in the message and which is not affected by this amendment in any manner. The first time the question arose as to power of one sovereignty to tax the means or instrumentalities of another sovereignty was in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland. In that case, as all lawyers well remember, there was an attempt on the part of the State of Maryland to tax the stock of the United States Bank. The United States Bank having been organized as an instrumentality of the National Government to carry out certain functions of granted power, it was held that it was not a taxable article. In that case Chief Justice Marshall considered this question and gave us the basis upon which has been built the entire structure of law which prevents one nationality from taxing the instrumentalities and means of another.

"In the first place, it was admitted by the Chief Justice that there was no provision of the Constitution which controlled the subject matter. It was stated by the Chief Justice that there was neither any limitation nor grant of power which prevented the States from taxing the instrumentalities of the National Government, and he stated in his decision that, therefore, the taxing power of the National Government being complete, the inhibition had to be found somewhere other than that of the taxing clause itself. He said, in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat.):

"There is no express provision (of the Constitution) for the case, but the claim—

"That is, the exemption from taxation—

"has been sustained on a principle which so entirely pervades the Constitution, is so intermixed with the materials which compose it, so interwoven with its web, so blended with its texture as to be incapable of being separated from it without rending it into shreds.

"Upon what principle, stated a little more fully, but never more comprehensively, did the Chief Justice argue that you could not tax the instrumentalities of Government? Upon the theory that the Constitution as a whole created two separate and distinct sovereignties independent of each other in their specific and reserved powers, and that however full the grant of power of taxation might be in the Constitution, there must always be subtracted from that power the right of the different sovereignties to perform their functions as such. In other words, said the Chief Justice, to construe it otherwise would be to rend the whole fabric into shreds.

"It was not, therefore, because of the fact that the taxing clause of the Constitution had any limitations either express or implied in its language, it was not because the language failed to convey all the power of the National Government to tax, but because of the universal rule that every component part of the Constitution must be construed in the light of every other part of it; and that it all must be construed as a whole in the light of the designs and purposes and objects to be accomplished when the instrument was written. Those designs and purposes were to create a national government in its own sphere, independent and separate and distinct from the State governments, and to create the State sovereignties, which in their reserved powers are separate, distinct, and independent of the National Government.

"There is one thing that we overlook in arguing this question, and it seems to me to be the vice of the distinguished governor's argument. It is that the State governments, in their separate and independent sovereignties, in their reserved powers, are just as much beyond the jurisdiction and control of the National Government as the National Government in its sovereignty is beyond the control and jurisdiction of the State governments.

"In a later case, in Railroad Co. v. Peniston (18 Wallace, p. 31), the Supreme Court said:

"The States are, and they must ever be, coexistent with the National Government. Neither may destroy the other. Hence the Federal Constitution must receive a practical construction. Its limitations and its implied prohibitions must not be extended so far as to destroy the necessary powers of the State or prevent their efficient exercise.

"Again, the court in United States v. Ry. Co. (17 Wallace, p. 327) said:

"The right of the States to administer their own affairs, through their legislative, executive, and judicial departments, in their own manner, through their own agencies, is conceded by the uniform decisions of this court and by the practice of the Federal Government from its organization. This carries with it an exemption of those agencies and instruments from the taxing power of the Federal Government.

"I call attention also to the following citations and authorities, all bearing out the same line of reasoning:

"The taxing power of the United States is subject to an implied restraint arising from the existence of the powers in the State which are obviously intended to be beyond the control of the General Government. (Hare on the Constitution, vol. 1, p. 265.)

"This clause with reference to taxation is without any express restriction except that already referred to and explained—uniformity and apportionment and exports in the State. Despite this, it has been decided that the United States can not tax the salary of a State officer or a State municipal corporation or process of State courts or a railroad owned by a State. This decision rests upon the strong ground that the power of Congress—even under this full grant as contained in the language of the Constitution—to pass a tax law is restricted to a law which is necessary and proper to carry its taxing power into effect, and as taxation of a State franchise by the Federal Government is an infringement upon the reserve power and autonomy of the State, and as the power to tax without limitation is the power to destroy, execution by the United States of a power which involves the total destruction of State functions was not only not proper, but radically improper. (Tucker.)

"The revenue act of 1898 (United States v. Owen, 100 Fed. Rep., 70) provided that a stamp tax of 50 cents should be imposed upon 'all bonds of any description except such as may be required in legal proceedings not otherwise provided for in this section.' It was held that a tax could not be required upon a saloon keeper's bond required by the statutes of the State, notwithstanding this law. The court said:

"These cases establish the principle that the great law of self-preservation, the inherent attribute of sovereignty, exempts any and all means and instrumentalities of State government from Federal taxation.

"Rules of Construction, from Mr. Story:

"1. The first and fundamental rule in the interpretation of all instruments is to construe them according to the sense of the instrument and the intention of the parties.

"2. There may be obscurity as to the meaning from the doubtful character of the words used, from other clauses in the same instrument, or from inaccuracy or repugnancy between the words and the apparent intention derived from the whole structure of the instrument or its avowed object.

"3. In construing the Constitution of the United States, we are in the first instance to consider what are its nature and object, its scope and design as apparent from the structure of the instrument viewed as a whole and also viewed in its component parts.

"I desire especially to call attention to the language in the case of Collector v. Day. This is the case where the question first arose as to the power of the National Government to tax the instrumentalities of the State. The case of McCulloch was a case where the State was undertaking to tax the national instrumentalities. This was where the National Government undertook to tax the State instrumentalities; and the argument upon which the court rests its conclusion controls this proposition clearly and distinctly in the face of any language contained in this amendment. The court said in Collector v. Day (11 Wallace):

"Such being the separate and independent condition of the States in our complex system as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable that without them the General Government itself would depart from the family of nations, it would seem to follow as a reasonable if not a necessary consequence that the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their government, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible positions assigned to them in the Constitution should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled by the taxing power of another government, which power acknowledges no limits but the will of the legislative body imposing the tax. * * * In respect to the reserve powers the State is as sovereign and independent as the General Government.

"We are discussing now the question of taxing the State means.

"It is admitted there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of a State, nor is there any prohibiting the State from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation, as any government whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government.

"What were the conditions under which this decision was rendered, and what were the facts? In the first place, Congress had passed a statute specifically covering the salaries of all officers. Congress had passed the act under a power in the Constitution which had been held, and was held in that case, to be without limitation.

"We have, therefore, the lawmaking body of the Government exercising the power conferred upon it by the Constitution to tax property of all kinds and from whatever sources, specifically taxing, in so many words, the property which was exempted by the decision of the court, and not exempted because the language of the Constitution failed to cover the property, not exempted because the court found somewhere in the language a lack of power to put a tax upon this particular kind of property, but exempted for the reason, as said by the court in practically so many words, that there must be subtracted from this unlimited power the right of the State government to exist and perform its functions.

"That being true, when we should have this amendment adopted what would we have? We would have the unlimited power of the National Government to tax still unimpaired. We will assume that it does convey all the power to the Government that could be conveyed for the purpose of taxing, nevertheless we would fall back upon the principle enunciated in the McCulloch case and in Collector v. Day, upon the principle that it is not within the jurisdiction of the National Government to exercise control over the State functions or the functions of a separate and individual sovereignty; that unlimited power to tax, covering property or incomes from whatever source derived, will never be construed, so long as we have an indestructible Union of indestructible States, so as to embarrass or destroy each other. The fullest taxing power must be construed in the light of the objects, designs, purposes, and schemes of the Constitution as a whole.

"But it seems to me that this question has been even more definitely determined and decided. The income-tax law of 1864 specifically provided for the laying of a tax upon salaries, also to tax incomes derived from any kind of property. The language was quite as broad and comprehensive as the language of the proposed amendment in which we are at present interested. The Supreme Court held unanimously that this income tax of 1864 was constitutional, and it said over and over again that there was positively no limitation upon the power of the National Government to tax; that all property was subject to taxation. So under this constitutional power to tax everything Congress passes an act specifically taxing salaries and property from whatever source derived. Now, if the constitutional provision was unfettered, and Congress, under this unfettered power, specifically laid a tax upon salaries and incomes from whatever source derived, were they not in as strong a position to assert the right to tax State officers' salaries as they would be were this amendment passed? Yet, notwithstanding this express provision of Congress under this full taxing power of the Constitution, it was held that you could not tax the State instrumentalities. In other words, that while the language was unequivocal and unambiguous and the power was unquestioned, so far as the taxing provision alone was concerned, such provision and such act of Congress must be construed in the light of the fact that we are a dual Government.

"The internal-revenue act of 1864 also provided that no instrument or document should be admitted into any court until the requisite stamps should be affixed. The term 'any court' covered all courts, and it was quite clear that the lawmakers intended to apply it to all courts. Notwithstanding the language of the statute, notwithstanding its broad and comprehensive language, it was construed in the light of relationship between the State and the National Government and it was held this could not apply to State courts. (Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass., 457; Green v. Holway, 101 Mass., 243; Barber v. Gale, 43 N. Y., 40; Bank v. Hill, 43 Tenn., 325.)

"But, Mr. President, it seems to me that the question has been brought nearer to the present hour and more definitely presented in the famous Pollock case itself. We remember that in the Pollock case the income-tax law of 1894 was involved. The statute of 1894 had incorporated in it almost the identical language which is found in this amendment, covering property of whatever kind and incomes from property of whatever kind.

"That law was passed upon in the light of the general taxing power of Congress. It was brought to the attention of the court that included in some of the incomes was income from State bonds. There were two things upon which the court in that case were not divided. The first was that there was no limitation upon the power of Congress, as contained in the clause of the Constitution, as to what kind of property should be taxed and what should not.

"On the first proposition it was held that the power was unlimited. The second proposition was that, notwithstanding that fact, Congress could not pass an act which would cover the incomes derived from State bonds or salaries of State officers. I desire to read a quotation from both the affirmative and the dissenting opinion. Mr. Fuller, Chief Justice, said in the Pollock case:

"The power of Congress to tax is a very extensive power. It is given in the Constitution with only one exception and only two qualifications Congress can not tax exports, and it must impose direct taxes by the rule of apportionment and indirect taxes by the rule of uniformity. Thus limited, and thus only, it reaches every subject and may be exercised at discretion.

"Mr. Justice White said:

"The words 'duties, imposts, and excises,' in conjunction with the reference to direct taxes, adequately convey the power of taxation to the Federal Government. * * * It is unquestioned that the provisions of the Constitution vest in the United States plenary powers of taxation; that is, all powers which belong to the Government as such, except that of taxing exports. * * * In deciding, then, the question of whether the income tax violates the Constitution, we have to determine not the existence of a power, but whether an admittedly unlimited power to tax—the income tax not being a tax on exports—has been used according to the instruction as to method. Not power, it must be borne in mind, but the manner of its use is the only issue presented in this case.

"The basis of the court's opinion rested upon the proposition that there was an admittedly unlimited power, and under this unlimited power Congress had passed an act covering this specific kind of property. It would be interesting to go back and read the act of 1894 to observe with what fullness the statute covers the same kind of property which we are seeking here to tax; and yet, notwithstanding the fact that the court started in on its reasoning upon the basis that there was no limit in Congress to tax, and that Congress had under its full power exercised its privilege to tax, it fell back to the case of Collector against Day, and argued that you could not construe a component part of the Constitution in disregard of the instrument as a whole. Without repeating here what I have said, the court adopted and accepted to its full extent the reasoning in the case of Collector against Day, and again announced that the doctrine must prevail that one sovereignty could not interfere with the instrumentalities of another.

"In other words, Mr. President, when this amendment says 'from whatever source derived,' that must be a source within the jurisdiction and taxing power of the nationality which lays the tax.

"I undertake to say, without fear of successful contradiction from the authorities, that the National Government has no more jurisdiction as a governmental fact over the functions of a State government than it has over the property across the line in Canada as a territorial fact. They are not within its power or control. Until we revise the Constitution as a whole, take the instrument up and revise it and definitely announce that these separate and independent sovereignties are no longer to be so, no court will ever hold that you can interpret the taxing clause of the Constitution so as to destroy those sovereignties. As Judge Nelson said in one case:

"The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme. But the States within the limit of their power as granted, or in the language of the tenth amendment preserved, are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States.

"Again he says:

"In respect to the reserve powers the State is as sovereign and independent as the General Government.

"Justice Brewer in a noted case said:

"The States are in many respects sovereign and independent.

"Chief Justice Marshall, in laying down the rule of taxation in the case to which I have already called attention, says in another part of the decision:

"All subjects over which the sovereign power of a State extends are objects of taxation. But those over which it does not extend are, upon the soundest principles, exempt from taxation. This proposition may almost be pronounced self-evident. Sovereignty of a State extends to everything which exists by its own authority or is introduced by its permission; but does it extend to those means which are employed by Congress to carry into execution the powers conferred on that body by the people of the United States? We think it demonstrable that it does not.

"Take this ruling of the Chief Justice, which has been repeated in substance and in principle so often since, put it down by the side of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, and construe that amendment in the light of that principle, that only those things over which each sovereignty has jurisdiction and control are subject to taxation, what possible fear can there arise in the mind of any man that the Supreme Court will say that out of the words 'from whatever source derived' comes the power to do as Marshall said, 'rend the whole fabric into shreds?'

"These words must always be construed in the light of these principles; that is, as expressing authority which belongs to the jurisdiction which undertakes to lay the tax.

"In conclusion, on this phase of the subject I submit:

"First. That the proposed amendment adds nothing to the taxing power of the National Government. This power was complete, unfettered, plenary before. It can be no more than that should this proposed amendment be adopted.

"Second. The proposed amendment does not deal or purport to deal with the question of power which is already complete, but simply with the manner and method of exercising and using that power.

"Third. No one has ever questioned the power of the National Government to lay an income tax, for, as was said by Justice White, the question has always been 'whether an admittedly unlimited power to tax has been established according to the instruction as to the method,' and it was to remedy the method alone that the amendment was submitted.

"Fourth. The words 'from whatever source' adds nothing to the force of the amendment. It would, in constitutional parlance, be just the same if it said 'to lay and collect taxes on incomes without apportionment,' for who could then say that you would not have the right to lay taxes upon all incomes? The present taxing power would not be a particle stronger if it stated 'to lay and collect taxes upon all property from whatever source.'

"Fifth. To construe the proposed amendment so as to enable us to tax the instrumentalities of the State would do violence to the rules laid down by the Supreme Court for a hundred years, wrench the whole Constitution from its harmonious proportions, and destroy the object and purpose for which the whole instrument was framed.

"Sixth. To construe it to cover those incomes from sources within the jurisdiction and control of the sovereignty laying the tax is to construe it in harmony with the principles given us by Marshall and following from that hour to this.

"Mr. President, the history of the income tax since 1894 has not been one which any citizen can recite with pride. For nearly one hundred years the construction of the Constitution as established by the men who helped to write it had received the approval of an undivided court time and time again. During that period there sat upon the bench of the Supreme Court some of the greatest lawyers of that or any other period of this or any other country. During that period wealth had not become so domineering and so powerful and so determined to have its own way. During that period this Government had the power to impose the burdens and expenses of government upon consumption and upon all forms of wealth, and we did so. In 1894-95 these precedents were overturned. This Constitution received a construction unknown to its makers. In the face of two powerful dissenting opinions, assented to by two other judges, the startling and astounding doctrine was announced that the framers of the Republic had made it impossible to levy a tax upon some forms of wealth even in time of war; that the builders of this Government had made it impossible to dispose and divide the burden of government between consumption and the different forms of wealth. At the last session we were called upon to express our assent to that interpretation of the Constitution, by express act to declare our acceptance of it. Under majority rule there was submitted this amendment to cover and eliminate that supposed hideous defect in the fundamental law.

"Now, Mr. President, the scheme and plan is to defeat that amendment. Having, as a legislative body, solemnly declared our acceptance of this construction of the Constitution, thereby making it practically impossible to again appeal to the courts if this amendment can now be defeated this Government of the people, for the people, and by the people will stand alone among all the civilized nations of the earth shorn of the power to divide the burden of government between consumption and the different forms of wealth. This is the scheme and the plan; and, unfortunately, the great governor of New York has given much aid and comfort to the cause by reason of his high standing among the people of the country.

"Mr. President, no one ever saw this country in just the condition in which it is to-day. Never since this Government was launched has there been such a universally restless spirit among the masses of the people, such persistent inquiries, such ugly questioning. No part of the Government seems above challenge or criticism, and it is fast becoming popular in some parts of this country to scoff at the Constitution itself. A restless, unquiet, dissatisfied, and—worst of all—a suspicious public mind is the public mind of to-day.

"You can defeat this amendment; and I fear, from the men who are gathering to the crusade, that it will be defeated. Some of those who are proposing to encompass its defeat will not stop on the hither side of most disreputable means to accomplish their purpose. They are vitally involved. But when you shall have accomplished your purpose and the people shall have ascertained how their rights have been manipulated away, it will go far toward exciting to renewed force and strength that feeling of wrath and class hatred which is already too strong in this country. When those who are ill able to bear the burden of government see the expenses of the Government constantly increasing, when they see the creation of larger navies and larger armies, the burden of expenses increasing everywhere, and learn that, after all, this entire burden must be borne by what they eat and what they wear, and that certain forms of wealth which breed luxury, idleness, and idiocy go untaxed they will not listen to you when you are called upon to plead with them against radical changes in our form of government which will be submitted to this country within the next fifty years.

"I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the governors of the States and the legislatures of this country will do their duty and see that this amendment is adopted; that they will meet this matter, whether there is a division among them or not as to when it should be exercised, upon the basis that it is a power that ought not to be taken away from the Government.

"The people should bestir themselves upon this vital matter before it is too late. It would be nothing less than a catastrophe for this amendment to be defeated, if we are, out of a false idea of courtesy, to be deprived of appealing to the court. It is the people's fight, and no one should be misled by the utterly unfounded proposition that this amendment contains the power to embarrass and destroy the States and 'rend the whole fabric into shreds.'"

Mr. KNOX. I also submit, in order that I may give the Senate the benefit of all the strongest positions that have been taken against the one that I propose to maintain, a copy of an opinion written by Charles P. Spooner, Esq., of the New York bar, a son and a law partner of that great statesman who once so well represented his State of Wisconsin in the Senate and who as well was called into the general councils of the Government—the Hon. John C. Spooner. This opinion was published in the Wall Street Journal of recent date, and I ask that it be made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

RIGHT TO TAX STATE BONDS DENIED BY LAWYER—CHARLES P. SPOONER REVIEWS THE COURSE OF SUPREME COURT DECISIONS SINCE PASSAGE OF SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The question of the constitutionality of the proposed tax on income received from new issues of State, county, and municipal bonds has so far received little attention in the House debate on the revenue bill. It is a burning question, however, with investors, dealers in investment securities, and constitutional lawyers. The following opinion against the proposed law was written to William B. Smith 2d, a bond dealer at 61 Broadway, by Charles P. Spooner, son and law partner of former Senator Spooner, of Wisconsin, now of New York:

"I am in receipt of yours of the 6th asking my opinion as to the power of Congress to tax the income from municipal securities. With your request you inclosed several opinions upon the question.

"On many questions of constitutional law it is necessary to be extremely cautious in expressing an opinion for the reason that the decisions of the Supreme Court in regard to them have been so numerous, and involving so many shades of distinction, as to make it extremely dangerous to express a decided view. The question you propound is not of this character, but is one which I think sufficiently free from doubt to admit of a definite opinion.

"The answer to your question involves a consideration of the power of Congress to tax the income from municipal securities, before the passage of the sixteenth amendment, and whether or not that power was affected by the amendment.

"BEFORE PASSAGE OF AMENDMENT.

"(1) I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that before the passage of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States Congress did not have the power to tax the income from municipal securities.

"The creation of the Federal Government soon brought about disputes concerning the respective rights and powers of that Government and of the States, and the Supreme Court was from time to time called upon to pass upon their reciprocal rights and limitations. Notwithstanding the present popular notion that the States have no rights which the Federal Government is bound to respect, the Supreme Court, in the course of numerous decisions, marked out the spheres to which each of these governments was confined. It would be interesting but tedious and unnecessary to go into the history of all of these decisions, but I will mention a few which bear directly upon the question we are considering.

"In the case of Dobbins v. Erie County Commissioners (16 Peters, 435) the State of Pennsylvania levied a State income tax upon the salary of a United States revenue officer and the Supreme Court held that the State could not tax a Federal office or function and that a tax upon the income derived from that office or function amounted to the same thing and was, therefore, invalid.

"In the case of Collector v. Day (11 Wall., 113) the question was reversed and, under Federal income tax of 1864, it was sought to tax the salary of a State judge. The Supreme Court held that as the United States could not tax a State office it could not tax the salary or income of a State officer.

"In the case of Weston v. Charleston (2 Peters, 449) the city of Charleston sought by ordinance to impose a tax upon the interest derived from securities of the United States, and the Supreme Court held that the tax was invalid upon the ground that neither a State nor its municipalities could tax either an instrumentality of the Federal Government or the income derived therefrom. This case is explained in the case of Fairbanks v. United States, 181, at page 296.

"These cases have been mentioned merely as preliminary to one in which the exact subject of your request was directly passed upon by the Supreme Court.

"In the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429) there came before the Supreme Court for decision the constitutionality of the income-tax law of 1894. The case was elaborately argued by some of the best lawyers in the United States, among others being W. D. Guthrie, George F Edmunds, James C. Carter, and Joseph H. Choate. The law was attacked on various grounds and the court was divided upon some of the questions involved, but was unanimous in holding that the law was unconstitutional in so far as it sought to tax the income derived from municipal securities. A reargument was granted upon other questions and the case is again reported in 158 United States, 601. The reargument did not involve or change the first decision in regard to the lack of Federal power to tax the income derived from municipal securities. This decision is still the law and would seem to make it clear that before the passage of the sixteenth amendment Congress was without power to tax municipal securities or the income derived from them.

"WHAT THE AMENDMENT DID.

"(2) We come now to the question whether or not the sixteenth amendment conferred upon Congress the previously nonexistent power to tax such income. The text of the amendment is as follows: 'The Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.'

"The vice of at least one of the opinions, which you inclose with your letter, seems to lie in the fact that the writer of it attempts to construe this amendment himself with the assumption that the words 'From whatever source derived' included the income from municipal securities. That this construction is incorrect is shown, not only by the debates in Congress, while the amendment was under consideration, but by the decisions of the supreme court since its adoption.

"While the amendment was before the legislature of the State of New York, Gov. Hughes, in a message to the legislature, questioned whether or not, these terms might not have the effect of giving to Congress the power to tax incomes derived from bonds issued by the State or its municipalities. This called forth a letter from Hon. Elihu Root, then a United States Senator from New York, to a member of the legislature, in which he stated in substance, that the amendment was not intended to enlarge the taxing power of the National Government in any degree, and would have no effect, except to relieve the exercise of its taxing power from the requirement that the tax must be apportioned among the several States. It was upon this understanding that the amendment was ratified. As a matter of fact the amendment was proposed for the purpose of relieving the already existing income taxing power of the Federal Government from any necessity of apportioning the tax among the States, and was the result of the decision in the Pollock case, that the tax upon income derived from real estate was the same in effect as upon real estate itself, and would, therefore, have to be apportioned among the States.

"Irrespective of how conclusive the foregoing may seem to be, there is now no longer any field for speculation, for the supreme court has passed upon the amendment, and, in at least three cases, has decided that it in no way enlarged the taxing power of Congress.

"In the case of Brushaber v. Union Pacific Railroad Co., 240 United States, 1, the court passed upon the amendment and held, that as Congress already had the plenary power of income taxation, the only purpose and effect of the amendment was to relieve such taxation from the possibility of being placed in the category of direct taxation, where it did not belong, and subject to apportionment among the States.

"In Stanton v. Baltic Mining Co., 240 U. S., 103, the court again construed the amendment, arriving at the same result. Both of these opinions were by a unanimous court.

"If there existed any doubt as to whether or not these cases necessarily involved such a construction of the amendment, it is certainly set at rest by the decision of the court in the case of William E. Peck & Co. v. John Z. Lowe, jr., decided by the court, May 20, 1918. As I had the pleasure of participating in the argument of the case, as well as the disappointment of losing it, it can be discussed in this opinion with somewhat familiar understanding. The case involved the contention on the part of the Peck Co. that its income, derived exclusively from foreign exportations, was immune from the Federal income tax, on the ground that the Constitution forbade the imposition of any burden upon exports. The Government took the position, among others, that even if Congress had not previously possessed the power of taxing such an income, that it had obtained that power by the adoption of the sixteenth amendment, because of the words, 'From whatever source derived.' In passing upon that contention the court said, 'The sixteenth amendment, although referred to in argument, has no real bearing and may be put out of view. As pointed out in recent decisions it does not extend the taxing power to new or excepted subjects, but merely removes all occasion, which otherwise might exist, for an apportionment among the States of taxes laid on income whether it be derived from one source or another. Brushaber v. Union Pacific Railroad Co., 240 U. S., 17–19; Stanton v. Baltic Mining Co., 240 U. S., 103, 112–113.'

"I am, therefore, unqualifiedly of the opinion that until the Constitution is further amended, or the Supreme Court reverses its unanimous opinions in the Pollock, Brushaber, Stanton, and Peck cases Congress is without power to tax income derived from municipal securities."

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the vital question, then, is, What are the principles upon which these decisions are bottomed, and do they apply now, when the earth is wholly occupied with war and every human interest is subordinated to its insatiable demands? I state these principles in the language of the court.

In Collector v. Day (11 Wall.)—and there has been no decision of the Supreme Court which put the question upon any other ground than that which the court refers to in this case, a quotation from which I shall now read—the court said:

> It is admitted there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of a State, nor is there any prohibiting the State from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation, as any government whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government.

This is to say, Mr. President, the prohibition rests upon a necessary implication arising out of the relation between the State and Federal Governments, and the implication is that the right of self-defense must be unhampered, because, as it is succinctly phrased in most of the cases, "the power to tax is the power to destroy."

This leads us to inquire if there is any difference in the relations between Federal and State Governments in times of peace and in times of war, particularly in respect to the right of self-preservation, which, as we see, is the foundation of the alleged prohibition we are examining.

Without stopping to quote its exact language, I am safe in assuming all will admit that the Constitution vests in Congress the exclusive right to make war; that it imposes upon the Federal Government the duty of maintaining a republican form of government in the States and likewise to protect the States from insurrection and invasion. The Constitution also prohibits the States from making war or making treaties or alliances of any kind.

The States are denied every means to prevent, to carry on, or to terminate war; that is, every means of self-defense and self-preservation. These facts are not, of course, affected by the formal right of a State to act to repel sudden invasion much as a man may defend his house in emergency.

Would it not be folly to impose upon the Federal Government the duty of maintaining a republican form of government in the States, to protect the State against invasion, and vest in the Federal Government the exclusive power to declare and conduct war, and then deny to the Federal Government the right to subject its citizens and their wealth to an equal share of the burdens of the common defense?

Perhaps the most unique feature of our system of government is that the States in some respects are sovereign, in others not. It is only in respect to the reserved powers that the States are sovereign and independent. The power to make war is not reserved to the States, but prohibited to them and conferred on the Federal Government. The Federal Government is sovereign in respect to war and, as Chief Justice Marshall said, in laying down the rule of taxation:

> All subjects over which the sovereign power of a State extends are the objects of taxation.

If, then, the Federal Government is sovereign for war, what should be its powers?

Hamilton said (31 Federalist):

> A government ought to contain in itself every power requisite to the full accomplishment of the objects committed to its care and to the complete execution of the trusts for which it is responsible; free from every other control, but a regard to the public good and to the sense of the people.
>
> As the duties of superintending the national defense and of securing the public peace against foreign or domestic violence involve a provision for casualties and dangers to which no possible limits can be assigned, the power of making that provision ought to know no other bounds than the exigencies of the Nation and the resources of the community.
>
> As revenue is the essential engine by which the means of answering the national exigencies must be procured, the power of procuring that article in its full extent must necessarily be comprehended in that of providing for those exigencies.
>
> As theory and practice conspire to prove that the power of procuring revenue is unavailing when exercised over the States in their collective capacities, the Federal Government must of necessity be invested with an unqualified power of taxation in the ordinary modes.

These are the powers Hamilton says the Government ought to contain in order to preserve the Nation, and the Constitution meets the requirements by vesting in Congress all the powers necessary to carry into effect the defensive power of war.

It is indeed true that self-preservation is the first law of nature. All that a man has will he give for his life. All that a nation has it will give to preserve its existence.

With men, as with nations, all reserves are abandoned, all limitations cease, all conventionalities are set aside, and everything is utilized when necessary to preserve life.

Remember the court said that the exemption of the States from Federal taxation and the Nation from State taxation is upheld by the great law of self-preservation. That is the reason for the exemption. In war that reason does not exist. Cessante ratione legis cessat ipsa lex. The reason ceasing, the law does not exist. In war the right and duty of preserving the State is in the Federal Government, and any exemption from Federal taxation depending upon the great law of self-preservation is suspended so long as the status of war and the exclusive Federal duty of preserving the State continues.

If we do not grant that the paramount necessity of self-preservation now justifies the taxation of incomes from State bonds, then, it seems to me, we must utterly repudiate the whole argument for State exemption in normal times. If the present real need of self-preservation does not now justify Federal taxation, how much less has a theoretical need of self-preservation ever justified the denial of the right of Federal taxation of income from the securities of States and their subsidiary entities?

It is unnecessary at this time to discuss the question as it would stand in the status of peace. The status of war, which now holds the fate of every interest, is to be sharply differentiated from the status of peace, with which we are not now at all concerned. We may, for the present purpose, assume the correctness of the repeated decisions that in normal times of peace the National Government may not tax State instrumentalities. We may even assume, if we like, the soundness of the able and weighty arguments that have construed the sixteenth amendment as without effect upon the same question.

We are confronted by a new question, a question made new by its emergence in an entirely new status, one recognized as new and separate by the Constitution itself, namely, the status of war.

Much might be said in opposition to the traditional decision of the old question of the Federal taxing power vis-à-vis the States. Much might be said in support of the view that the words "from any source whatever" in the sixteenth amendment can scarcely be mere verbiage, in their contemporary medium, and can scarcely have left unaffected the traditional decision. Just now it is only useful to have these considerations in mind if there be danger that a too blind devotion to an old theory may possibly make it more difficult for us to envisage and to judge upon its merits a question that is germane to the old theory but that is also as separate and distinct as the status of war is separate and distinct from the status of peace.

In my judgment, the courts have not furnished substantial support for the doctrine exempting income from State securities from National taxation in time of war. When courts say, as in Collector against Day, that the exemption is supported by the supreme right of self-defense, the answer is that the exemption can only be coextensive with that right, and as the right of self-defense by war is delegated to the National Government, when war exists the exemption is suspended.

More frequently the courts say the doctrine rests upon the unsubstantial foundation of this felicitous phrase, namely, that "the power to tax is the power to destroy."

This phrase in turn, to mean anything, rests upon the inconceivable hypothesis that, armed with a lethal weapon, the Nation would lie in wait and slaughter the States en masse, or one by one as opportunity presented. Whatever the danger may have been in the early days when this phrase was coined to serve ultra States rights views, it should no longer be seriously regarded.

It is akin to many fictions of the law that were invoked to ward off the bugaboos that lurked in the shadows of the early dawn of our liberties, whose unreality we now clearly comprehend. The power to tax is not the power to destroy. The power to tax is the power to enforce a proportional contribution for the support of the Government. The levy must be for revenue; if it is made for any other purpose it is unlawful. The power to tax is the power to destroy only in the sense that the power to feed is the power to poison. In the one case it presupposes a malevolent purpose against the States which alone compose the Union, in the other against the laws of hospitality.

We have vast sums to raise in order to remove States, individual citizens, and Nation from the German menace. States, individuals, and Nation must bear the general burden under general laws. There should be no tax-exempt bonds—State or National. There should be no new bonds, State or private, issued for any purpose that can be postponed or that does not materially promote, directly or indirectly, our conduct of the war. Where inducement is needed for the flotation of war loans a higher rate of interest is an inducement sounder and healthier to our economic and social life than is any tax exemption. This is true because the income from a higher rate can be made largely to flow back as income tax into the Treasury as funds wherewith to prosecute the war, and the higher rate creates no discrimination; whereas any exemption inevitably creates untaxable funds and makes possible discrimination in facilitating the enjoyment, by some, of such tax-free funds.

Under our institutions various rights are inherent in individuals as against the power of the State or of the National Government. Consider the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

The right to the pursuit of happiness has been defined as consisting largely in the right to enjoy things—the right of property. Yet even in time of peace the right of property bows to eminent domain. And in cases of paramount and urgent necessity, it bows to the higher right of community self-preservation. Under municipal authority the fireman destroys individual property by the mandate of the higher right and duty of the Government to protect community property. While in time of war the occupation, the property, even the very life of the individual are rights subservient to the right of self-protection inherent in all individuals as the Nation.

There is analogy between the inherent rights of individuals as against the power of the State or the Nation and the inherent rights of the individual States as against the power of the National Government. Both are equally sacred. If there is a choice, we know that the protection of individual rights is by far the more important in practice to human happiness and to democracy. Why then should sacred and inherent individual rights yield without question to the national necessity of self-preservation on behalf of all our citizens and all our institutions, while inherent State rights, quite equally the object of the paramount duty of self-preservation for which the Nation is conducting war, are to be held inviolate?

We are conscripting manhood without discrimination. We are conscripting wealth through war taxation. Is it right that a door should be left open for effectual discrimination in this conscription of wealth? The real result of exempting State funds, securities, and salaries from war taxation is to create a privileged class at a time of universal sacrifice, to make possible a privileged class of possessors of wealth enjoying a discriminatory benefit under the flimsy guise of protecting the sovereign States.

It has been held that one State of the Union may tax the bonded issues of another State. A citizen of any State of the Union resident, say, in France would be liable to taxation upon his income from or his personal property in securities of any State of the Union or for income tax upon a salary he might draw from a State of the Union.

Are State instrumentalities to be taxable by other States, and even by foreign countries, but not taxable by the Federal Government, even when to tax them is necessary to the Federal Government's discharge of its sole responsibility to defend those States?

Or, looking at the problem as a matter of the requisitioning of property in war time, for the matter comes really to that, I take it nobody will seriously deny that if a foreign foe had invaded our territory, had pushed up the Chesapeake, and advanced along the Susquehanna to Harrisburg, if such a foe was laying siege to an American force in that city, and the defense of the city, and consequently the welfare of the Nation depended upon the successful holding of the State capitol building in that city, I take it, I say, nobody will deny that Federal troops might use and occupy that building as a citadel; that forced from it these troops might utterly destroy it to prevent its use by the enemy; and that they might and should do this even against the most urgent protests of the State of Pennsylvania, however made or presented. I take it, moreover, few will deny that in such event the State of Pennsylvania must bear the loss, just as an individual must bear a like loss, uncompensated by the Federal Government, because the property would be destroyed in the track of war as an incident to belligerent operations. Now, if this be true as to the property of the State itself, how idle it seems to hesitate to impose a tax not on State property but on the income of an individual who has purchased a bond from the State.

Let us look again at this proposition that the power to tax is the power to destroy, and this time quite specifically in connection with the project we are considering of taxing income from State bonds.

What is it that is menaced with destruction? The court answers this question by saying such tax may interfere with the borrowing power of a State. So that in the end it comes to this, that to tax the income upon State bonds during war is to tax the borrowing power of the States at a time when the life of the Nation and States depends upon the Nation's ability to raise the money necessary to bring to a successful issue the war which it alone is authorized to carry on.

By the Constitution the States have committed to the National Government the whole responsibility for preserving and making provisions for the preservation of the Union and the States themselves, and as Hamilton has just been quoted as saying:

> The power of making that provision ought to know no other bounds than the exigencies of the Nation and the resources of the community.

The theory that the power to tax the borrowing power of the States is the power to destroy the States must yield to the fact that lacking such power the Nation may fail to preserve the Nation and the States.

The borrowing power, unlike the taxing power, is not an essential function of sovereignty. It is at best only a convenient substitute for the taxing power, which is, of course, one of the greatest of sovereign powers.

> In all governments of constitutional limitations sovereign power manifests itself in but three ways: By exercising the right of taxation; by the right of eminent domain; and through its police power, police power used in the broad sense of legislative power. (United States v. Douglas-Willan-Sartoris Co., 22 Pac., 92.)

Moreover, it is said in this case:

> It is no longer a question open to dispute that, when the Government becomes a party to a contract between itself and its citizens, it divests itself of its sovereignty in respect to the terms and conditions of the contract, its construction and interpretation, and stands in the same position with reference to the contract as a private individual. As said by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts (Com. v. Proprietors, 2 Gray, 350): "If it were otherwise, the rights of parties contracting with the Government would be held at the caprice of the sovereign, and exposed to all the risks * * * of misguided power." "When a government enters 'nto a contract with an individual, it deposes, as to the matter of the contract, its constitutional authority and exchanges the character of legislator for that of moral agent, with the same rights and obligations as an individual. It is, in theory, impossible to reconcile the two ideas of a promise which obliges with a power to make a law which can vary the effect of it." (Hamilton's Works, vol. 3, p. 518.)

Borrowing by the States is a cheap and convenient method of raising money by contract in lieu of exercising the sovereign power of taxation. It is cheap because the State barters away its power and duty to tax wealth of all kinds equally by exempting its bonds from taxation. This enables the State to compete in the money market on unequal terms with the merchant, miner, farmer, manufacturer, and the numerous other workers who make the material State. These not only have to pay the higher rates of interest in competition with tax-free bonds but are taxed to make up the revenue lost by the exemption of State bonds.

Exemption of the income from State bonds from taxation in the hands of their holders is against a sound public policy.

It frees vast fortunes from taxation by the Federal Government without regard to the obligations or necessities of that Government.

The power of the States to make wealth free from national taxation is, we might almost say, the power to destroy the Nation. For, is not the power to withdraw from Federal taxation the capital of the country by means of tax-immune bonds as much a menace to the Nation as is the Nation's power to tax income from such bonds in the holders' hands a menace to the States?

Aside even from the extraordinary exactions of war the national economy may hardly withstand the effect, if the theory of exemption be carried to its logical conclusion. The modern tendency may result in a State's increased socialization of various profitable enterprises. Apply the theory of State exemption and a State might conceivably take over so many interests as to remove as a source of Federal revenue the bulk of its taxable wealth.

How can it be claimed that an interference with the State's power to borrow money may destroy the State when, under its sovereign power to tax, the State can raise all the revenue its necessities require?

There seem to be three ways by which the income on State bonds may escape taxation:

First. Where the States agree they shall not be taxed. Of course, this applies only to taxation by the borrowing State.

Second. Where the States agree to pay taxes that may be levied by other sovereignties.

Third. Through the implication arising from the nature of our institutions that such incomes are exempt because the power to tax them might lead to the State's destruction, and that it is necessary in order that the States may be able to preserve themselves that the people who lend them money shall be exempt from the common burdens of the war.

There is no occasion to waste sympathy upon States that have made such borrowing contracts as require them to pay taxes imposed to meet the exigencies of war, as it is claimed they must do in order to make good their covenants to the holders of their bonds. They were paid in reduced rates of interest for taking the risk of the Nation becoming involved in war and the risk of the exercise of powers necessary to preserve the Nation.

In this connection it is pertinent to observe that it is difficult to understand how a tax on income on State bonds can be a tax on the borrowing power of the States containing a possible menace to that power if the same tax falls equally upon the income from all other kinds of securities issued for borrowed money. In such case the securities of the State are only removed from a privileged position.

I beg to refer those who hesitate as to our power to enact the proposed measure to our action of February 6, 1918, when by a yea-and-nay vote we unanimously passed the soldiers and sailors' civil-rights bills, which in terms suspends the sovereign power of the States to collect taxes due by soldiers and sailors.

Mr. Choate said in his argument in the Pollock case:

> We believe that Congress has plenary power in the last exigencies of the Government to reach every man, every dollar, every inch of ground to secure the common defense and the general welfare: that it was the purpose of the convention that created the Constitution to give Congress that power, and it is one of the absolute essentials of a great sovereignty which was to cover a continent and to last for untold ages.

To contend that there is any principle in our Constitution that permits any form of wealth to escape taxation, if its taxation is necessary to carry on a defensive war, is to contend that the Constitution contains a principle more sacred than the Nation itself, a principle not of ethics but of law, and one that must be preserved even though the Nation perish.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, any argument presented by the able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is entitled to more consideration, before an attempt to discuss his position, than can be given to it in the few moments intervening between the making of the statement and the present time. I am not going to undertake to discuss at length or attempt in any extended way to meet his arguments. But before the matter passes out of the minds of those who heard the argument I want to call the attention to one or two cases which, it seems to me, may well be worthy of the further consideration of the able Senator from Pennsylvania.

If I correctly understand the position of the Senator, it is that, a state of war existing, the law of self-defense and of self-protection enables the National Government to lay its taxing hand upon the instrumentalities of the State or the salaries of the officers of the State, whereas that would not be true in times of peace. I call attention to the fact that this principle, as first laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States so far as the taxing of the instrumentalities of the States is concerned, was laid down upon the precise condition of affairs which is supposed to exist at this time.

The law of 1864, passed June 30 of that year, provided as follows:

> There shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, * * * whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interest, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a tax of 5 per cent on the amount so derived over $1,000.

This act was passed in the midst of the Civil War and for the purpose of raising revenue to carry on the conflict upon the part of the Union. A clause of it came under the consideration of the court. In discussing this measure—a revenue measure—under those conditions, the court said——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to give the volume and title of the case?

Mr. BORAH. This is the case of Collector against Day, in eleventh Wallace. I am reading from page 125:

> Two of the great departments of the Government, the executive and legislative, depend upon the exercise of the powers or upon the people of the States. The Constitution guarantees to the States a republican form of government and protects each against invasion or domestic violence. Such being the separate and independent condition of the States in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable that without them the General Government itself would disappear from the family of nations, it would seem to follow, as a reasonable if not a necessary consequence, that the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution, should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated, by the taxing power of another government, which power acknowledges no limits but the will of the legislative body imposing the tax. And, more especially, those means and instrumentalities which are the creation of their sovereign and reserved rights, one of which is the establishment of the judicial department and the appointment of officers to administer their laws—

The person who contested this law was a judicial officer, and, the tax being laid upon his salary, the question thus arose—

> Without this power and the exercise of it we risk nothing in saying that no one of the States under the form of government guaranteed by the Constitution could long preserve its existence. A despotic government might. We have said that one of the reserved powers was that to establish a judicial department; it would have been more accurate, and in accordance with the existing state of things at the time, to have said the power to maintain a judicial department. All of the 13 States were in the possession of this power and had exercised it at the adoption of the Constitution, and it is not pretended that any grant of it to the General Government is found in that instrument. It is, therefore, one of the sovereign powers vested in the States by their constitutions, which remained unaltered and unimpaired, and in respect to which the State is as independent of the General Government as that Government is independent of the States.
>
> The supremacy of the General Government, therefore, so much relied on in the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff in error in respect to the question before us, can not be maintained.

And why? Because the sovereign power of the State with reference to those instrumentalities which are necessary to its existence and to the performance of its functions is just as independent of the National Government as the National Government's powers and instrumentalities are independent of the State government. It is not an instance in which the superior government exercises its taxing power upon a subordinate government or a subdivision of the government, but it is an effort and an attempt upon the part of one purely independent government to tax another entirely separate and independent government. Here are two governments in these particulars wholly independent of each other and both indispensable to the Union. Neither can tax the instrumentalities of the other. Each is in this respect independent of the other; and neither can be said to be superior to the other in their respective sovereign powers:

> The two governments are upon an equality, and the question is whether the power "to lay and collect taxes" enables the General Government to tax the salary of a judicial officer of the State, which officer is a means or instrumentality employed to carry into execution one of its most important functions, the administration of the laws, and which concerns the exercise of a right reserved to the States.
>
> We do not say the mere circumstance of the establishment of the judicial department and the appointment of officers to administer the laws, being among the reserved powers of the State, disables the General Government from levying the tax, as that depends upon the express power to "lay and collect taxes," but it shows that it is an original inherent power never parted with and in respect to which the supremacy of that Government does not exist and is of no importance in determining the question; and, further, that being an original and reserved power, and the judicial officers appointed under it being a means or instrumentality employed to carry it into effect, the right and necessity of its unimpaired exercise and the exemption of the officers from taxation by the General Government stand upon as solid a ground and are maintained by principles and reasons as cogent as those which led to the exemption of the Federal officer in Dobbins against The Commissioners of Erie from taxation by the State, for in this respect—that is, in respect to the reserved powers—the State is as sovereign and independent as the General Government. And if the means and instrumentalities employed by that Government to carry into operation the powers granted to it are necessarily and for the sake of self-preservation exempt from taxation by the States, why are not those of the States depending upon their reserved powers for like reasons equally exempt from Federal taxation? Their unimpaired existence in the one case is as essential as in the other. It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication, as any government whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government. Of what avail are these means if another power may tax them at discretion?

I also call the attention of the able Senator from Pennsylvania to the case of Lane against Oregon, in which the acts of 1862 and 1863 were called in question. I think this case will be found equally conclusive on this subject.

At some other time I expect to discuss this matter more fully.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho perhaps was not in the Chamber when I put in the RECORD his own argument in 1910, which I think is the ablest argument that has ever been made upon that side of the question, and which contains a reference to the cases to which he has just alluded. I also included in the RECORD a recent opinion written by Mr. Charles Spooner, of New York, which has followed the cases down to the present time.

Mr. BORAH. I was in the Chamber when the Senator presented my remarks for the RECORD, and I simply called attention to this because the argument which I had submitted did not call particular attention to the fact that the acts of 1863 and 1864 were war measures.

Mr. KNOX. I wish the Senator from Idaho, as well as all of my colleagues, to understand that my whole purpose in raising this question is this: There is a rugged equity in trying to unlock the coffers where these millions of State securities are confined. I know of persons who have several millions of dollars of State securities that do not pay one penny of income tax, and, by the way, do not buy as many bonds as many men of very much less wealth than themselves. If there is a way—and I was only endeavoring to give to the Senate the way that I thought was possible, and my attitude was not didactic or dogmatic at all—I want this question thrashed out and a sound conclusion reached, and this wealth reached, if possible.

Mr. BORAH. I am exceedingly pleased that the Senator from Pennsylvania has started the discussion and has given his opinion upon the subject, which will of course have great weight; but, in discussing the question of equity, may I say that the States are quite as hard pressed for subjects to tax these days as the National Government? It is undoubtedly within the power of the States to tax these securities and to tax their officers or their salaries, and so forth; and, in proportion that the National Government seizes other sources and other subjects of taxation, it must necessarily follow that the State will seek other subjects of taxation. The States could do this, undoubtedly.

I think, however, that while it seems we are engaged in these days in an unconscious, if not a conscious, movement to destroy the sovereignty of the States, we may pause before taking the final step to consider whether it is wise to go all the way. I do not believe a few million dollars is any price to put up against the Federal system which was originally constructed by the fathers. If we take away the rights of the State to control the franchise, and then go further and lay taxes upon the very instrumentalities of the State governments, certainly we shall have concluded that the States as sovereign entities are no longer essential. That may be the doctrine which we are to accept, but under no conceivable circumstances shall I ever subscribe to it. I repeat, as I have said elsewhere, you can have no great Federal Union without great and powerful Commonwealths upon which the Federal Government may rest.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, in order to call back to the attention of the Senate the business which is before it, I will read the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women. It is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article."

If we were engaged in making a Constitution, and at this period of our history the question should come forward for the first time, I am disposed to believe that there would be very little opposition to taking away the discrimination which has ordinarily obtained against woman as a woman. California is one of the 19 States of the Union which have recognized, by State action, the justice and expediency of giving the suffrage to women; and while necessarily that does not bind the representatives of the State of California in Congress, because there is also another question, a question of the method, involved here, yet it is interesting to know that in a typical State of the Union the suffrage which has been enjoyed by women in California for the past seven years has been an eminent success, and none of the dangers feared by those who oppose woman suffrage have presented themselves.

There are two classes of men who oppose woman suffrage: Those who do not believe in it in itself, and those who do not believe that by amendment of the Federal Constitution women should be granted suffrage, but that they should be granted suffrage, if at all, by the States.

It seems to me a late day to discuss in this body the desirability of granting suffrage to women, and yet there are those who, doubtless in good faith, believe that if women were given the suffrage it would in some way act to the detriment of the State. That certainly grows out of the ancient prejudice which comes down from the dim past, where force was the principal weapon used and where man dominated by reason of his superior strength. That was the period, as described by John Stuart Mill, of the subjection of women. But since that time—due, doubtless, to Christian civilization—women have steadily advanced until, in the arts and sciences and professions, they are in most respects equal to men. In the great universities they very often excel men. They are engaged everywhere in the practice of the professions of law and medicine. In my own city a woman is United States district attorney to-day. So there is nothing strange now in women assuming the work for which they have capacity; and if they have not shown capacity in the past it is because men have withheld from them the rewards, the allurements of fame, the honors and the distinction that come from industry and study. They have been relegated to a place by themselves, and man has proudly assumed the right to represent them upon all occasions.

But if woman has attained the position of taking care of herself in the industries and in the professions, certainly she has a right, under the spirit of our laws to-day, to have representation. We tax her in her industry and in her property, and we deny her representation, which is contrary to one of the cardinal principles of our institutions. If we require that she obey the laws, it follows inevitably that she must be given a voice in making the laws. So the great principles of our Government have to-day in spirit conferred upon her this right, and all we ask is that it be expressed in law so that it will have binding effect; and the appeal is made to men because they control the ballot.

I will not claim for woman that she is equal in all respects to man. She is different. Woman is not undeveloped man, as Tennyson says, but diverse; and yet in manly pursuits we have everywhere exceptional historical examples of women even engaging in combat—the great Queen Semiramis; Boadicea, who fought the Romans in Britain; Joan of Arc; the Maid of Saragossa—

> She, whom once the semblance of a scar
> Appall'd, an owlet's larum chill'd with dread,
> Now views the column-scattering bay'net jar,
> The falchion flash, and o'er the yet warm dead
> Stalks with Minerva's step where Mars might quake to tread.

Coming down to the present time, we know that women have engaged in actual warfare, and yet we would not establish a claim upon her ability to fight. Behind the lines, however, there is work for women to do, as essential as the work done by men at the front. They have to attend to the wounded; they have to care for those who have fallen in the strife; and in all these things they are called upon, as you know, in preference to men. Women have work to do in the world at peace and the world at war.

PRESIDENT WILSON ADVISES CONGRESS.

When the President of the United States sees fit to come to the Senate of the United States during the course of the debate and answer a question which was propounded by one of our colleagues, I should think his course would meet with an eager response.

The Constitution, Article II, section 3, says of the President:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper.

So the President is well within his prerogatives when he comes here in person—a compliment which, indeed, we should appreciate—and answers a question thus propounded.

What was that question? The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET], who was for some time regarded to be in doubt as to what position he should take upon this subject, said in his address that in case he was convinced that the proposed constitutional amendment was a war measure, notwithstanding the objections which he otherwise had, he would vote for it. Now the President has come before us and stated that it is a war measure.

Times change, and we change with them. The platform of the great Democratic Party only two years ago declared for peace; and now a united country—Democrats and Republicans—declares for war. So rapidly are times changing that that instrument in some respects is already obsolete. Why, then, has the country changed? Because since that time we have actually entered the war; since that time the whole panorama of the war has been opened to us, and we see that it is not a contest between one or two nations and another, but it is a people's war, a contest in which the people of the world are engaged for the preservation of their independence and their rights by land and sea. There is no doubt whatever now in the minds of men as to the meaning of the war; and that conviction, having come to men, has set aside whatever declarations may have been made in the past.

Senators who vote with an apparent reluctance against this amendment on the ground that their constituencies have instructed them—that is to say, their constituencies have, by referendum or plebiscite, declared against woman suffrage, not necessarily against the constitutional amendment, but against woman suffrage—feel that they are bound by the action of their constituencies. One Senator, the Senator from Ohio, said in his recent address that the people of his State had expressed their views, and I beg you to concede that he should have said the male voters of his State have expressed their views. One-half of the people of his State are actually disfranchised, and he comes here with a scrap of paper meaning nothing, so far as the sentiment of the women of his State are concerned. Men are selfish, especially in the possession of power; they are loath to give it up. That is true of all autocrats, but it is equally true that those who are denied power and who are subject to the autocracy are constantly making protests; and for 50 years the women of this country have never ceased to make protests.

WENDELL PHILLIPS STATES THE CASE.

I have in my hand, sir, the resolutions adopted at a meeting in Worcester, Mass., on the 15th day of October, 1851, 67 years ago. In reading the speeches of Wendell Phillips I came across his address on that occasion, and I think that everything which can be said in favor of granting suffrage to women is embraced within the pages of this volume as expressed in his speech. It is so absolutely logical that no one can avoid it. It is quite immaterial, as the President said to-day, what may be "the predilections of the drawing-room." The women of the drawing-room have breadwinners to provide for them. We are talking of the women who for one reason or another do not acknowledge dependency upon man in intellectual, educational, and spiritual matters, but assert an individuality of their own. But the women of the drawing-room, after years of long subjection, come to regard themselves as more or less dependent because the necessity of their condition does not require of them either the acquisition of knowledge upon public questions or the exercise of public duties. Their male representative does that for them and they doubtless are quite content. But we are engaged in the business of emancipating women, even those who are so complacent.

I am going to read those resolutions into my address for the purpose of reaching the ears of the New England Senators particularly, because the opposition to this amendment comes from the New England Senators and from the southern Senators, certainly an unholy alliance. The very name of Wendell Phillips ought to arouse the New England conscience to believe that there is something in this contest higher than mere material gain, that there is something, as the President describes, of a spiritual nature, something involving the impalpable rights of persons. For those rights the men of New England gave Wendell Phillips as a missionary to the country and as a result of the gospel which he preached the black race was freed. The black race is the greatest obstacle to-day in this body to woman suffrage, but standing alone the opposition that arises from that source would not be sufficient unless it was reenforced from New England.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's position, then, as I understand it, is that in the old battle against human slavery Massachusetts and South Carolina were divided, but in the present battle for the political emancipation of women Massachusetts and South Carolina are united.

Mr. PHELAN. That is my understanding, Mr. President, and that is why I call it an unholy alliance.

The resolutions adopted on that October day in 1851 were drafted by Wendell Phillips:

1. Resolved, That while we would not undervalue other methods, the right of suffrage for women is, in our opinion, the corner stone of this enterprise, since we do not seek to protect woman, but rather to place her in a position to protect herself.

That is one of the essential arguments in favor of woman suffrage, to put her in a position to protect herself.

2. Resolved, That it will be woman's fault if, the ballot once in her hand, all the barbarous, demoralizing, and unequal laws relating to marriage and property do not speedily vanish from the statute book; and while we acknowledge that the hope of a share in the higher professions and profitable employments of society is one of the strongest motives to intellectual culture, we know, also, that an interest in political questions is an equally powerful stimulus; and we see, besides, that we do our best to insure education to an individual when we put the ballot into his hands, it being so clearly the interest of the community that one upon whose decisions depend its welfare and safety should both have free access to the best means of education and be urged to make use of them.

3. Resolved, That we do not feel called upon to assert or establish the equality of the sexes, in an intellectual or any other point of view. It is enough for our argument that natural and political justice and the axioms of English and American liberty alike determine that rights and burdens, taxation and representation, should be coextensive; hence women, as individual citizens, liable to punishment for acts which the laws call criminal or to be taxed in their labor and property for the support of Government, have a self-evident and indisputable right, identically the same right that men have, to a direct voice in the enactment of those laws and the formation of that Government.

4. Resolved, That the democrat, or reformer, who denies suffrage to women is a democrat only because he was not born a noble and one of those levelers who are willing to level only down to themselves.

5. Resolved, That while political and natural justice accord civil equality to woman; while great thinkers of every age, from Plato to Condorcet and Mill, have supported their claim; while voluntary associations, religious and secular, have been organized on this basis, there is yet a favorite argument against it, that no political community or nation ever existed in which women have not been in a state of political inferiority. But, in reply, we remind our opponents that the same fact has been alleged with equal truth in favor of slavery; has been urged against freedom of industry, freedom of conscience, and the freedom of the press; none of these liberties having been thought compatible with a well-ordered state until they had proved their possibility by springing into existence as facts.

Nineteen American States since Wendell Phillips's time have proved, as in the case of free press and free conscience, the living fact that suffrage for woman is compatible with the well-being of the state. Continuing:

Besides, there is no difficulty in understanding why the subjection of woman has been a uniform custom, when we recollect that we are just emerging from the ages in which might has been always right.

"Might has always been right." To-day the President came here to tell us that this is a war measure. We are engaged in this war, in the business of proving that might is no longer right; that the biological theory of the German philosophers subordinating the weak to the strong and knowing no other right or power than brute strength is the very proposition which we are contesting on the battle fields of Europe. That is the only reason why women have not been in full partnership with men, the partnership to which the President referred to-day when he said that we ask from women a partnership of sacrifice and toil only and not a partnership of equality and right.

Certainly, Mr. President, this is a war measure, because when you ask why we are in this war we are told that it is not a contest between nations, but it is a contest for the supremacy of the right; it is a contest against the claims made by an autocracy that force is the only arbiter between men and between nations. If we deny suffrage to women it is because we are superior in strength to women and deny their intellectual and moral fitness and right to that copartnership which should obtain between men and women in the conduct of the country's affairs.

So the very issue involved in this war is involved in the conflict between the forces opposed to suffrage and in favor of suffrage. We are asserting that men have a superior right because they have greater strength than woman, a condition that prevails in primitive society. That is all there is to it. We are denying civilization. We are denying to women an equality just as the Hun denies to the Belgians and the Serbs the right to independent existence. So we deny the women the right of an independent existence with respect to their political rights. In the language of autocracy we are saying, "We can do better for you, so remain comfortably subservient."

How can we justify ourselves? As the President says, he wants to be put in a position where he need not be ashamed when he goes before the nations of the world speaking for this democracy. It is clearly our duty to perfect our democracy at home before we preach democracy abroad. Therein also is it a war measure. The hour has arrived when this can be accomplished in this body by the change of a few votes. Why should not those votes be given? Have Senators a pride of opinion which would put them in opposition to the spirit of the age? Do Senators who inquire whether it is a war measure or not deny the authority of the man who came here to-day to speak, the first authority in the world on that subject, the leader of the American people, the Commander in Chief of the boys in the field and the sailors on the sea? After due deliberation, meeting that inquiry, he has said it is a war measure. He wants that weapon with which to win the war. What weapon? Not a new voting constituency in the United States to-day or to-morrow, because if we submit the amendment to-day it will take several years in order to get the ratification of the States, but he wants a clear conscience; he wants to set the country right, if possible, by persuasion of the minds of men; for unless we accept this policy of giving the women the vote, of democratizing the country in a true and real sense, he will just to that extent be weak in presenting the cause of justice and equality, of independence, and of right to the nations of the world. He is only half armed with half the people of the United States disfranchised.

He wants the weapon of equal rights to smite the fiends of kingcraft.

He wants, he says, "a spiritual weapon." What is a spiritual weapon? It is built of the thoughts and ideals of a nation. It is built of the hopes and aspirations of one-half of our population. It is built of democracy unalloyed and undefiled and a democracy which embraces not some of the people but all of the people. He asks that the spiritual weapon by the vote of this body be put into his hands. When we go back to our constituencies, with that speech of the President ringing in their ears, because he is their leader, coming to Congress and asking for a weapon, will we say that we denied it? We have given him shot and shells and cannon and we have given the material things with which to fight, but the battle of our inspired leader is to be fought by weapons other than these—by the great idea of liberty and justice for the world. That is the idea which wins the battles, which gave us our own independence—the idea of man being free. I say to-day the idea of men and women being free is something that carries with it an impelling force to those who believe in a full and absolute acceptance of democracy.

A great orator said: "Set an idea upon its feet and bid it to march from Maine to Georgia it will as surely overturn the Government as if to destroy the Capitol you put gunpowder under the Senate House." That is a rather apt quotation: "Put gunpowder under the Senate House." Wendell Phillips used those words, and in that campaign, sending of an idea from Maine to Georgia, you will recollect that he did in fact overturn the Government.

The President has put spiritual gunpowder under the Senate House. He, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has told us what he believes is necessary for him as a weapon to make democracy safe in the world. I trust that when the vote is counted it shall appear that an authority so high to whom we are so devoted, men and women, Democrats and Republicans, will not have spoken in vain.

STATES RIGHTS AND THE RACE PROBLEM IN THE SOUTH.

I have always sympathized with the South on the race phase of this discussion. In my own State, when a candidate for this office, I was opposed by the representatives of what is now known as the Woman's Party. They personally came to my State for the purpose of defeating all men who were candidates under the Democratic auspices because they held that party responsible for the failure of the Susan B. Anthony amendment. At that time I was openly opposed to the Susan B. Anthony amendment on the ground that the States under the Constitution as now organized have jurisdiction over such matters, and hence that the door was not closed under the Constitution to the women of the country who sought suffrage; that they could go from State to State and convince the people of the several States, and, indeed, they had succeeded so admirably I rather resented their seeking an extraordinary means of giving suffrage to women. But I was afterwards informed that there were at least 11 States in this country whose constitutions were so rigid that it was practically impossible for the people themselves of those States to give an expression of their views.

The constitutions were made so rigid by those who were heedless probably of subsequent development, not anticipating an unusual demand, thinking doubtless that all necessary acts could be passed by the legislature, that they could not be changed. Hence the women found an impassable barrier to their progress. Then they came to Washington with new vigor, having exhausted the field of the States, in order to give an equal benefit to the women of the country and not to allow those States that had conferred the suffrage to enjoy the benefit alone. In other words, they sought to make what I consider a very desirable thing in itself, a homogeneous electorate, just as I am disposed to believe we should have uniform marriage and divorce laws, because people ought to know whether they are married or not as they travel the length and breadth of the Republic. I also am disposed to believe that this is one country and under one flag. Yet so dissimilar are the laws affecting marriage and divorce that a man and a woman might well doubt whether they were legitimately wedded in passing on a railroad train from one State to another. In some great questions there is need for a Federal amendment which does not in itself involve any trespass upon the just and proper rights of the individual States.

Suffrage is now conferred by the States under the reserved power of the States. The Constitution when drafted many years ago was an instrument for the purpose of meeting only conditions which then prevailed. Steam and electricity and gasoline were unknown. There was no communication between the States worthy of the name, and individuality so far as the several commonwealths were concerned was absolutely established. With the development of steam and electricity, the country has been bound as with iron bands, and it would certainly be a great hardship if we could not amend the Federal Constitution to meet the new conditions which now confront us. When we go into the States by statute and tell the States who shall enjoy suffrage and who shall not, we may trespass upon their reserved power. But when we simply provide by constitutional amendment that there shall be no discrimination on account of sex, that certainly is not trespassing. That is something fundamental. We do not pretend to impose a property or intellectual qualification. We do not pretend to interfere with matters as intimately and as closely associated with the people as that. They may have reasons for discrimination in favor of property ownership and of intellectual accomplishments. They have that justification in the South, and when this amendment prevails that will remain. It simply extends to all of the women, white and black, within a State the same privilege enjoyed by the men.

I do not know why the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] should express so much fear of the Federal Government. What is the Federal Government? Is it an alien and a hostile government seeking to destroy, by power of taxation, constitutional amendment, or otherwise, the individual State? The Congress of the United States alone, having the power to submit a constitutional amendment or to pass laws, is composed of the representatives of the States, and in the lower House it is in proportion to population, but in this Chamber absolute equality between States, small and great, is guaranteed in the Constitution of the United States, even against the power of amendment to change it.

There is no danger whatever of the equality of representation in the Senate ever being destroyed except by revolution. Hence it is rather absurd for gentlemen to grow excited over dangers that menace States when the States themselves control the power of the Federal Government. If they wish to impose restrictions upon themselves, it would have to be done in this instance by two-thirds of this entire body and ratified then by three-fourths of the States. There can not possibly be any danger of the Federal power usurping the State government when its exercise is so safeguarded. So I do not sympathize with the Senator from Alabama in making his protest on the broad constitutional ground.

He said that the power to tax was the power to destroy. In practice it is not the power to destroy, because, as I have said, the Congress of the United States has the power to tax, but being deeply concerned by reason of its essential constituents in the well-being of the States, there is no danger of the States being destroyed or any of the reserved instrumentalities of the States needlessly disturbed.

We are here, some of us more provincial than others, to protect our States. Sometimes we allow that sentiment to cloud our judgment, not fully realizing the vision of the glory of the Republic as one Nation, "an indestructible Union of indestructible States," one Capital, one flag. We are so close to our constituents, which is the condition of our existence, that we refuse very often to take the Federal view, but we should not excuse ourselves on the absurd ground that the Congress of the United States is a menace to the individual States, because that is not true. The Congress of the United States can correct any of its own errors, and there would be an appeal from the States if there was any danger involved.

But what do we find in the Southern States? A large negro population. It is unfortunate that the negro population, a non-assimilable body, a foreign substance, is lodged in those States; but we need not go back into history to show that they came there not of their voluntary act but by bidding and invitation; indeed, transportation was provided. They came from their own jungles in Africa to work upon the plantations, and there they are to-day. As the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has so often stated, there can be no democracy where there is no equality; and there is but a feeble democracy possible in those States which have upon their back a large non-assimilable and ignorant population. It is a grave and serious menace to the South, unless the South by education develop the men and women of that race and make them worthy of citizenship.

The white people of the South do educate the negroes in the schools and they do not object to the exercise of the franchise by those who, by the ownership of property or by education, are qualified to vote. So by extending the suffrage to women you do not change the present condition, deplorable as it may be in the eyes of the men of the South. You simply increase the electorate by the addition of women; and if they are less literate than the men, or if they hold no property—as the Senator from Alabama admitted, the property being all in the names of the men—there is very little likelihood of their ever exercising the suffrage. If that is so, where is the danger?

The negroes cultivate the plantations; to that extent they are welcomed; and when they sought to run away to employment more remunerative in the shipyards last year the South called them to come back. When we went to war there was no hesitation in recruiting our troops from among the negroes. So the South has that problem to solve, whether we pass this joint resolution providing for this constitutional amendment or not; and they have solved it admirably and in good temper up to this time. The amendment, I am told, will increase by 20 per cent the voting white population in the South as a whole. So the South will be stronger. Where, then, is the danger?

In California we have race problems, and I look to the South to protect the western coast some day against the encroachment of Asiatics. Our sympathies are bound by a common problem. I recall that the West and the South united in the last election and gave to the country in the person of Woodrow Wilson its great leader. The West is all for woman suffrage; it has already given suffrage to women; it believes in it; and it believes in making the country homogeneous so far as the electorate is concerned, so that a western woman can go north or east or south and not be deprived of the privilege which she enjoys in the West.

I think if the South were sympathetic and associated itself more closely with the hopes and aspirations of the West it might serve a great purpose in resisting the forces of reaction which ultimately, sooner than later, will seek to assert themselves before the American people.

If the West understood the South and the South understood the West as well as they did in 1916, there would be a great bulwark for democracy in the Union of the two great sections of the country which would radiate far afield and perhaps finally penetrate New England. New England, the cradle of liberty, the home of human freedom, through its representatives opposing equal suffrage is a spectacle to make the angels weep. The former good Republican leader from the State of New Hampshire, a venerable and respected figure of this body, was ready to give the women his voice and vote for this measure. I should think that his influence might have some effect upon the men from New England, unless, he being dead, they repudiate his leadership.

Mr. President, State rights, in so far as it relates to this measure, is a bugaboo. I did not hear from my colleagues on this side of the Chamber any protest against the invasion of State rights when they wished to get a Federal appropriation for the extermination of the boll weevil. The boll weevil was destroying the cotton in the South, but, instead of the good Federal Government relegating the Southern States to their own resources, lest it should trespass upon their sovereignty, it voted millions of dollars for the extermination of the boll weevil. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], with the influenza of the Spanish variety prevailing, the other day did not turn to the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts to suppress their own epidemic, but came here and by unanimous consent took a million dollars out of a depleted Treasury. If the epizootic or the Spanish influenza found a fruitful soil in Massachusetts and did not bother California, it strikes me they ought certainly to provide by State means for its suppression; and yet those of us who are as broad as the continent, knowing the infectious character of the disease, among other reasons, regarded it as a Federal or national problem. So the police powers of the States are to be invaded and doctors and nurses are to be sent into these outraged sovereignties, but it being done at the request of their representatives, and, I suppose, because there was acquiescence in it by the States, the thrifty States, it can hardly be called usurpation.

So as to many other questions, the States are unable to protect their so-called rights; but we should look upon this as a great national problem, embracing all of the people, and we should offset the advantages of so-called interference against the disadvantages.

There is some slight disadvantage to the Southern States having a large population of negro women in imposing this constitutional amendment upon them by which there shall be no discrimination because of sex; but I think I have demonstrated that the disadvantage is slight, that it can be easily overcome, for they have negro suffrage there now as nearly as they would have it with a slight enlargement under the Susan B. Anthony amendment; so that we are not imposing negro suffrage or possible negro domination upon the South. If negro domination were the only question before this body now, we might well pause; but their problem is there and they are working it out admirably, and this will not aggravate it. By 20 per cent they will be stronger to resist it. There is no complaint of hardship or discrimination from any quarter, even from the negroes themselves; and there seems to be a perfect understanding between the men who use the labor of the negro and the laborer who seeks employment.

We have as Representatives in the United States Senate and in the House of Representatives men from the Southern States who are worthy of the great traditions of the respective bodies. So why say that the South, on account of a very slight disadvantage, would obstruct by its vote in this body to-day the great advantage as a matter of justice, equality, and right, as well as a war measure, of granting suffrage to women? There is no question in the world that the honest sentiment of the country is in favor of it. Even New York the other day, released from prejudice, swung with 100,000 ballots to its side. Is not that indicative of what is to come?

It is said that the West is for it because we are a hardy and independent people; and I know that the East is only opposed to it because they fear their own people, and when that is told to the constituencies there may be no very generous response. The South is opposed to it on account of race conditions, and the East is opposed to it because of their congested cities. In their sweatshops, in their factories, there is a great aggregation of women, and they fear that if they are invested with the suffrage there may be an outburst of democracy—meaning not in a partisan sense democracy, but democracy with a small "d"—that there may be such an outburst of democratic manifestation at the polls that the old order will change, the "predilections of the drawing-room" will no longer obtain, and the advice of Wall Street no longer be heeded, but that the sweatshops shall be made wholesome; that the homes shall be made livable; that the tenements shall be made sanitary; that the working conditions of the people in the factories shall be made better. A movement of that kind necessarily will carry, probably, increase in wages, because a person endowed, I will call it, with the beneficent ballot is in a position to protect himself or herself. That is what Wendell Phillips means when he says that we should give woman suffrage not for the purpose of protecting woman, but rather to place her in a position where she can protect herself. That is the secret of opposition to woman suffrage—the fear of an enlargement of democracy; the same fear that kept the franchise restricted in England until by slow degrees it dawned upon those who gave laws to that country that the strength of the Empire consisted in its dependence upon the people, upon trust, not fear, of the people, and the evils of democracy are cured always by more democracy.

I can see an enfranchised womanhood in this country springing to the defense of the flag, not dishonoring it; women who will love their country because their country loves them. I can well understand why women might rebel, even in the shadow of the Capitol, against the inequality of the present laws by which they are condemned to subjection. I am not one of those who are alarmed by these occasional ebullitions of feeling. I do not believe for a minute that there was any disrespect meant to the flag, as we understand the flag as the emblem of the Nation, marching with the boys at the front, but it was a criticism of the Congress that has the power to make the policies which the flag protects, and as Congress deprived the flag of the privilege of extending its ægis over American womanhood, the said, if they are correctly quoted, "The flag is the cause of all our trouble," meaning you and me, meaning the House and the Senate.

It was a woman's hand that first wove the flag; it is women who have given every one of the boys to fight the battles of their country under the flag. Who shall deny the privilege to his mother to participate in the affairs of government? Who is so mean and selfish as to arrogate power exclusively to himself, knowing that he sprung from woman, who in many respects was his superior in judgment and in wisdom, in love and devotion?

Woman is endowed with intuition, a faculty or sense which men do not possess. It enables her to see things which are obscured from our vision, and in the economy of nature she possesses a heart, and the heart has reasons of which the reason itself knows nothing.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] very properly said that in no case in the suffrage States have women lost their femininity, their gentleness, their grace, and their confiding nature by conferring upon them this benefit. In many cases they seek advice of their men even where they are breadwinners on their own account, but where they are thrown upon the world they look to the ballot as the source of their protection, for as voting citizens they receive better protection from the men and more respectful hearing from legislatures. The ordinations of nature can not be repealed by man-made laws. Nature has given to woman her charm for the purpose of holding together the human family and peopling the earth. Nature has provided for the care of women in that respect and no legislation passed by man can in any way repeal its God-given laws.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that woman suffrage in California has made public life more attractive to men. It has purified the elections, once disgraceful; it has in all its ramifications strengthened the State, and it has upon a sure basis of equality and justice laid the foundations of a real and true democracy, which, thus buttressed, will survive all the storms of time and passion. At last has come to the West what we fain would give to the world, a reign of law based upon the consent of the governed.

I have in my hand a survey of the results of woman suffrage in California:

Women have been interested in legislation along humanitarian lines for the protection of women and children and the general community welfare. Though no women have served in the State legislature, these State laws are directly due to their influence—

To a large extent. For instance, married women enjoy community property rights, which is an evidence, embalmed in the law to-day, not in California alone but throughout the Union and the world, of the real partnership that exists between men and women, because what a man earns in his shop during coverture becomes one-half the possession of the wife upon his demise, which is an admission of the fact that the wife participated in the creation of the wealth, a copartner. If she did not stand behind the counter nor plow in the field, she provided for the breadwinners at home; she gave them comfort and sustenance; she cared for the family, and did a thousand and one things necessary to keep the worker behind the counter or in the field.

So the law has recognized her equal partnership in the results of such labor. Why does the law not extend it to her political activities? She is given the education and the intelligence but is denied the power of expressing herself. There is no equity and no justice in that, and I may say to those who doubt the expediency of this measure that justice is always the highest expediency.

The abatement law, placing the responsibility of disorderly houses on the property owners rather than on the inmates and providing for the prohibition of such houses—

They found a solution for disorderly houses—

The age of consent, raising the age from 16 to 18 years.

Establishing State training schools for girls, with a board of women trustees.

The teachers' pension law—

They have added a pension law for teachers to the statutes and have been instrumental in amending the juvenile-court law to separate dependent from delinquent children.

A joint guardianship law, giving women equal rights over minor children.

Women are so closely interested in all governmental activities—in juvenile courts, the rights of minor children, schools, nurseries, things which come within what some gentlemen would fain call her proper sphere—that certainly the right to vote should not be denied when matters over which she has undoubted knowledge are involved. Yet we find men voting about minor children, juvenile courts, infant hospitals, and matters of local concern of which they only have knowledge so far as it is imparted to them by their wives, and the wives and mothers are excluded from the ballot. Should we not in war and peace mobilize the resources of our womanhood? Col. Roosevelt, in his speech on Saturday in Baltimore, advocated the registration of women as well as men. Then the burden and the benefit must go together.

The extending of the eight-hour law in California for women was a great reform, because the covetous manufacturers worked them 9 and 10 hours without hindrance from the male legislators until the women invested with the ballot simply made the request and the men acquiesced. It was not the compulsion of justice. It is the power of the ballot.

Making tuberculosis reportable to the State board of health.
Creating minimum-wage commissions.
A psycophathic parole law.
Birth, death, and marriage registration.
The home-teachers law.
Changes in the compulsory-education law.
A pure-milk law.

At the 1917 session of the legislature laws making important changes in the community-property laws, giving a wife greater equality with her husband with regard to their community property, were passed by the legislature; also laws making women eligible to jury service, and appropriating $250,000 to establish a colony for the feeble-minded. These were the especial laws advocated by women and carried.

So their usefulness must appeal to us, because men, involved in the discussion of the greater questions, very often lose sight of the smaller questions none the less important to the welfare of the community.

One word more, Mr. President: There can be no question that if this body regards this measure as a war measure it shall prevail. It is a war measure, because women have been called to places left necessarily by the men when, at the instance of their country, they have gone to the front. Women have been given the identical work performed by men. In England I am told there are only a million women not employed in war industries, and in this country munition factories, the shipyards, administrative offices, and the hospitals are to a considerable extent manned by women, because the men on account of the war have left their accustomed posts. So we find women substituted for the men in the industrial life of this country. The United States Cartridge Works, at Lowell, Mass., employ 17,000 persons, two-thirds of whom are women. At a shipyard in Philadelphia where 3,000 men are employed there are out of that number 827 places where women can replace men, and this is about to be done. Woman must be regarded as possessing a new status since the war, and, because she has a new status, she must be treated on terms of equality with the men; otherwise, she might very properly rebel and say, "If I am given the responsibility I must also have the right to express my views concerning governmental affairs; if my labor is taxed and my property is burdened with debt I must, on terms of equality with men, have the right to express my consent or my dissent." I do not think there can be any answer to that reason urged in favor of the adoption of this proposed constitutional amendment, and I do not believe there is any answer to the President's appeal that this is in truth and in fact a war measure, and if it is a war measure, since we have supported the President in all other matters, we must, to be consistent, support him in this.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, in the discussion of this question a day or two ago the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] very truthfully stated, as it seemed to me, that everything that could be said on this question has been said for and against it; and yet during the recent discussion, at least, we have had no word of testimony here as to how woman suffrage has actually applied in the State that first granted women the franchise. In spite of the late hour, I ask to detain the Senate for just a few moments in testifying as to the effect of woman suffrage.

Mr. President, at this moment when, as I confidently believe, the United States, through the action of this body, is about to commit itself definitely to a policy that was adopted half a century ago by the people of Wyoming, it seems to me fitting that I should say just a word on behalf of my State and its voters—men and women.

Wyoming is the pioneer equal-suffrage State in America. In 1869, almost 50 years ago, the first Territorial legislature granted to the women of the Territory the right to vote and to hold office. At the end of a period of more than 20 years, when the people were arbitrarily required to pass judgment on the merits and demerits of the question, their decision, rendered through the medium of the legislature again, was both prompt and positive. When the application of the Territory for admission as a State was under consideration by the Fifty-first Congress, in 1890, vigorous opposition developed to the admission of a State with a constitutional provision for woman suffrage. So strong, indeed, was the sentiment that our Delegate in Congress, Hon. Joseph M. Carey, telegraphed to the legislature, which was then in session, expressing his fears that statehood would be denied unless the suffrage clause were abandoned. To its lasting credit, the legislature, without equivocation or delay, telegraphed in reply, "We will remain out of the Union a hundred years rather than go in without woman suffrage." Congress very properly yielded to the wishes of the State, and Wyoming came into the Union without curtailing the rights or privileges of any of its citizens.

It could not have been otherwise, for the women of the frontier had shared with the men all the burdens and dangers of building the new State upon the plains. In the hard experience of pioneer life the men of Wyoming learned how surely they could depend upon the courage, judgment, and initiative of their women. The ranchman and the settler worked side by side with his wife, his mother, and his daughter in laying the foundations of government, and when the time came to establish government, he could have found no reason, even if he had had the disposition, to withhold from her a share in its responsibilities.

Here I wish to say, Mr. President, incidentally, that I agree with the view expressed here that this is not a political question; but in view of the statement made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that if this joint resolution fails it will fail on account of a lack of Democratic votes, I wish at this time to call attention to the fact that the first legislature of my State granting woman suffrage was a Democratic legislature.

So she got the ballot. The act of the Territorial legislature in granting her the right to vote was nothing more nor less than a formal recognition of the part she had played in reclaiming the wilderness. It was the fair and open tribute of American men to American women, and I have always believed that when the men of Wyoming gave recognition to the principle of equal suffrage they were speaking the voice of the real America, the America that first established democracy in the modern world, the America that is now ready to give its all to endow all nations and all races with that same democracy. The conditions which existed in Wyoming were the same as those which existed in the early days of the Colonies, and I am convinced that had the question of granting suffrage to women been raised in those times the Revolutionary fathers would have been as prompt to make it a part of the fundamental law as were the men of the West.

The quality of the citizenship of Wyoming is distinctly American. The State was settled by the sons and daughters of the men who had shaped the destinies of the Eastern States, representatives of the finest type of American manhood and womanhood. Alien emigration did not reach Wyoming, but men and women from the East and the South and from what was then the West, men and women who knew nothing but Americanism, were the ones who guided its development. Is it any wonder that they did not know how to limit democracy, and that even when threatened with exclusion from the Union they could not bring themselves to deny a full share in the privileges and responsibilities of citizenship to the women who had helped to make that citizenship worth while?

That, Mr. President, is how Wyoming came into the Union vindicating the motto which appears upon her State seal, "Equal rights," and I have yet to hear a responsible citizen of the State express regret. Forty-nine years of experience have placed the question beyond the experimental stage and have demonstrated to all fair observers the success of suffrage. Just as the woman of the pioneer days met all the responsibilities that devolved upon her, so is she meeting them to-day, and so has she been meeting them for the past half century. Surely it is not necessary to say to any rational man or woman that the exercise of the right to vote has not in the slightest degree lessened the interest of the women of my State in their home life. It has not in any manner affected the high personal qualities with which they are endowed, nor has it in any way made them less feminine. If any man fears that women may be contaminated by politics, to him I would say that in Wyoming the very reverse has been true and the plane of government has been raised. The extension of the suffrage has not made "politicians" out of them nor has it transformed them into office seekers. The records of my State will show not only that they are disinclined to accept the responsibilities of office, but that they can rarely be induced to do so. They are, nevertheless, keenly alive to their duties as voters at every election, and they display quite as much interest as the men. While not often found among the candidates for public office, they are with each succeeding election becoming more and more concerned as to the qualifications, the character, and integrity of those who claim their support.

When equal suffrage was first proposed in Wyoming I have no doubt there were some men then, as now, who argued that women lacked both experience and judgment, but who, after the ballot had been granted, were ready and anxious to set themselves up as mentors to the new voters. I feel certain that when this amendment is passed and suffrage has been adopted nationally, the same characteristic generosity in giving political advice and counsel to the women of the present time will be displayed by these husbands and brothers, who are so loath now to see them soil their hands with politics. But there is a seeming inconsistency to be found in the history of suffrage in my State which will probably repeat itself elsewhere—for so long as the women of Wyoming allowed themselves to be guided by this more mature judgment and this superior knowledge, just so long did they fail to get results. It was not until they began to exercise the benefits of the full emancipation that comes with independent and individual action at the polls that they began to exert an influence by securing reform legislation. No woman who reviews the legislative record of the last few years in Wyoming but will be proud of the achievements of her sex, and no man who is anxious to see the advance of social reform and the improvement of politics but will rejoice that the women were given the opportunity to enforce their judgment at the polls.

Speaking from a personal knowledge that covers a period of 40 years, I can say in all sincerity that I have never known the women of Wyoming to champion or even to lend their sanction knowingly to an unworthy piece of legislation. They ofttimes have a very keen and active interest in matters pending before the legislature or in problems for popular decision. They ofttimes organize for political purposes and unite to secure political results; but, Mr. President, I have yet to learn of the first instance in Wyoming of any organized effort on the part of women voters to gain private and selfish ends through legislation. Their interest is in public welfare. Their aim is to bring about social reform. Their political object is to make the city in which they live, the country in which they live, the State in which they live a better place in which to build a home.

That has been the effect of woman suffrage in Wyoming, where the record of legislative accomplishment brought about through the votes of women is an enviable one. When they helped to write an antigambling law upon the statute books, the women of Wyoming brought about a reform that would have been long delayed without them. When they secured the adoption of a law limiting the hours of labor of women and children, they performed a service for both the State and for the home. When they fought for and obtained a mothers' pension law, they won another battle for the strengthening of the home. They gave their active support to the campaign for the workmen's compensation law, for pure-food laws, for a law raising the age of protection for girls to 18 years, for a law improving conditions in the State penal and charitable institutions, for laws limiting the traffic of liquor. These, Mr. President, are but typical of the objects for which the woman in politics strives in Wyoming. You will never find her in the lobbies of the legislature trying to win support for some measure of doubtful ethics—you will not find her besieging city councils and county officials with pleas for special privileges. When she speaks, she speaks only in the name of morality and clean government. I do not mean by this that women are always right, nor that the extension of suffrage throughout the States will immediately elevate the Nation. I mean that wherever women are given the right to express themselves politically and wherever they use their influence as women, you will find them standing for the same high principles for which they have stood since the beginning of civilization.

The light thrown upon this question by its practical application in this one State in which the law has now been effective for nearly half a century is all the evidence that would be necessary to convince any unprejudiced mind that women are as highly qualified for citizenship as men. A woman has as good a right to vote for those who exercise authority over her property, either acting in the capacity of taxgatherers or in passing upon questions of law in the courts, as she has to own that property, and she certainly has even a greater interest in those who are chosen to administer the laws for the protection of herself and her children. The people of my State who have applied this principle through many years are committed to it as a matter of right and have but little patience with those who, living in the present time of enlightenment, are clinging tenaciously to the theory of restricted suffrage and who at the same time are boasting of their anxiety to lead other people out of a condition of bondage.

The political influence of women, Mr. President, is a moral and uplifting force of which no man need be afraid. Rather is it an influence we should seek to strengthen. And particularly at this moment in our Nation's history, when we are calling upon the women for every possible assistance and sacrifice, should we be ashamed to deny her full citizenship. Now above all times are we learning the lesson that the men of the frontier learned long ago—that the women are needed to help carry our burden, and that they are taking it up unselfishly and efficiently. We are not only asking them to give their sons and brothers and husbands to our Army, but we are asking them to do all manner of labor on the farm and in the factory in order that the Army may be properly supplied. We are sending them into every avenue of trade and business to release men for the fighting front. How can we demand these sacrifices and these labors and at the same time pretend that they are incapable of properly exercising the franchise?

I think I can perhaps understand the chivalrous attitude of some men who would withhold the vote from women out of the belief that to do so would be to protect them from unpleasant contact with the world. I think I can understand the point of view of the man who honestly believes that woman's place is in the home. But to such a man I will say that to deny women the right to vote will not cure the evil he has in mind. Even if it were granted that his argument is sound, to which of course I will not for a moment agree, I ask him what protection can he afford to the woman who has neither brother nor father, to the widow who has lost her husband? What protection will he afford to the thousands of women who have no protector but who are forced to live under a Government in which they have no voice?

The man who would deny her the vote in order to protect her is beginning at the wrong end to shield woman from the world, and until he can protect her from the necessity of earning her own living, until he can furnish her a home in which to live without cares or responsibilities save those of the home, he is depriving her of her most effective means of protection when he refuses to grant her the ballot. If, because of changed economic and industrial conditions, we can not keep women in the home, then let us by all means help her to make the Nation her home, let us help her to raise all the standards of business and of industry to the standards of the home. This we can best do by permitting her to express herself politically.

Mr. President, the very spirit of this resolution is in keeping with democratic principles as I have, in my limited judgment, been able to interpret them from my boyhood days. Suffrage, equal and complete, can not be dissociated from the march of progress. It is part and parcel of our advancement toward the universal realization of the ideals of liberty, fraternity, and equality.

Those of us who come from the West, from those sections which only a few years ago were the frontiers of civilization, have always been proud that in our communities the lines which divide men into classes have always been vague. The farther west you go the farther behind do you leave caste and privilege, the closer do you come to that ideal land where outward trappings count for naught and every man's rank is determined by his worth. The West is the birthplace of equal suffrage, because in the West men have come closest to democracy.

It is not without its significance that it is in the suffrage States that the greatest progress has been made toward the equalization of opportunity for all. It is not without meaning that what we call the progressive movement in legislation and in politics has found its greatest impetus, if not its origin, in the States where women have been regarded as in all respects equal to men and entitled to all the rights and privileges which men enjoy. Equal suffrage and progress go hand in hand, because equal suffrage breaks down the last barrier of division behind which one part of the population may think, legislate, and govern for the other.

We have entered upon a war against such barriers; we have pledged ourselves to the deliverance of the world from a caste which has thought of itself as alone fit to rule. Surely the Senate of the United States, while giving all its thought and energies to the battle which the free peoples of the world are waging against that narrow conception of destiny, will not by its vote to-day fail to tell all men everywhere that in this country the basis of our civilization is as broad as our population. While assuming an attitude of generosity toward the people of other lands we can not afford to be less than just to all the people of our own.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, it has not been my purpose to take part in the discussion of this question, and I have intended to do no more than vote against the proposed constitutional amendment compelling every State in the Union to grant suffrage to women; but, that my position in opposing it may be understood, I have decided to submit to the Senate some of the reasons which have influenced me in it.

In the first place, Mr. President, even if I favored woman suffrage as a general proposition, I should oppose this amendment, because I believe that under our system of government this question is one that should be left to the control and regulation of each State. It is a question entirely of State concern, and the Federal Government would make a serious mistake if it should undertake by the adoption of this amendment to deprive each State of its right to settle the question for itself. Conditions are not the same in all the States. In a country so large, so diversified, and so populous as ours a policy or a law that might be wise in some States might be very unwise in other States.

I have no doubt, from the assurance of many worthy gentlemen, that woman suffrage has been successful in some or in all the States where it has been adopted, and there should be no obstacle in the way of any other State to adopt it if the people of that State should desire it; and wherever the people of any State in this country desire that the women of their State shall vote in local, State, or national elections, even for the election of the President himself, they can now, without the aid of a Federal amendment, give the right to vote to women. I can not understand, therefore, why it is that the very ardent and active leaders in this movement should not be satisfied with that situation.

If an amendment were proposed the converse of the one now before us, which would prohibit a State from allowing women to vote, such a proposition, I believe, would be unfair and unreasonable and I would earnestly oppose it. There are many States in the Union where a large majority of the people do not desire to have woman suffrage and see no reason for it. I believe it is true that in many States a large majority of the women themselves do not wish it and are well satisfied with their present relations to the matter of suffrage.

There are some of us who oppose this amendment and yet who supported the constitutional amendment for Federal prohibition, and have been charged with inconsistency; and it has been suggested by some that if it was right for the Federal Government by constitutional amendment to impose prohibition on every State, regardless of whether or not every State wished it, then there should be no question upon our part to the Government's imposing by constitutional amendment woman suffrage upon every State, whether or not every State wished it. They lose sight of the very essential difference between the two questions. Prohibition could not be made effective by State action, and the laws in prohibition States were in many instances nullified or evaded by the liquor interests in other States where prohibition did not exist. Prohibition, therefore, could not be made completely effective except by Federal action, and that action followed as a natural consequence of the invasion of the laws of dry States by the liquor interests in wet States. But the suffrage question is an entirely different proposition, and it is no concern whatever of the people of one State whether or not the people of an adjoining State allow women to vote, nor have they any concern whatever in the suffrage regulations of any other State. I have no doubt that if any considerable majority of the women of any State where they are not now permitted to vote seriously desire to do so, they will, without any trouble, secure by State action the right to do so. I do not believe that there is a State in the Union—and I am convinced that such is the condition in my State—where the women, if reasonably united in their wishes or demands upon any proposition, can not secure it without having the right themselves to vote. I am sure that in the laws and the administration of the laws in my State there is not an instance of discrimination against women, and I have not heard of any such discrimination existing in the laws or the administration of them in any other State. There is no doubt that many of the reforms enacted into laws in this country in the last generation and much legislation beneficial to the welfare of the people have been accomplished by the influence of women without the vote just as effectively, and probably more so, than could have been done if they had had the vote.

If there were any legislation that the women wanted in my State and they could not get it without the ballot, then I would be in favor of giving them the ballot. We hear a great deal, Mr. President, from some enthusiastic advocates of this movement, about the rights of women, about the justice of their demands, and from the fervid and excited declarations of some we might be led to believe that the women of this country were an oppressed people and denied the opportunities and advantages that men enjoy. Many intelligent people have been misled by these statements, and they have been misled, I believe, because they lose sight of the fact that the right to vote is not itself a substantive benefit, but merely an instrument by which the benefits of government may be secured. They lose sight, too, of the fact that the right to vote is not only a privilege but it is an obligation. Merely giving to woman the vote would not in itself benefit her and she could not secure any advantage whatever in that mere right. But if there are any benefits or advantages of a substantive or concrete nature which she should have and can not secure without the vote, then, I repeat, she should have the vote. I have not heard a single advocate of this movement state a substantial right denied to woman in any State in this Union, and if she has all of the benefits and advantages that she could ask, why should she be burdened with the obligation of suffrage, for I consider it, Mr. President, more of an obligation than a privilege.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator consider that if he were deprived of the right to vote it would be a substantial right that was interfered with?

Mr. BECKHAM. I do not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator mean to say that he does not believe that the right to cast his vote is a substantial right?

Mr. BECKHAM. I value the privilege of voting, but the vote itself is not of substantial advantage. It is merely an instrument or means by which you can secure the benefits or advantages of government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator think that the women would appreciate the right—whether it is a substantial right or not, according to the Senator's theory—to cast their votes in the determination of questions that affect them?

Mr. BECKHAM. As I have said, if there is anything of a substantial nature in the administration of government that is denied the women, then I think they should have the right to vote. If there is any discrimination against them in the laws, they should have the right to change them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The discrimination is that woman is not allowed to vote.

Mr. BECKHAM. The Senator has a different view of the matter than I have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator believe that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed?

Mr. BECKHAM. The Senator and I have our different views on the application of that principle.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Can it be possible that any two persons have different views on that?

Mr. BECKHAM. That is not the question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, as woman is evidently governed, as she is subject to the laws that man makes, what right has man to make all the laws, not only for himself but also for his mother and his sisters and his wife, without consulting them in any way whatever?

Mr. BECKHAM. I should like to ask the Senator if he can cite, in any State in the Union, especially where women do not vote, any legislation, any measure of reform of advantage to them, that has been denied them because they have not the right to vote?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. It occurs to me that in some of the States of the Union they are working children under age, undoubtedly against the wishes of the mothers of the country and the wishes of the mothers of those States; and yet the men of those States, from their viewpoint, think it is proper. It is very possible that if the women in those States voted the condition that the Senator asks about would not exist.

Mr. BECKHAM. That condition does not exist in my State.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator said "any State in the Union where only men vote."

Mr. BECKHAM. I do not know of any State where that condition exists.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator does not know that they have child labor in North Carolina and South Carolina?

Mr. BECKHAM. Does not the Senator from Nevada think the people of North Carolina and South Carolina are able to determine that question for themselves, without interference from the people of other States?

Mr. PITTMAN. The question the Senator asked was if there were any wrongs there that the men themselves did not remedy. I say that that is a wrong that in the nature of things women would remedy and men will not remedy.

Mr. BECKHAM. There are States where the women do not vote where those wrongs have been remedied long ago.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. By actual comparison, the so-called "child-labor bill" which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional was vastly inferior in the provisions it made for the protection of children to the statute on the books of South Carolina in reference to that matter.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is no reason why we should prevent the women of other States from participating in government.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, I have no objection to letting the women in the Senator's State vote; but I do contend that you should give me the same privilege to say whether they shall vote in my State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But if you have the general principle acknowledged that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, your Nation is not a democratic Nation, your State is not a democratic State, your city is not a democratic city, your county is not a democratic county, if that principle is true. If it is not true, then, of course, there is a denial of the fundamentals of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Have we not had a good democratic form of government during all these years?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no doubt the people can live absolutely without it, but at the same time you are denying the right. People can live under a monarchy; there is no doubt of that. But we do not like a monarchy; we think it violates the principle of democracy, and we therefore think that it ought to be abolished in a democracy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is not what I asked the Senator. I asked him whether he thinks we have been living in a democracy and under a democratic form of government until this time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think it can not be possible that you have a true democracy when you deny the right of persons to vote, when you deny them the right to participate in government and help to make laws for themselves. Whenever you do that you fail in the very fundamental principle that lies back of democratic government.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator a question? Does he believe in any qualification for suffrage at all?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I believe in every other qualification. This is an attempt to control simply to the extent that you can not pass any law discriminating against the people on account of sex. When you do that it is nothing more than a species of the divine right of kings, and when you withhold this privilege you are substituting therefor the divine right of sex.

Mr. BECKHAM. The Senator from Colorado illustrates the point which I was undertaking to make, that so many men are misled by the idea that the right to vote is a substantive right or benefit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. BECKHAM. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well; I will not interrupt the Senator if the Senator wishes me not to do so.

Mr. BECKHAM. If women are secure of the benefits and advantages of government without the vote, why need they be given the vote? Why should we double the number of voters and further complicate electoral difficulties that now exist in the country? It is a fact well known, Mr. President, that one of the serious dangers in our Government is the lack, upon the part of so many who now have the right to vote, of a full and proper appreciation of the obligations and responsibilities which such a right imposes. Too many of our voters already do not realize the importance of this responsibility and do not participate in our elections in such a way as they should do.

It is more sentiment than reason that is back of this movement; it is the form rather than the substance which is seen by so many who have been led to favor it. Never would I for an instant oppose any measure that would give to woman any substantial right that she may desire, nor would I for a minute have anyone think that my opposition to woman suffrage is due to any idea that woman has not the intelligence, capacity, or patriotism to exercise that right as well as man can exercise it. No such thought as that has ever entered my mind and my opposition to it is for entirely different reasons. I may be considered somewhat old-fashioned and romantic in my ideas, but I look upon woman as superior to man. I am opposed to all of this talk about giving her equal rights because I am in favor of her having greater rights than man has, and I believe that granting her the suffrage does not lift her up to the plane of equal rights with man, but rather drags her down to it. Woman is the civilizing, refining, elevating influence that holds man from barbarism. It has been said that the civilization of any country can be determined by the condition in which women live in that country. The higher the plane of woman's standing and influence, and the more she is looked up to and respected, the more civilized are the people of that country. In no country on earth, and in no country in all history, have women occupied a higher station in life or exercised a greater influence, even in those States where they do not vote, than they do in America. If there is anything they want and are reasonably well united in their wishes, they should have it and they always get it. I do not wish to see woman put on an equal footing with man at the polls because I fear when that is done she will be put on an equal footing with man in other stations of life, and she is entirely too good for that. It is the duty of man to work and labor for woman; to cut the wood, to carry the coal, to go into the fields in the necessary labor to sustain the home where the woman presides and by her superior nature elevates him to higher and better conceptions of life. It is his duty and not hers to go to the battle field with his weapons of war to defend her home and her country from the invasion of an enemy; it is his duty and his obligation to go to the polls, guided by the refining influences of her character, to exercise the responsibility placed upon him by casting his vote in such a way as will bring the best results possible in government for her and for her home. There is no more need for him to take her to that place where the votes are cast than there is for him to take her with him upon the battle field. This, Mr. President, in my opinion, is no war measure, notwithstanding the fact that some very able leaders have allowed themselves to be persuaded that it is. This is an inopportune time to consider it. Our whole attention and energy should be directed to the successful prosecution of this war and not to a matter like this which can well wait until the minds of the people are in a calmer and better condition to deal with such a radical change in a fundamental question of government. It is not necessary to grant to woman the right to vote in order to express the full appreciation and gratitude which the men of this country and our allies feel toward her for the heroic sacrifices, the splendid services, and the noble work she has done and is doing in the cause of liberty and freedom. I believe that only a comparatively small percentage of women ask for such recognition of their services. Should not this question be removed from the scene of congressional action and relegated to the States, where it properly belongs? That was the declaration in the last Democratic national convention a little over two years ago; that was also the declaration of the Republican convention. Why should we not, therefore, representatives of those two great parties, be guided by the last solemn declarations which those parties have made upon this question? In our deliberations here it seems to me that those Senators who come from States where they already have woman suffrage should be satisfied and not seek, by this extraordinary and uncalled-for method, to impose such conditions upon other States which do not want woman suffrage.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, a few days ago I proposed an amendment to the pending joint resolution. While I realize that the Senate is fatigued, I shall be forced to be away to-morrow if I can arrange a proper pair, and I would like to speak briefly upon my amendment. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the joint resolution add the following:

but no male person who is not a citizen of the United States shall exercise the right of suffrage at an election for Senators and Representatives in Congress or for electors for President and Vice President of the United States, and no female person who is not such a citizen otherwise than by marriage, or who, having acquired citizenship by marriage, has not complied with such requirements and conditions as may be prescribed by the Congress shall exercise such right.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the avowed and the obvious object of the resolution now pending before the Senate is to place women who are citizens of the United States upon an equality with men who are such citizens in the matter of the exercise of the right to vote; to confer suffrage upon female citizens of this country throughout the length and breadth thereof. My object in proposing an amendment to that resolution is to make it possible, in what seems to me the best way open to us, for the resolution actually to accomplish that obvious purpose and to avoid what seems to me to be the very serious danger that, in the very act of conferring the right to vote upon women and of abolishing the inequalities in that regard which have heretofore existed we shall perpetuate and increase evils already existing and create new ones that will prove a constant and increasing source of embarrassment to us in the future administration of governmental affairs.

At the outset I desire to make it perfectly plain that I am not opposed to the adoption of the woman-suffrage amendment—on the contrary, I am distinctly in favor of its adoption—but my attention has been attracted to the situation which I shall now endeavor to explain to the best of my ability, and I have felt that this situation is so serious that I should be derelict in the performance of my duty as a Member of this body should I fail or neglect to call its dangers to the notice of each and every Member of the Senate.

With this by way of preface I shall proceed to state the purposes of and reasons for the additions to the proposed constitutional amendment which I have offered in the form of an amendment to the resolution. My first object is this: To place in the Constitution itself a provision which will safeguard the country against the exercise of the right of franchise in Federal matters by aliens residing or sojourning within our midst. And it has seemed to me that not only is this of such great importance as to justify efforts toward the accomplishment of the reform at any and all times, but the pendency before the Senate of the resolution under discussion affords an opportunity for its accomplishment in an appropriate and efficient manner that ought not by any means to be overlooked.

Under the constitutions of seven States of this Union aliens now exercise the right of franchise in connection with every elective office candidates for which are ordinarily voted for in the other States, to wit, Indiana, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Texas. Recognizing the menace to the safety of government of such a policy as this, a number of States have recently amended their constitutions so as to allow only native-born persons and persons who are fully naturalized under the regular legal process to vote therein, to wit, Alabama, Minnesota, Michigan, Wisconsin, and others that I can not recollect.

To show the abuses which arise under such a policy, which is contrary to the very spirit of the Federal naturalization laws, attention might be directed to the fact that the following methods have recently been applied in a certain Western State where the declarations of intention made by aliens in the course of a year would hardly approximate two dozen and the declarations made within 30 days preceding and including election day—made under the influence of vote manufacturers—have approximated a thousand or more in several of the courts exercising naturalization jurisdiction in the State. The ambitious candidate has his henchmen line up all the foreigners in the district whom he can enlist. He makes his drive through the industrial plants, foregathers with the aliens in their club organizations, extols the virtues of his candidate—and this applies regardless of party—and by various inducements and blandishments prevails upon the foreigners to assemble at convenient places and in the day and night time the accommodating clerk of the court supplies the necessary blank forms and accepts the statutory fees coming from an appropriate source. Up to and including election day this business continues. All day long, in the presence of Government officials, the stream of aliens has been seen to enter the room where the clerk of the court is located and to leave that room with statements from the clerk showing that the aliens have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and, in the light of the provision of the State constitution, showing also by implication that such aliens have become clothed by the mere act of declaring an intention to become citizens with such character, intelligence, and understanding of our institutions that they are entitled to exercise the franchise in the same way and with the same effect as a person born in our midst.

Under the resolution pending before the Senate, unless the part of my amendment directed to this situation, or some similar amendment, should be adopted, the evils and abuses to which I am calling attention will not only be perpetuated, but will perhaps be practically doubled; for, if and when the amendment proposed in the resolution is ratified by the requisite number of States, each and every foreign woman now living in the seven States I have mentioned and each and every one who shall take up residence there later who has attained the statutory age will be able to declare her intention, if she is unmarried, and by that simple act will be clothed with the right to vote alongside of the man.

With this situation existing, any unmarried woman coming from the most anarchistic section of Russia, from the fastnesses of bolshevikism, from the I. W. W. ranks, or from any other source inimical to our interests or even believing in the utter destruction of our Government—any unmarried woman, no matter what her character may be, might be induced in the States mentioned to declare her intention to become a citizen, whereupon she could proceed to stamp the impress of her views and of her character, through the exercise of her right to vote, upon the laws of this country. This is an illustration none too extreme; but even if it should be regarded as extreme, the answer is that we must think through to the very depths of the possibility of an evil if we are correctly to measure the extent of such evil.

Is it desirable or wise to lay a foundation in a constitutional amendment for the perpetuation of such a situation as this, especially when it may be so easily guarded against? I think not; and, because of that view, I have inserted in my proposed amendment the provision—

But no male person who is not a citizen of the United States shall exercise the right of suffrage at an election for Senators and Representatives in Congress or for electors for President and Vice President of the United States—

And have, in addition, so worded the remainder of my proposed amendment, the direct purpose of which is to meet another situation, to the description of which I am about to proceed, that the same result will be accomplished with regard to females.

The second object which I have in view is this: To insure that, in conferring the right to vote upon women who are citizens, we do not create a legal situation in which foreign women might, through the operation of the almost universally recognized principle that a married woman's citizenship follows that of her husband, qualify to exercise the franchise in Federal elections, although wholly unfitted by character, education, residence within the country, and knowledge of and regard for its institutions, or otherwise, to have a voice in public affairs. My second object, in other words, is so to change the wording of the resolution before us that it shall be made actually to confer upon women rights equal to those enjoyed in this regard by men, and not greater than those enjoyed by men.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator rises to ask me a question, I would be very glad to answer it after I conclude. I know the Senate wants to adjourn, and I hope the Senator will not interrupt me now.

Mr. CALDER. Very well.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I have already remarked, the object of the pending resolution is to place women on the same footing as men so far as the right of franchise is concerned. I am in favor of a constitutional amendment properly drawn which will permit the worthy women of this country who are citizens, either by birth or through the regular and orderly processes of naturalization, to have the right of suffrage; but I want that amendment so drawn that it will protect the worthy women, who should vote, against the unworthy, who should not vote, and I want it so drawn that Congress can hereafter pass laws properly protecting this enlarged and increased electorate. I conceive it to be our duty under our oath as Senators to pass an amendment that will do this.

I do not know who prepared the pending constitutional amendment, but I believe it has been drawn without proper consideration or study of the Constitution and conditions that exist under our naturalization statutes, the careless disregard of them, the abuses that have crept into the making of citizens, and the apparent indifference of some authorities to the grave menace to the institutions of popular government that thus arise.

In giving to this subject that careful study which its gravity demands, my attention has been attracted to two circumstances in particular. The passage of a resolution of this kind is closely related to the precarious situation in regard to aliens which has been brought about by the war and our participation in it. Congress has been forced to pass drastic laws at the eleventh hour to protect this country against sedition, treason, and deep-seated disloyalty, arising from the fact that so many foreigners reside amongst us and that Germany has carried on a surreptitious propaganda here ever since the war and evidently, from latter-day developments, even for many years before the war. It is not necessary for me to recite the many outrages, bombings, dynamitings, murders, committed by the disloyal foreigners residing here. The consideration of this amendment conferring upon female citizens the right to vote necessarily brings up at this critical time the grave question of our immigration and naturalization laws and policies, especially in their relation to and effect upon women of alien birth already here or who may hereafter come.

The other particular circumstance was not fully appreciated by me, in its relation to the constitutional amendment as drawn, until I conferred with officials of the Bureau of Immigration and learned its extent and seriousness. It arises from the abuses that exist in connection with the traffic in women for immoral purposes. While our immigration laws have been framed with the object of protecting society against this traffic, nevertheless many women become citizens of the United States through pro forma marriages contracted simply for the purpose of giving the poor, unfortunate women a status of citizenship under our laws and preventing them from being deported. The pimp, the procurer, these vice scavengers of humanity, products of the swill barrel of foreign lands, carry on their immoral, unspeak-able practices almost within the shadow of Ellis Island, the women being brought in from Europe, from the Orient, and from the Latin countries, and, except in the cases of Chinese and Japanese, a pro forma marriage contract can be entered into and these women become citizens of the United States and can not be deported unless the Government can show—under the most recent amendment to section 19 of the immigration act—that the marriage was contracted after the woman became liable to deportation under the law; and heretofore the enforcement of the act has been seriously impeded through the fact that a foreign woman, no matter what her character, can secure citizenship simply by going through with a marriage ceremony, the other party to which is an American citizen.

The foregoing are the two respects in which, it seems to me, the importance of the second part of my proposed amendment is made especially apparent at this time. I desire now to proceed to a more detailed discussion of the matter in its legal as well as its practical aspects.

Generally, married women are regarded as citizens of the country of which their husbands are citizens. This principle is recognized by the laws of the United States, section 1994 of the Revised Statutes providing that—

> Any woman who is now or may hereafter be married to a citizen of the United States and who might herself be lawfully naturalized shall be deemed a citizen.

It is of fundamental importance that in considering this provision of law the fact shall not be overlooked that Congress, in adopting it, was proceeding in pursuance of authority conferred upon the Congress by Article I, section 8, paragraph 4 of the Constitution—the authority "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." Therefore, the marriage of a foreign woman to an American citizen is, in its effect upon the status of the woman, a process of naturalization, and it must be borne in mind that the woman who acquires citizenship in this manner is, by virtue of the language of section 1994 itself, as fully naturalized as though she had gone through the court processes of naturalization required in the cases of males and in the cases of unmarried females, and as completely a citizen of the United States as though she had been born here. The Constitution "contemplates two sources of citizenship, and two only—birth and naturalization," said the Supreme Court in the leading case on citizenship, entitled United States v. Wong Kim Ark (169 U. S., 649, 702).

The procurement of United States citizenship by a foreign woman through marriage to a citizen is not, of course, surrounded with any of the safeguards that are, and have been for many years, placed round the procurement of citizenship through the regular court processes provided by law. Some of those safeguards are the following:

A male alien desiring to become a citizen of the United States must make a declaration that he is not an anarchist, a polygamist, or a believer in the practice of polygamy, and that it is his intention in good faith to become a citizen of the United States and permanently to reside therein. Not less than two years and not more than seven years after he has made his declaration of intention he must again petition the court and take an oath that he is not "a disbeliever in or opposed to organized government, or a member of or affiliated with any organization or body of persons teaching disbelief in organized government," and so on. Then he is examined by the United States examiners, and if the court so directs he becomes a citizen, but under the Revised Statutes a foreign woman who has attained her citizenship by marriage to an American citizen is not held to conform to that process of law.

What is the object of the resolution? It is to give men and women the same rights under the Constitution, to place them upon an equality in regard to the elective franchise. Does it do that? Will it attain its object?

Under the Federal statute already quoted an alien woman who marries a man who is a citizen of the United States by birth or naturalization becomes a citizen, and under this resolution, as drawn, she would be entitled to vote; but a male alien or a female alien not married must be naturalized in a regular court proceeding under our naturalization laws before he or she becomes a citizen qualified under this proposed resolution, as drawn, to vote. Is that equal rights?

A male alien—a German, for instance—marries an American woman, but he does not thereby become a citizen, and under this constitutional amendment he could not vote by reason of that marriage relation. But a female alien—a German woman, for instance—marries an American citizen, perhaps a German who has been naturalized. She thereby, ipso facto, becomes a citizen, and under this constitutional amendment could vote. Is that equal rights? Certainly not. It is conferring upon married women rights not conferred upon unmarried women or upon any man—rights which ought not to be conferred upon either women or men in any such haphazard, unregulated fashion.

Again, the foreign man or unmarried foreign woman must reside here continuously for at least five years before the boon of citizenship will be conferred; but the foreign woman may, by marrying a citizen become invested with all the rights and privileges of citizenship immediately upon landing upon our shores, including, if the constitutional amendment as proposed should be adopted, the right to vote. The foreign man or unmarried woman seeking in good faith, through the regularly ordained channels, to become a citizen of this country must be of "good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same." But in the case of the foreign woman who marries a citizen no such standards are enforced; the marriage, ipso facto, confers citizenship, even though she is of bad character and even though she knows nothing and cares less about the principles of the Constitution. She does not have to be of good character, because the Supreme Court long ago held, in the case entitled Kelley against Owen, Seventh Wallace, 496, that the qualifying phrase, "and who might herself be lawfully naturalized," found in section 1994 of the Revised Statutes, means no more than that she must be of the general class—races—for which naturalization is authorized. Under this situation will the rights conferred be equal? Obviously not. Upon this fact too great emphasis can not be placed: If this resolution passes in its present form, foreign women married to citizens will become voters without any of the safeguards of naturalization through court processes.

Mr. President, how many foreign women are there in the United States?

The census of 1910 recorded 13,500,000 persons of foreign birth in our population. During the years 1911 to 1914, 3,000,000 more were added, according to the estimate of the Immigration Bureau. This is net—makes allowance for those who returned to their native lands. From 1915 to 1918 it is estimated immigration has been about 300,000 a year, making in these years of the war 1,200,000 immigrants added to our population. The total number of foreign-born persons here would, therefore, seem to be about 18,000,000.

Mr. President, there are in the United States to-day 5,821,757 women of foreign birth. They are mostly in the large industrial States. I shall not read the statistics relative to them now. Suffice it to say that New York State has 1,296,849; Massachusetts, 526,922; Pennsylvania, 586,085; but that number has been increased by reason of the fact that the figures that I have read are from the Census of 1910, and since that time immigration has increased by over 3,000,000. Therefore it is safe to assume that there are nearly 7,000,000 women of foreign birth in this country. I ask to have the letter which I hold in my hand from the Department of Labor giving these statistics inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, September 24, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 23d instant requesting certain data regarding alien women in the United States, and will reply to your inquiries seriatim.

1. Table 15, page 259, volume 1, of the Census Report of 1910, gives the number of foreign-birth white women in the United States as 5,821,757, divided as follows:

New England:
Maine	52,165
New Hampshire	45,890
Vermont	21,939
Massachusetts	526,922
Rhode Island	87,442
Connecticut	151,691
Middle Atlantic:
New York	1,296,849
New Jersey	301,652
Pennsylvania	586,085
East North Central:
Ohio	251,104
Indiana	62,139
Illinois	528,965
Michigan	261,867
Wisconsin	222,130
West North Central:
Minnesota	222,529
Iowa	116,055
Missouri	97,040
North Dakota	63,528
South Dakota	40,932
Nebraska	74,284
Kansas	54,096

South Atlantic:
Delaware	7,496
Maryland	49,857
District of Columbia	11,434
Virginia	9,900
West Virginia	15,773
North Carolina	2,197
South Carolina	2,335
Georgia	5,554
Florida	13,137
East South Central:
Kentucky	18,442
Tennessee	7,312
Alabama	7,130
Mississippi	3,431
West South Central:
Arkansas	6,302
Louisiana	22,139
Oklahoma	14,414
Texas	103,162
Mountain:
Montana	27,084
Idaho	12,345
Wyoming	7,003
Colorado	48,777
New Mexico	7,822
Arizona	16,238
Utah	27,447
Nevada	4,172
Pacific:
Washington	80,476
Oregon	33,241
California	191,833

2 and 3. Section 1994 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows:

"Any woman who is now or may hereafter be married to a citizen of the United States and who might herself be lawfully naturalized shall be deemed a citizen."

Section 4 of the act approved March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 1228), which is merely declaratory of section 1994, Revised Statutes, provides as follows:

"That any foreign woman who acquires American citizenship by marriage to an American shall be assumed to retain the same after the termination of the marital relation if she continues to reside in the United States, unless she makes formal renunciation thereof before a court having jurisdiction to naturalize aliens, or if she resides abroad she may retain her citizenship by registering as such before a United States consul within one year after the termination of such marital relation."

4. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution defines those who shall be deemed citizens by virtue of their birth. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution gives Congress power "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, * * *." The various provisions of law under this authority will be found in the Revised Statutes.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN W. ABERCROMBIE,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. J. S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it will be seen from the foregoing that we already have here a very large number of foreign-born women. Of course, many of these are illiterate, many have had no educational advantages. Another fact that should not be overlooked is this: The tendency to enter into marital relations is marked among these immigrant races. Of course, we know little or nothing about the loyalty and the real allegiance of these women and less about their character; many of them may be anarchists, nihilists, polygamists, yet these women may, simply through the performance of a marriage ceremony, become citizens of the United States.

Is it not essential that we should write in the Constitution a provision which will enable Congress to pass legislation that will restrict the menace arising from this condition? I do not think the amendment as drawn does this, and I believe that Congress should take the precaution to lay the foundation for protecting the country in this regard. After consultation with the legal advisers of the Immigration and Naturalization Bureaus I am firmly of the opinion that if the amendment should be adopted as drawn it will not be possible thereafter for Congress to remedy the situation described by me by passing legislation. In other words, the constitutional amendment, unless it shall be changed in some such manner as that I suggest, will prevent the passing of any legislation to place any restriction with regard to the exercise of the franchise upon foreign women who have become citizens by marriage.

This citizenship-by-marriage provision was enacted by the Federal Congress when women could not vote and at a time when Congress had no thought of giving them the vote, its object being to protect property and dower rights and to care for many legal and international questions. To accomplish these purposes Congress conferred the benefit of such citizenship upon such women. Now women are asking for the additional benefit of the right of suffrage—too long denied them—but a changed situation is created, which Congress should carefully consider before passing a constitutional amendment. The view has been expressed by some lawyers that Congress could afford protection to the elective franchise under this constitutional amendment by hereafter passing statutes naturalizing foreign women married to citizens and worthy of the privilege of voting. Possibly a statute could be passed that hereafter would protect the electorate and compel married women who have become citizens by marriage to be naturalized in a court proceeding before they vote, but I do not believe it.

To hold that it can is tantamount to holding that the Congress can by statute compel a woman who has already been naturalized by marriage and who has by that process of naturalization become as full a citizen as though born here, to go through another process of naturalization, the court process, before she will be allowed to vote, notwithstanding a provision in the Constitution prohibiting the United States or the several States from denying or abridging on account of sex the right of a citizen to vote. No law will or can be passed hereafter in that regard that will protect the electorate against the unworthy or unqualified women who are given this right under this constitutional amendment unless you lay the foundation in the amendment itself by the use of words that will confer upon Congress the power to do so.

Perhaps it might be thought that the second section of the article of the amendment proposed in the resolution, providing that the Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce the provisions of the article, would lay a sufficient foundation for subsequent legislation dealing with the subject I am discussing. But I think that, obviously, such is not the case. The purpose of the second section of this proposed article of amendment is exactly the same as the purpose of section 2 of Article XIII, section 5 of Article XIV, and section 2 of Article XV of the Constitution. Its purpose is to indicate which of the three branches into which our Government is divided is to be charged under the Constitution with the enforcement of the particular article; and it confers a power to enforce—that is, carry out, not a power to modify, regulate, abbreviate, or extend. If it conferred a power of the latter character it would, moreover, be absolutely inconsistent with the first section of the proposed article of amendment.

I contend that under this amendment providing that the right to vote shall not be abridged or denied on account of sex, the right being conferred when this constitutional amendment is ratified by the States, such right having been created through marriage—which marriage relation is possible because of sex—the moment you attempt to compel these women to go through any additional requirements before they exercise the franchise, you will be doing the very thing the amendment prohibits, because you will be abridging the right of a female citizen to vote. Any such statute, if passed, would be unconstitutional. Of course, I do not contend that Congress can not at any time, under the authority conferred upon it by the Constitution to pass uniform naturalization laws, either amend or repeal section 1994 of the Revised Statutes. The power of Congress in this regard is no doubt plenary. This fact might naturally lead some to ask the question, "Why attempt to cover this point in a constitutional amendment? Why not leave it to Congress to repeal the statute lying at the foundation of the difficulty?" But to such a question there are two sufficient answers.

In the first place, section 1994, although a statute and therefore open to repeal or revision, is simply declaratory of a principle of law that is almost universally recognized and runs infinitely into important legal questions of both a local and an international nature. It is not likely, therefore, that Congress will ever go so far in amending and extending the naturalization laws as to abandon this principle. And just so long as citizenship can be acquired by women through the performance of a marriage ceremony will there exist the inequalities and evils to which attention has been called.

In the second place, by such a constitutional provision as that proposed by me, the past as well as the future can be cared for. There are, of course, now in the United States a great many women, formerly foreigners, who have acquired citizenship through marriage. It may be seriously doubted that Congress could legally divest these women of the citizenship already acquired in that manner. The Supreme Court has said, in the Wong Kim Ark decision, already mentioned, that "the power of naturalization vested in Congress by the Constitution is a power to confer citizenship, not a power to take it away." But wholly aside from this legal doubt, it would hardly be fair and just to pass a law changing the status of these women from that of citizenship to that of alienage—certainly it would not be just or fair in many of their cases. On the other hand, no unfairness or injustice—and nothing in any sense illegal—is involved in so qualifying the conferrence of a constitutional right to vote as to make it possible for Congress hereafter to enact legislation requiring those whose citizenship arises merely from marriage to meet, in every substantial respect, before they will be allowed to exercise the right of suffrage, the conditions that males and unmarried females are required to meet before citizenship is conferred upon them.

Accordingly, the purpose I have in mind in inserting in my proposed amendment the provision that "no female person who is not such a citizen otherwise than by marriage, or who, having acquired citizenship by marriage, has not complied with such requirements and conditions as may be prescribed by Congress, shall exercise such right" is to pave the way for the passage through Congress, in the event that the constitutional amendment should be adopted, of a law which would compel foreign women who acquire citizenship in the instantaneous and unregulated manner of going through a marriage ceremony to meet conditions and requirements similar to those now governing the conferrence of citizenship through court processes before they would be permitted to stand alongside men and women born here and men and women born abroad and naturalized here in the regular safeguarded manner and cast votes having the same effect in determining the course of government as the votes cast by the native-born and regularly naturalized citizens.

I repeat, Mr. President, I am in favor of adopting a constitutional amendment which will bring about equality between men and women citizens in the matter of the vote; but I am also in favor of so wording such amendment that we will not perpetuate and increase already existing evils and create new inequalities that could not hereafter be rectified otherwise than by the slow and uncertain method of adopting still another constitutional amendment.

I ask to append to my remarks, without reading, a statement showing citizenship qualifications for voting in woman-suffrage States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

CITIZENSHIP QUALIFICATIONS FOR VOTING IN WOMAN-SUFFRAGE STATES.

FULL SUFFRAGE.

Arizona: Citizens only. (Const., VII–2.)
California: Citizens only. Naturalized citizens must have been admitted to citizenship 90 days prior to the election. (Const., II–1.)
Colorado: Citizens only. (Const., VII–1.) "The same qualifications as to * * * citizenship * * * required by law to entitle male persons to vote shall be required to entitled female persons to vote." (Courtright's Stat., 1911, §2147.)
Idaho: Citizens only. (Const., VI–2.)
Kansas: Citizens and persons who have declared their intention to become citizens. (Const., V–1.) An amendment has been submitted to be voted on at the 1918 election limiting the right to vote to citizens of the United States. (Laws, 1917, c. 353.)
Montana: Citizens only. (Const., IX–2.)
Nevada: Citizens only. (Const., II–1.)
New York: Citizens only. Must have been a citizen for 90 days. A citizen by marriage must have been an inhabitant of the United States for 5 years. (Const. amend., Laws, 1917, p. 2784.)
Oregon (a senate joint memorial [Laws, 1917, p. 975] has been submitted to Congress requesting "that equal qualifications be required of and equal privileges granted to each individual voter, irrespective of sex or the marriage relation in the States adopting woman suffrage"): Citizens only. (Const., II–2.)
Utah: Citizens only. (Const., IV–5.)
Washington: Citizens only. (Const., VI–1.)
Wyoming: Citizens only. (Const., VI–5.)

LIMITED SUFFRAGE.

Illinois: Citizens only. (Const., VII–1; Laws, 1913, p. 333.)
Michigan: Citizens only. (Const., III–1; Laws, 1917, No. 191.)
Nebraska: Citizens and persons who have declared their intention to become citizens at least 30 days prior to election. (Const., VII–1; Laws, 1917, c. 30.)
North Dakota: Citizens only. (Const., V–121; Laws, 1917, c. 254.)
Rhode Island: Citizens only. (Const. amend., VII; Laws, 1917, c. 1507.)

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, without entering into a discussion of the merits of the question, I wish to say in reply to the argument of the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota if it will be just as agreeable to him to proceed to-morrow?

Mr. NELSON. I shall not occupy over five minutes. I wish to say to the Senator from New Jersey in brief that I am opposed to his amendment for two reasons: In the first place, to amend the joint resolution now would necessitate its going back to the House of Representatives and being concurred in there. In the next place, the relief he seeks by an amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment is in the power of Congress to grant without such action. Congress is given full jurisdiction over the naturalization of foreigners, and Congress can at any time pass a law preventing foreign-born women who marry American citizens from becoming citizens by their marriage. Congress also has the right to prescribe who are qualified to vote for President, electors, and Members of Congress; there is no doubt about that. Therefore no constitutional amendment is needed at all on these subjects, for Congress has plenary power without it, and I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent—and I do so with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—that the Committee on Appropriations be relieved from the further consideration of House joint resolution 334, which is a continuing resolution taking care of the objects intended to be provided for by the special food-production bill which is in conference. I may state that the conferees have agreed upon everything except the rent amendment, on which they have reached a disagreement; but, as this is the last day of the month, it is thought necessary to pass a continuing resolution. As I understand, it relates only to the special food-production bill, and will provide for the activities intended to be provided for by that bill to go forward without interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma, that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of House joint resolution 334? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the House joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House joint resolution named by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 334) making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government for the month of October, 1918, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the months of July and August, 1918, and for other purposes," approved July 8, 1918, except so far as they relate to the support of the Army and of the District of Columbia, are extended and continued in full force and effect for and during the month of October, 1918.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 1, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 30, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Clerk of the House.

The CLERK OF THE HOUSE. The reading clerk will read a communication from the Speaker designating a Speaker pro tempore.

The reading clerk read as follows:

SEPTEMBER 30.

Hon. SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House:

Because I am to assist in conducting draft lottery, I assign the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FOSTER, to act as Speaker for this day.

CHAMP CLARK, Speaker.

Mr. FOSTER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, our Heavenly Father, that the President of the United States, in a recent speech, voiced the sentiment of the American people in pure English and clear-cut sentences, which those who run may read our purpose for entering the war and the object for which we seek, liberty and justice for all men and for all nations.

Grant that the plan he suggests in a league of nations may obtain and a permanent peace be established upon the principles enunciated and illustrated in the incomparable life and character of the Prince of Peace; and glory and honor and praise be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the approval of the Journal, and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold the point temporarily.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for an indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. BROWNE, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LITTLE was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. GRIFFIN was granted leave of absense for two days on account of the death of his nephew, J. Harvey Griffin, chief gunner's mate in the United States Navy.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman desire to take up the question of privilege with a quorum not here?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; I think we had better, if the gentleman will withhold his point.

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold the point for five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the record of the last proceedings of Saturday is as follows.

Mr. WALSH. What page?

Mr. WINGO. Page 10924, the last part of the proceedings:

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I was requested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] to ask unanimous consent that the following letters be printed in the RECORD, a letter by Mr. Tumulty and one from W. J. Cochran.

Mr. WALSH. On what topic?

Mr. SIMS. I have not read the letters closely.

Mr. WALSH. I reserve the right to object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, those gentlemen who were present in the House Saturday just before adjournment will remember that the gentleman from Tennessee submitted a request to print letters. If he stated who the writers were, I did not hear it. Of course there was great confusion. There was a conversation between him and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] in which it was disclosed that the gentleman from Tennessee did not know anything about the letters, that he had not read them, and I understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts had objected, that the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Massachusetts were engaged in a private conversation examining the letters, and the impatience of the House was evident, and therefore I made the motion to adjourn. I have no objection to anybody extending remarks in the RECORD by having letters printed, provided they know what the letters are and can tell what they are about and by whom written.

I do not know what the letters are now. I asked the privilege to see the letters, which was denied by their custodian. I do not doubt that the reporters correctly transcribed their notes and did their best in the confusion, but to those who were present it is evident that some things were not heard. I do not object to printing the letters in the RECORD, did not object, and did not move to adjourn until after objection was made, and the two gentlemen named were engaged in a conversation that promised to be interminable and unsatisfactory.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask that the Speaker lay before the House the water-power bill, so that I can move to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate and have the conferees appointed. That is all I ask that for.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the water-power bill——

Mr. SIMS. Senate 1419——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object after I have propounded a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair—I should like to know, if I may make the parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, just exactly what situation we are going to be in if we proceed with the transaction of business before the approval of the Journal of Saturday? That will bring about another Journal of to-day with other business. We have not transacted any business so far, but the appointment of conferees upon any measure will be a transaction of business. I submit that inquiry in order to prevent confusion later, if possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, without looking up the matter, is inclined to think that the Journal ought first to be approved.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think there is no question about that.

Mr. SIMS. I am only asking for unanimous consent in order to expedite these matters along.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is business.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That does not change the necessity of keeping a Journal for to-day's transactions.

Mr. SIMS. There is no objection to this——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But that does not avoid the necessity for the Journal Clerk to keep the Journal of to-day's proceedings.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Journal of the last day's proceedings must be approved before we begin with the Journal of another day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to state that in his opinion the first order of business is the approval of the Journal.

Mr. SIMS. That is all I am asking.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the approval of the Journal.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object; and I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 51.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] for a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Elston	Kitchin	Saunders, Va.
Asweil	Emerson	Kreider	Scott, Iowa
Bacharach	Estopinal	La Follette	Scott, Pa.
Baer	Fairchild, G. W.	LaGuardia	Scully
Barkley	Flood	Larsen	Sells
Bell	Flynn	Lea, Cal.	Shackleford
Beshlin	Fordney	Lesher	Sherwood
Borland	Foss	Linthicum	Shouse
Britten	Francis	Little	Siegel
Brodbeck	Freeman	London	Slayden
Browne	Fuller, Ill.	Lufkin	Slemp
Browning	Fuller, Mass.	Lundeen	Smith, T. F.
Buchanan	Gallivan	McClintic	Snell
Butler	Gard	McCormick	Snyder
Byrnes, S. C.	Garner	McKenzie	Stafford
Byrns, Tenn.	Glass	McKinley	Steele
Caldwell	Glynn	McLaughlin, Pa.	Steenerson
Candler, Miss.	Godwin, N. C.	Maher	Stephens, Miss.
Cantrill	Goodall	Mann	Stephens, Nebr.
Caraway	Goodwin, Ark.	Martin	Sterling, Ill.
Carew	Gould	Mason	Sterling, Pa.
Carlin	Graham, Ill.	Mays	Stiness
Chandler, Okla.	Graham, Pa.	Meeker	Sullivan
Church	Gray, N. J.	Merritt	Sweet
Clark, Pa.	Greene, Mass.	Miller, Minn.	Swift
Classon	Griest	Montague	Switzer
Connally, Tex.	Griffin	Moore, Pa.	Tague
Cooper, Ohio	Hamill	Morin	Talbott
Cooper, W. Va.	Hamilton, N. Y.	Mott	Templeton
Cooper, Wis.	Harrison, Miss.	Nolan	Thomas
Copley	Haskell	Oliver, N. Y.	Thompson
Costello	Hayes	Olney	Tillman
Crago	Heaton	O'Shaunessy	Tilson
Cramton	Heflin	Paige	Tinkham
Crosser	Heintz	Parker, N. Y.	Treadway
Currie, Mich.	Hensley	Peters	Van Dyke
Curry, Cal.	Hicks	Phelan	Vare
Dale, N. Y.	Hollingsworth	Platt	Venable
Darrow	Hood	Porter	Vinson
Davis	Howard	Powers	Walton
Delaney	Hull, Iowa	Pratt	Ward
Dempsey	Humphreys	Price	Watson, Pa.
Dewalt	Husted	Purnell	Weaver
Dickinson	Hutchinson	Rainey, J. W.	Welling
Dies	Johnson, S. Dak.	Randall	Whaley
Dill	Johnson, Wash.	Rankin	White, Me.
Dixon	Jones	Riordan	White, Ohio
Donovan	Kearns	Robbins	Wilson, Ill.
Dooling	Kelley, Mich.	Robinson	Wilson, Tex.
Doremus	Kelly, Pa.	Rose	Winslow
Drukker	Kennedy, R. I.	Rowe	Wise
Dyer	Kettner	Rowland	Woodyard
Edmonds	Key, Ohio	Sanders, La.	Young, N. Dak.
Ellsworth	Kiess, Pa.	Sanford

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair announces that 190 Members have answered to their names—not a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, if there is any hope of having a quorum by making further efforts and waiting, we will be very glad to do it. Of course, I do not know.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. It seems that we have not got quite a quorum from what I have heard. Is it in order to take a recess during a portion of to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The only thing that can be done under the circumstances is to take such action as is necessary to secure a quorum or adjourn.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as no doubt a number of Members have gone away for the purpose of making liberty-loan speeches, and with no thought of obstructive tactics, and especially not even permitting the Journal to be read, I do not feel at the present time like asking for their arrest, and, therefore, I move an adjournment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. NORTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The noes have it, and the House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. NORTON. I withdraw my request.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A division was requested, I understood, on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from North Dakota to withdraw his request.

Mr. NORTON. I withdrew the request.

Mr. SIMS. Did the Chair declare the motion was not carried?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I renew the request for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 34.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that 38 Members had arisen, a sufficient number.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order. If I understood the announcement correctly, there were only 38 Members who rose?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. It requires 44, does it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One-fifth of those present.

Mr. HAMLIN. I raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the Chair is in error. If the Chair will consult the rule, he will find it takes one-fifth of a quorum—not of those present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that probably the gentleman from Missouri has in mind the ordering of tellers, which requires 20 in Committee of the Whole and one-fifth in the House—one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I ask for the other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-two gentlemen have risen; 38 is a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are ordered. The Clerk will call the roll. Those who favor the motion to adjourn will, when their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 73, nays 130, answered "present" 1, not voting 227, as follows:

YEAS—73.

Almon	Eagan	Kraus	Rucker
Bankhead	Esch	Lobeck	Sanders, N. Y.
Barnhart	Ferris	Lonergan	Schall
Black	Fess	Longworth	Sears
Bland, Va.	Fisher	Lunn	Sims
Bowers	Garland	McArthur	Stevenson
Brand	Garrett, Tenn.	McFadden	Strong
Burroughs	Gillett	Madden	Sumners
Campbell, Pa.	Green, Iowa	Mansfield	Temple
Candler, Miss.	Greene, Vt.	Mudd	Waldow
Cannon	Hamlin	Neely	Walker
Clark, Fla.	Hardy	Nicholls, S. C.	Walsh
Cleary	Hayden	Oldfield	Watkins
Coady	Helvering	Overstreet	Watson, Va.
Cox	Holland	Parker, N. J.	Wilson, La.
Dent	Houston	Pou	Young, Tex.
Denton	Huddleston	Ramsey
Dominick	Hull, Tenn.	Rayburn
Dunn	Kincheloe	Rouse

NAYS—130.

Alexander	Beakes	Blanton	Campbell, Kans.
Anderson	Blackmon	Brumbaugh	Carter, Mass.
Austin	Bland, Ind.	Burnett	Carter, Okla.
Cary	Hamilton, Mich.	Magee	Scott, Mich.
Claypool	Harrison, Va.	Mapes	Shallenberger
Collier	Hastings	Miller, Wash.	Sherley
Connelly, Kans.	Haugen	Mondell	Sinnott
Dale, Vt.	Hawley	Moon	Sisson
Dallinger	Helm	Moores, Ind.	Sloan
Decker	Hersey	Morgan	Small
Denison	Hull, Iowa	Nichols, Mich.	Smith, Idaho
Dillon	Igoe	Norton	Smith, Mich.
Doolittle	Jacoway	Oliver, Ala.	Smith, C. B.
Doughton	James	Osborne	Snook
Dowell	Johnson, Ky.	Overmyer	Steagall
Dupré	Juul	Padgett	Stedman
Eagle	Kahn	Park	Taylor, Ark.
Elliott	Keating	Polk	Taylor, Colo.
Evans	Kehoe	Quin	Timberlake
Fairchild, B. L.	Kennedy, Iowa	Ragsdale	Towner
Fairfield	King	Rainey, H. T.	Vestal
Fields	Kinkaid	Raker	Voigt
Focht	Knutson	Ramseyer	Volstead
Foster	Langley	Reavis	Webb
Frear	Lazaro	Reed	Wheeler
French	Lehlbach	Roberts	Williams
Gallagher	Lever	Rodenberg	Wingo
Gandy	Littlepage	Rogers	Woods, Iowa
Garrett, Tex.	McAndrews	Romjue	Wright
Good	McCulloch	Rubey	Zihlman
Gordon	McKeown	Russell	The Speaker
Gray, Ala.	McLaughlin, Mich.	Sabath
Hadley	McLemore	Sanders, Ind.

ANSWERED "PRESENT"—1.

Ireland

NOT VOTING—227.

Anthony	Edmonds	Kiess, Pa.	Saunders, Va.
Ashbrook	Ellsworth	Kitchin	Scott, Iowa
Aswell	Elston	Kreider	Scott, Pa.
Ayres	Emerson	La Follette	Scully
Bacharach	Estopinal	LaGuardia	Sells
Baer	Fairchild, G. W.	Larsen	Shackleford
Barkley	Farr	Lea, Cal.	Sherwood
Bell	Flood	Lee, Ga.	Shouse
Beshlin	Flynn	Lesher	Siegel
Booher	Fordney	Linthicum	Slayden
Borland	Foss	Little	Slemp
Britten	Francis	London	Smith, T. F.
Brodbeck	Freeman	Lufkin	Snell
Browne	Fuller, Ill.	Lundeen	Snyder
Browning	Fuller, Mass.	McClintic	Stafford
Buchanan	Gallivan	McCormick	Steele
Butler	Gard	McKenzie	Steenerson
Byrnes, S. C.	Garner	McKinley	Stephens, Miss.
Byrns, Tenn.	Glass	McLaughlin, Pa.	Stephens, Nebr.
Caldwell	Glynn	Maher	Sterling, Ill.
Cantrill	Godwin, N. C.	Mann	Sterling, Pa.
Caraway	Goodall	Martin	Stiness
Carew	Goodwin, Ark.	Mason	Sullivan
Carlin	Gould	Mays	Sweet
Chandler, N. Y.	Graham, Ill.	Meeker	Swift
Chandler, Okla.	Graham, Pa.	Merritt	Switzer
Church	Gray, N. J.	Miller, Minn.	Tague
Clark, Pa.	Greene, Mass.	Montague	Talbott
Classon	Gregg	Moore, Pa.	Templeton
Connally, Tex.	Griest	Morin	Thomas
Cooper, Ohio	Griffin	Mott	Thompson
Cooper, W. Va.	Hamill	Nelson	Tillman
Cooper, Wis.	Hamilton, N. Y.	Nolan	Tilson
Copley	Harrison, Miss.	Oliver, N. Y.	Tinkham
Costello	Haskell	Olney	Treadway
Crago	Hayes	O'Shaunessy	Van Dyke
Cramton	Heaton	Paige	Vare
Crisp	Heflin	Parker, N. Y.	Venable
Crosser	Heintz	Peters	Vinson
Currie, Mich.	Hensley	Phelan	Walton
Curry, Cal.	Hicks	Platt	Ward
Dale, N. Y.	Hilliard	Porter	Wason
Darrow	Hollingsworth	Powers	Watson, Pa.
Davis	Hood	Pratt	Weaver
Delaney	Howard	Price	Welling
Dempsey	Humphreys	Purnell	Welty
Dewalt	Husted	Rainey, J. W.	Whaley
Dickinson	Hutchinson	Randall	White, Me.
Dies	Johnson, S. Dak.	Rankin	White, Ohio
Dill	Johnson, Wash.	Riordan	Wilson, Ill.
Dixon	Jones	Robbins	Wilson, Tex.
Donovan	Kearns	Robinson	Winslow
Dooling	Kelley, Mich.	Rose	Wise
Doremus	Kelly, Pa.	Rowe	Wood, Ind.
Drane	Kennedy, R. I.	Rowland	Woodyard
Drukker	Kettner	Sanders, La.	Young, N. Dak.
Dyer	Key, Ohio	Sanford

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Nay."

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana with Mr. COOPER of West Virginia.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma.

Mr. HUMPHREYS with Mr. WHITE of Maine.

Mr. KETTNER with Mr. IRELAND.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas with Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.

Mr. VAN DYKE with Mr. PURNELL.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. FOSS.

Mr. OLIVER of New York with Mr. SWITZER.

Mr. TAGUE with Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. BROWNING.

Mr. SULLIVAN with Mr. TINKHAM.

Mr. STEELE with Mr. BUTLER.
Mr. SLAYDEN with Mr. HAYES.
Mr. HOWARD with Mr. PAIGE.
Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina with Mr. ELSTON.
Mr. MCCLINTIC with Mr. HEATON.
Mr. DICKINSON with Mr. DYER.
Mr. GALLIVAN with Mr. GOULD.
Mr. ASWELL with Mr. FARR.
Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. DARROW.
Mr. DOOLING with Mr. PETERS.
Mr. THOMAS with Mr. WINSLOW.
Mr. MAHER with Mr. ROWE.
Mr. SHERWOOD with Mr. SWIFT.
Mr. DONOVAN with Mr. LUFKIN.
Mr. LEA of California with Mr. MCKINLEY.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee with Mr. STEENERSON.
Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina with Mr. ANTHONY.
Mr. MONTAGUE with Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota.
Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska with Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania.
Mr. BELL with Mr. SNYDER.
Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH with Mr. TREADWAY.
Mr. CAREW with Mr. BACHARACH.
Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois.
Mr. HAMILL with Mr. GRIEST.
Mr. SCULLY with Mr. BROWNE.
Mr. TILLMAN with Mr. ELLSWORTH.
Mr. WHALEY with Mr. PARKER of New York.
Mr. DALE of New York with Mr. BRITTEN.
Mr. VINSON with Mr. MOTT.
Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. STINESS.
Mr. LINTHICUM with Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its Members as are now absent without leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a second or a minute?

Mr. SIMS. I can not yield the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I do not ask the gentleman to yield the floor. Eighteen or twenty short of a quorum are shown to the motion to adjourn. I have no objection to the resolution passing, but it seems to me there is no doubt that as a quorum is demanded and the news goes by telegraph the movement of Members will set this way. That was the reason I voted against the motion to adjourn. I have no objection. We have not come to the issuing of warrants, have we? What does the resolution provide?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the resolution. It is not debatable.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. REAVIS. To ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You can not get unanimous consent in the absence of a quroum.

Mr. REAVIS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No unanimous consent can be given, and nothing can be done except to adjourn or to secure the attendance of a quorum. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. REAVIS), there were—ayes 44, noes 13.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. Did the gentleman who has just come in vote on the last roll call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He did not.

Mr. GILLETT. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should be recorded as present——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be recorded as present under the call of the House, but he can not vote on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no question in the world that when Members come in they should be recorded as present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so holds.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course they ought to be recorded as present, but it did not require a quorum on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask how many we lack of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The clerks are counting to ascertain. The clerks will record as present the names of the following Members who answered on the roll call for adjournment but have not answered on the call of the House: Messrs. BURROUGHS, CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, CARTER of Massachusetts, CARY, CLARK of Florida, DUPRÉ, FAIRFIELD, GARLAND, HAUGEN, LEVER, LITTLEPAGE, LONGWORTH, MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, MUDD, RAGSDALE, ROBBINS, RUSSELL, CHARLES B. SMITH, VOIGT, and WEBB.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Were the names just read the names of those who answered on the roll call on the motion to adjourn who had not previously answered on the call of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to learn just exactly what has been done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is perfectly right in making the inquiry. A motion was made and carried for a call of the House. The roll was called. One hundred and ninety Members answered to their names. Then the motion was made that the House adjourn. The yeas and nays were ordered on that motion, and on the vote by yeas and nays the House refused to adjourn. There were certain Members who voted on the motion to adjourn who did not answer present on the call of the House, so the Chair directs that those Members be marked present on the call of the House, because they have been here and have answered to their names. The Chair thinks that is the only way that the presence of a quorum can be ascertained.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. As I understand, we have ordered the Sergeant at Arms to bring in absent Members, and we are now proceeding under that original call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly. That has not yet been dispensed with.

Mr. GILLETT. So that anybody who comes in is recorded on that roll, and therefore by the same logic those who voted on the motion to adjourn ought to be recorded on that call also.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly. They are entitled to be recorded on the call of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think it may be further added that the gentlemen who answered when their names were called on the motion to adjourn are presumed to have been present but failing to answer on the call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct, and the Chair understands this is the only way in which the presence of a quorum could be ascertained. These gentlemen have come in voluntarily and answered to their names. Two hundred and sixteen Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Without objection, the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday will be approved as read.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCCLINTIC, indefinitely, on account of illness; and

To Mr. SLAYDEN, indefinitely (at the request of Mr. GREGG), on account of the death of Mr. SLAYDEN's brother.

IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF WATERWAYS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that S. 1419, the water-power bill, be laid before the House for the purpose of agreeing to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table S. 1419 and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield? That is a peace bill?

Mr. SIMS. Why, certainly, it is a peace bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman acknowledges it. We are all for war propositions.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman will not oppose the appointing of these conferees, I suppose?

Mr. CANNON. I think the best way to dispose of it is to wait until after the war closes, being peace legislation covering the whole country, very important under normal conditions. I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Speaker pro tempore will announce the conferees.

There was no objection; and the Speaker pro tempore announced as conferees on the part of the House Messrs. SIMS, FERRIS, LEVER, ESCH, SINNOTT, and HAUGEN.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order of the House for the arrest of absent Members be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the order of the House for the arrest of absent Members be vacated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House——

Mr. WALSH. It needs no motion. The House goes into Committee of the Whole automatically.

Mr. SIMS. That is a fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, was the Journal approved without a motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was.

Mr. CANNON. I think, if the rule is examined, it is only when the Committee of the Whole finds itself without a quorum and rises that it goes into Committee of the Whole automatically.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker of the House has held that under this rule the House goes into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union automatically.

Mr. CANNON. The House goes into Committee of the Whole automatically when it finds itself without a quorum, and rises when a quorum is obtained. We have not been in Committee of the Whole yet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois misunderstands. This bill is being considered under a special rule which carries it into Committee of the Whole automatically.

Mr. CANNON. Let me read the rule. [After reading the rule.] I do not think that claim can be sustained. Is it claimed that after the House adjourns once, the very moment the Journal is read, in we go into Committee of the Whole? The gentleman has just had conferees appointed and the Speaker has signed bills. This does not change the general rule of the House. I think it takes a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole under this rule. The effect of this rule is not to change the general rule of the House so far as going into Committee of the Whole is concerned. If we get into Committee of the Whole and a point of no quorum is made, and the committee rises, and if a quorum is developed, then we go back automatically into Committee of the Whole. But that is not this case.

Mr. SIMS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Speaker of the House himself has held two or three times that the House went automatically into Committee of the Whole. Nobody made any point about it, and therefore I did not examine the rule.

Mr. CANNON. After the House has adjourned and a new session comes in——

Mr. SIMS. That is just what happened.

Mr. CANNON. We go automatically into Committee of the Whole, although a conference report might be pending?

Mr. SIMS. The Speaker has announced that that is the course under the rule we are acting under.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think the Speaker's attention was called to it. In my judgment this does not change the general rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last—I have not looked any further back than that—the House went into Committee of the Whole House by motion and not automatically; whether it was announced on the date prior to that I do not know, but I wish to say, because I think a correct ruling is important, that I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Unless the rule had in it the words that it is simply a continuing order—that is, be the order of business until concluded—my construction of that is that it makes it in order to consider the bill under the general rule on the same status as an appropriation bill or a revenue bill would have under the general rule; that it is necessary under that rule to go into Committee of the Whole by motion. We do sometimes bring in a rule saying that it shall be a continuing order. If this is a continuing order the House goes into committee automatically, but without that it is under the general rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to hold——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker ruled on Friday that the House went into Committee of the Whole automatically.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The recollection of the Chair was that on Saturday the gentleman from Tennessee moved to go into Committee of the Whole, and the statement was made by the Chair that in his judgment, under the ruling of the Speaker, the House went into Committee of the Whole automatically; yet the RECORD shows that it was by motion.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the RECORD will be examined. It is exceedingly embarrassing, and I do not believe the Speaker of the House would have made the ruling if his attention had been called to the rule. What position does it leave us in? From the moment after the reading of the Journal until the bill was concluded nothing could be done if the House jumped into Committee of the Whole automatically. There was business transacted this morning, conferees were appointed, and I call attention again to the signing of bills necessary to be signed by the Speaker and reported to the House. That was not done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the Chair allow me a moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. As I read this rule I can not see that it literally gives this bill any privilege after the first day. Whatever may have been its purpose it simply says "immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union." That, of course, applied simply to that date. Then it goes on and says that at the conclusion of general debate upon the bill, and so forth; but it does not say it shall have a privilege after the first day. It does not say we should go into Committee of the Whole——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, the rule provides, and it is a fair construction, I would submit, for the completion of the bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It does not limit it to a single day. That is the usual regular form the Committee on Rules has worked on ever since I have been a member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This rule provides that this bill shall be considered and completed in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair does not understand that as a sensible thing the House would require the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to sit continuously until this bill was finally completed, but now it is simply provided, without further provision in reference to the consideration, and the rule says it shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and completed. Now, the Chair thinks that the House, when it got to the rule, did not believe we could finish it in one day. So the Chair believes that would be the sensible view to take, that the House should consider it that day, and after adjournment for that day the next day should go on, and so forth, until completed.

Mr. GILLETT. I am inclined to agree with the Chair that would be a sensible interpretation, if you can make it, and I would be very glad to have it stretched or strained for that purpose, because, I confess, I do believe that is what the Committee on Rules and the House meant. If it has been the custom to adopt a rule in that form I should gladly acquiesce in such a ruling, although personally my recollection was that when such rules come from the Committee on Rules they provide ordinarily that there should be a continuing order or something to that effect.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; if the gentleman will permit. We only use that language when we desire to make it to exclude all other business, but really it is very seldom that we bring in a rule of that sort. I do not recall we brought in one during this Congress. I believe in one or two instances it was done in the last Congress when that was intended to make it the exclusive business. That was the argument I made a moment ago in attempting the explanation of the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. When we use that language we make it exclusive of everything.

Mr. GILLETT. I entirely agree on that proposition. It is clear we should not go into it automatically.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is the language we should use where we desire to make it exclusive.

Mr. GILLETT. If the precedents show that, I think it would be a sensible interpretation, and I do not——

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, what is the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question of order here.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair is inclined to permit discussion of the point of order, I should like to submit a few observations; it would seem to me the only effect of this rule is to say that it shall be in order to make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union each day until this bill is completed, and that if the motion is voted down the House does not have to consider this measure, but it seems to me it is a dangerous construction to put upon a rule with this language, and say that this bill shall be a continuing order, particularly in view of the absence of these words, and to preclude the House from declining to discuss this measure on any particular morning. Now, upon Saturday the question of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was submitted and the House voted upon it. Upon Friday the Speaker ruled that it was automatic, and it would seem to me that if we are going to interpret this rule in the same manner as we would when it contained the language, "to be a continuing order," that we are establishing a precedent which absolves the Committee on Rules hereafter from using the words "continuing order." Now, of course, there will be no vote against going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I submit that the proper construction of this rule is to hold that it only shall be in order each day to move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union until the consideration of this measure has been completed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I only want to give the facts: On the 27th—it does not appear in the RECORD—I did rise and address the Chair to make the motion, and the Speaker announced that the House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration, giving the name, and so forth, of the bill. The next day, Saturday, after quite a lot of business that had been considered with reference to the resolution appropriating $1,000,000 I arose to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, but not remembering the fact that the Speaker had so held on a previous day I moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WALSH. And the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Yes. But the Speaker, I would like to say, on that morning was the Speaker pro tempore and was not Speaker CLARK; and very likely his attention had not been called to the ruling of the Speaker, and when the gentleman from Indiana wanted unanimous consent for five minutes I said that I insisted on my motion, and that the gentleman could put in his telegram later, and then the Speaker pro tempore put the motion, and it was agreed to. Speaker CLARK was not in the chair and I do not know that the attention of the Speaker pro tempore was ever called to the ruling of Speaker CLARK.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman realizes that if the Speaker should have ruled that the resolving of the House into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was automatic, and no exception was taken to it, that it clearly would not establish a precedent and bind the House if the attention of the Chair is directed to the language of this rule.

Mr. SIMS. It is a construction of the rule as to this particular bill.

Mr. WALSH. It was not a construction of the rule, because the rule was not specifically brought to the Speaker's attention.

Mr. SIMS. It was brought to the attention of the regular Speaker, because I made the motion and he held it was not necessary.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but he took the rule as it was before him, and there was no objection to it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, on Friday morning the gentleman from Tennessee made a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole, and the Speaker turned to the Clerk and got the rule and read it, and the Speaker of the House specifically passed upon this question. It was not argued. The only way it was raised was that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] made the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Speaker then took the rule and read it and made the announcement, which was that it was automatic.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes, sir; if I have the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Arkansas contend that a rule phrased as this is would have the same effect and be construed exactly the same as the rule containing the words "and shall be a continuing order"?

Mr. WINGO. I think the way to construe the rule is to find out what was intended at the time it was adopted. There are two classes of rules. One says that it shall be in order on the adoption of the rule to move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and there is another class that says that automatically on the adoption of the rule the House shall go into the Committee of the Whole, and in this instance the rule provided that on the adoption of the rule the House should go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a certain bill. The rule further provided that after the bill had been completed in the Committee of the Whole it should then be reported to the House.

Mr. WALSH. That does not have to be in the rule.

Mr. WINGO. It went further and provided that the previous question should be considered as ordered. In other words, the rule is a comprehensive rule, providing for the immediate and uninterrupted consideration of that bill from the moment it goes into the Committee of the Whole up until the moment that the previous question is ordered in the House. I submit that the rule does more than to have a consideration of the bill for one day, which would be the only logical conclusion if you followed the logic of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SIMS. I am very anxious to proceed with the consideration of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is not present. I was going to ask him to withdraw his point of order, and I would make the motion as I did on Friday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make his motion?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the emergency power bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12776 and——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the Speaker permit me to ask unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think one statement of the Speaker might indicate a ruling adverse to the point of order. I should like to ask unanimous consent, if it meets with the approval of the Speaker, that he have permission to withdraw any words that might amount to a ruling, because I understand the purpose of this is to avoid a ruling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to do that.

The Chair will state that he is not clear on this. His mind is open for argument.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing an analysis of certain votes cast by myself on amendments to certain bills that passed the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to extend his remarks in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. WILSON of Texas, be excused for the balance of the day on account of illness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EMERGENCY POWER BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the emergency power bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12776, with Mr. HOUSTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12776) to provide further for the national security and defense and for the more effective prosecution of the war by furnishing means for the better utilization of the existing sources of electrical and mechanical power and for the development of new sources of such power, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] as an entire substitute for subsection 2 of section 2. I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts wishes to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment pending before the committee is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], which is offered as a substitute for subsection 2 of section 2.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire at the outset, in order to relieve the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] of any fear or apprehension that this amendment is offered for the purpose of obstructing the passage or consideration of this measure, to assure him that it is offered in good faith for the purpose of perfecting this bill and making more clear the powers which we are undertaking to bestow upon the President.

Now, I submit that an amendment framed as is the amendment offered by me provides all the essential elements that it is sought to confer in the language of the bill as printed. We should not attempt to confer upon the President power to make a lease or a contract and then immediately say what the terms of the provisions of that contract ought to be. It seems to me that if we give him the authority to enter into a contract and set forth the length of time which it should run and provide for the manner in which it is to be terminated, we shall have done all that it is necessary to do by way of legislation.

So my amendment provides that the President is authorized under the provisions of the act to install in any existing private power plant any machinery, and so forth, as he may deem necessary to increase the capacity and productivity of such plant, upon such terms and conditions as he shall determine; and then there is a proviso that the agreement or arrangement shall not continue longer than five years after the termination of the war period, and there is a further proviso that within five years after the expiration of the war period the President shall dispose of the title to such property in a manner that will be for the best interests of the United States.

Now, I wish to submit to the chairman of the committee that there is no need of our putting in there any provision to the effect that he can lease the machinery if he prefers, nor is there any need that when the appliances have been installed the title shall remain in the United States. If we are going to authorize the President to do this and carry out the idea contained in section 2, let us give him the authority to go ahead and do it, and let him say what the conditions shall be. Let us only fix the period within which this arrangement can continue. Let us only provide for the termination of the arrangement.

Now, it has often been said here that you have got to trust somebody, and of course you have to trust the person who will be designated by the President to carry out these very comprehensive powers. But the gentlemen who will have charge of this will know what will be needed and they will know what kind of an agreement they can enter into, and they will know enough, I think, to protect the interests of the United States in entering into these agreements and leases; and I submit that the section, even as it has been perfected, is not exactly in the form in which we should legislate upon this particular subject.

Why, we have even got a provision in this section, as the committee reported it, that the President shall have at all times the power to enter upon the premises where this machinery and these plans are to be installed. That should not be a clause in a legislative act. That should be a clause in the lease or in the agreement, and before he should make any lease or agreement he should get the consent of the owners or operators of these plants where he is going to put this machinery that if it is put in there he shall reserve that right for himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I see that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has now risen to his feet, and I desire to direct his attention to one further clause in this section, and that is that he shall be allowed to install and operate these machines for the use of the United States free from any rent or any charge, or take possession of or remove them, or any of them, from the premises.

I submit to the Chairman and to the members of the committee that those provisions ought not to be written into the statute. Let us give the person who will administer this law the authority to require compliance with those terms and provisions, or such other terms as he might wish to make. We are authorizing him to put these machines into existing private plants. We are authorizing him to erect structures which will be extensions or additions to the private plants. That is a very broad power.

Now, then, if we are going to give him that power, can we not let it rest with that same authority, that same administrator, to say under what conditions it shall all be done? He may be able to get more favorable terms than are called for under the terms of the act, and it seems to me, if the gentleman will permit, if he has had an opportunity to study the provisions of my amendment since last Saturday, he would perhaps be impelled to agree that the provisions of the amendment comprehend everything that is included in the section as presented.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. Take the second clause of the gentleman's amendment: "Provided, however, That no contract, lease, or agreement shall be entered into exceeding five years after the termination of the war period." Would the gentleman think that that language might be susceptible to the construction that the Government might go, after actual hostilities had ceased and peace was declared, within a term of five years after the war had actually been concluded—the President could go into the premises?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and he could do it under the bill as reported by the committee. But the term "war period" is one of those illuminating and elucidating definitions that——

Mr. SISSON. "Five years after six months." At any time within that five years whoever might be President, if he saw fit and proper to do so, could go into private property for war purposes and take over a man's plant to make power. I think the gentleman's amendment is subject to the same objection that I had to the language used in the original bill. There ought to be a limitation, so that when the war is actually ended——

Mr. WALSH. No. I will say to the gentleman that as to the point he makes about the President being permitted to enter into an agreement after the five-year period, he is not authorized to do that under my amendment or under the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. The provision is that no such contract or agreement shall be entered into for a term exceeding five years after the war period. That, by implication, means that a contract or agreement shall be entered into before and shall not run beyond.

Mr. SISSON. That ought to be the unquestioned construction to be placed upon the law. But does the gentleman believe that if his amendment is adopted that will clearly be the construction placed upon it?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I am not the strict constructionist that he is and have not had the experience in complex legislation that he as a member of a great committee has had, but it would seem to me that this amendment, taken as a whole—

To install in any existing private power plant such machinery or appliances or to erect such structures as he may deem necessary to increase the capacity or productivity of such plant upon such terms and conditions as he may determine: Provided, however, That no contract, lease, or agreement shall be entered into for a term exceeding five years after the termination of the war period: And provided further, That prior to the expiration of such term the title of the United States to such appliances, machinery, or structures shall be disposed of by the President in such manner as he may determine to be for the best interests of the United States—would be construed to say in effect that you are now authorized to enter into this list of agreements before the termination of the war; but if you do enter into those agreements, the agreement shall not run beyond five years after the termination of the war period, and before the termination of that period you must dispose of the title of the United States to the property for the best interests of the United States.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman's amendment in that regard would be construed exactly the same as the language in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I think so. I think it would be construed just the same as the language which the committee has reported.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, when this amendment was submitted to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts, before it was offered, I gave it such consideration as I could here on the floor of the House in trying to listen to everybody talking at once; but it struck me as including all the powers granted the President that are included in subsection 2 of section 2 as it has been perfected; and if it includes all the powers and all the benefits that may be derived under the section as perfected, being shorter and in fewer words, it seems to me that it is rather to be commended than objected to; but——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I have not quite finished my statement. When a committee has given a bill as thorough consideration as it has this bill, and when numerous amendments have been adopted by the Committee of the Whole itself, I feel great hesitancy in saying right off the bat that I think this is just as good a section as the other for which it is a substitute, and that it embraces all the powers and will accomplish the same purposes as the other. Here is my colleague, the ranking member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who has been on that committee much longer than I have, and I want to say in all candor that I have never known a more hard-working, conscientious, patriotic public servant than the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Applause.] Never on the floor of the House or in the committee, as far as I know, has he evinced any disposition or desire to do anything except that which has seemed to be for the best interests of the country. Now, he has studied this section of the bill. Other members of the committee have studied it. Just speaking for myself personally, not as chairman of the committee but as an individual member, it seems to me, as far as I have looked into it, and as far as I am able to say, looking at it in this way, looking at it as an emergency measure in war times, I do not see any harm in the amendment. It seems to me that in fewer words it provides ample power for the same purposes as section 2; but there are other members of the committee and other members of the House who may think otherwise. The section has been perfected in Committee of the Whole. Therefore I feel great hesitancy in saying right off the bat that I will accept it, because I am representing the committee rather than myself.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that one of the purposes of this bill is to enable the administration to finance the installation of extensions, as well as to install them.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. And that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts eliminates from subsection 2 of section 2 the power which was given in that section to finance these new installations.

Mr. WALSH. That is provided for in subsection 3.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. SIMS. I was under the impression that that power was contained in other sections of the bill. If it is not, of course the gentleman's criticism is a valid one.

Mr. ANDERSON. In the gentleman's time I should like to direct attention to this proposition: There are two different financial situations arising which it is desired to meet. One of them is where the operator of the power plant is unable to finance the installation. He is perfectly willing to put in the machinery and operate it himself, but he can not borrow the money upon the terms which will enable him to operate.

Mr. SIMS. That is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. This subsection 2 is intended to cover that situation, and it is intended that when it is covered, the amount shall be repaid to the Government under the terms which may be prescribed by the President. Now, the next subsection intends to take care of a situation where the Government actually installs——

Mr. SIMS. Let me state to the gentleman something that perhaps has not been called to his attention, that we have prepared an amendment as a substitute for section 3, and when I said it was provided for in another portion of the bill I had that in mind. The subsection proposed contains this provision:

(a) In equipping any private power plant or in expanding any such plant to such extent as he may direct, by making advances upon such terms as he may deem proper to the operator of such plant.

I read that the other day on the floor of the House. The gentleman may not have been present at the time. That is intended to follow, and if it does, it seems to me it cures the very matter that the gentleman has referred to in section 2.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think so, because two entirely different situations are intended to be dealt with in two entirely different ways. In the one case, which is intended to be dealt with under subsection 2, the owner of the plant is willing to assume any possible depreciation in the value of the property. All he wants is the money. If he gets his money he is willing to take his chances on the subsequent depreciation in value. Perhaps he gets enough profit so that he can afford to do it. Subsection 3 undertakes to provide for the depreciation of the plant. The two propositions are distinct and ought not to be dealt with on the same basis. The gentleman will remember that when he struck out "the then fair value" I had a great deal of doubt about it. I do not know just what the gentleman intended, but it seems to me the thing that he intends to do under the two sections are so different, and so substantive in themselves, that they ought to be dealt with separately and there ought to be no connection.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman thinks the subsection offered is not accomplishing the purpose as well as the original bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think so.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman's intention is to provide for the loaning of the money, and it provides for security while section 3 is to aid in equipment and at the same time provide for an amortization.

Mr. ANDERSON. To take up the depreciation that would result from the difference between the war prices and prices after the war.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can not get some agreement on this section for debate. I have not moved to close debate on a single paragraph. This is an important section and has been already considered two hours, but I think there should be reasonable time for debate. How much time does the gentleman from Minnesota want?

Mr. ANDERSON. Five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. And the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think I can say what I want to on this question in less than 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman from New Jersey want time?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not want to offer the gas and toluol amendment to this section although it is left out. I am going to suggest to the chairman that before we get through we shall return to the definition and get suitable language so that it will not be necessary to offer the amendment every time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate close upon this amendment in 15 minutes—5 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] and 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman from Minnesota will yield, I desire to ask him if he does not think that the provision for advancing the money, and the rate of interest, should come in subsection 3 and not in the section providing for the installation and leasing of appliances in the buildings of the structure. The purpose of the question is, Does not the gentleman think his amendment could be reformed and come in more harmoniously in subsection 3?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman will not get me to say that I am in entire accord with the structure of this subsection 2; but one thing I am desirous of seeing done, and that is to have a separation between the thing which was sought originally to be done under subsection 2 and the thing which is sought to be done under subsection 3.

Let me call attention to the proviso inserted at the end of subsection 3:

Provided, That the powers conferred by this subdivision shall be exercised only if the President shall deem that the emergency is such as to render it impracticable or undesirable to act with respect to such plant under any of the other powers conferred by this act.

I think that proviso ought to be in that subsection because that subsection contemplates a real financial loss to the Government in the transaction of this business. It contemplates that the Government will absorb the war wastage represented by the difference between the cost of installing the new appliances and extensions during the war period and the value of the extensions at the end of the war period. Obviously where a method of procedure involves the Government actually assuming a loss in value, which might otherwise be borne by the operator of the plant, that power ought not to be exercised unless there is no other way of reaching the proposition.

Now, then, subsection 2 contemplates that where an operator of a power plant is unable to borrow money to make the necessary extensions required by the greater market produced by the war the President may loan him the necessary funds. This may be done, of course, on such a basis of repayment and security as the President deems proper. That is a business transaction, and it does not contemplate any loss to the Government. It ought to be done in that way in every instance where it can be done in that way, but there are some occasions where the profits in the operation of the plant during the war period will not be sufficient to take up the wastage or depreciation which will result between the time of making of the loan when the property is installed and the end of the war period. In these cases it is necessary that the Government should assume the burden of the wastage. That is what is contemplated in section 3. But as I said before, that method ought not to be pursued if there is any other way. And subsection 3 contemplates that it shall not be done except where it is actually found that there is no other way to do it. Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is adopted it is my intention to offer an amendment which will permit the President to loan an operator of a power plant funds to be applied for purposes described in the bill upon such terms and security as he may deem proper. Because it is apparent to me that if you only leave the power in the hands of the President to act under subsection 3, you are inviting him to make contracts which you ought not to ask him to make, and which he would not make if you left him any other method which involved less loss.

Mr. SIMS. I do not have any purpose in moving to strike out the proviso on page 6, at the end of subsection 3.

Mr. ANDERSON. I know, but if the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is adopted it strikes out the power to loan money upon security and upon repayment, and then the only method you leave is the method prescribed in section 3, and if this is the only one provided, it is the only method the President can pursue.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, before entering upon the discussion of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I want to say I am delighted to see the large attendance upon the Democratic side in the discussion of this important bill. There are present one or two members of the committee and perhaps half a dozen others also.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With pleasure.

Mr. BLACK. Has the gentleman also made a count of the number on the Republican side?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have done so and discovered there are more.

Mr. BLANTON. Eight members.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the gentleman there are eight.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman does not count well.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Fifteen.

Mr. BLANTON. They are talking about politics over there in the corner.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, in reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It has at least the merit of clearness and directness. It is easy to tell what it means and I think it has great advantages over the paragraph for which it was intended as a substitute. Yet I have some doubt whether it ought to be adopted. There is one important provision—the only provision that really protects the Government at all—subsection 2, which is omitted in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. That is the provision that whenever any such structures, machinery, or appliances shall have been installed and until the sale or disposition thereof the title shall remain in the United States. There is always a question when machinery or other appliances are annexed to a freehold, whether they do not become part thereof. Although I have some doubt whether this principle will apply as against the Government, yet I think it is well to have it made clear as in the provision of subsection 2; and that is not done by the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts criticizes, and very properly criticizes, the last sentence of subsection 2 as being unnecessary, and he might have gone further and said it was simply absurd. This last sentence provides that the President shall be empowered to enter upon the premises and the President shall maintain and operate this machinery. Now, of course, the President is only the agent for the Government, for the United States. The President will not in person enter the premises. He can not himself operate it. The proper language and the legal phraseology that should have been used in that sentence was to refer to the United States in proper terms and say that the United States could take possession of it, and if the United States be authorized to take possession of it, the Government could do so through any of its agents and officers. That follows as a matter of law. As it stands it does not protect the Government at all for that reason. Further, it says that upon default in the payment of any such sum possession may be taken, but suppose there is no default in such payment, then there is no provision at all in this paragraph for taking possession of the property.

Yet when the lease is up the Government should have the power to take possession of the property.

At this point I want to call attention to an argument which was used Saturday by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER]—and I am sorry he is not here, because I think he did not fully understand his own bill. The gentleman from Missouri seemed to think, he and other gentlemen who argued yesterday, that the provision that the Government or the President might lease this property for a certain period determined the time when the Government must take it over and was for the protection of the Government. But if he examines that provision more closely he will be satisfied that instead of protecting the Government it protects the operator. It can be leased for a period not exceeding five years, but that does not help the Government in taking possession of the property when the lease expires. There seems to be no provision here whatever to protect the Government and enable it to take possession when the lease expires, and this whole discussion has gone upon the wrong theory because the bill had not been sufficiently considered in committee, so that the members of the committee themselves knew just exactly what it meant. Read this provision:

To lease the machinery, appliances, and structures thus installed, or any parts thereof, to the owner or operator of such plant for a period—

And so forth.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. Suppose that the operator at any time during the lease says to the Government, "here is your property, take it." The only remedy for that under this bill is either to operate it themselves or to take it out?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; there is no provision giving the Government any other alternative.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think that this provision should be a part of the lease or agreement rather than a part of the law authorizing the lease or agreement?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I agree with the gentleman there. I think it would be more difficult to put them in proper form in the bill, and if we undertook it we would be likely to so hedge about the powers of the President that a proper lease could not be made. Then, again, when we consider subsections 2 and 3 we find the two are overlapping and all should have been put in one subsection. I think every Member will agree to that. In fact, this bill is in the shape I have found every bill coming here from a department—in a form in which it ought to be rewritten from start to finish.

That is the only way to get such a bill in proper form. Now, these two sections, overlapping as they do, are necessarily confusing. It is hard to tell where one begins and the other stops, and it is hard to tell where one is limited or restricted by the other. I do not really think it is possible to adjust these two sections and bring them together so that they will probably correlate in any other way except as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] when he said the bill ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and there be rewritten and put in proper form. If this bill had been committed to some of the committees of this House—and I might say definitely the Ways and Means Committee—two-thirds of it would have been stricken out and the appropriation reduced accordingly. In fact, there is no necessity for using this money except in a few instances that might have been definitely named, so that the House would know what it was doing. Instead of that we have all of these blanket powers to manufacture briquets up in the southwest part of North Dakota, where there is no demand for a power plant and no use for it if constructed, and also to go into all sorts of experiments. All of these things ought to be out of the bill. There will be waste enough here, I will say to my colleague, even if we restrict it in every manner possible.

Why is this bill here, in the first instance? It is here, I take it, because these gentlemen went to the War Finance Corporation and did not get the money. The War Finance Corporation has ample authority to furnish the money for all these things that are provided for in this bill, if they have anything to do with the war. Of course, some of them have been admitted by gentlemen on the floor here as not to have anything to do with the war, but they wanted the money because they considered it to be a good thing for their respective communities to have it spent therein. I think, on the whole, the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SISSON). The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to strike out subsection (2) and insert.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 11.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(3) To aid in equipping any private power plant or in expanding any such plant to such extent as he may direct by making advances, upon such terms and conditions as he may determine, to the person operating or authorized to operate it, and in connection with such advances, to agree with such person that, if the actual reasonable cost of equipping or expanding such plant shall be in excess of its value at the termination of the war period, or at such later time not more than five years after the expiration of the war period, as he may deem reasonable for such valuation, and the machinery, structures, or appliances constituting such extension or expansion, or their equivalent, shall have been maintained and operated in accordance with his directions until such time, repayment of the whole or any part of such excess will be waived, and to provide by agreement for the manner of determining such costs and values by arbitration or otherwise and for the terms and time of such repayment: Provided, That the powers conferred by this subdivision shall be exercised only if the President shall deem that the emergency is such as to render it impracticable or undesirable to act with respect to such plant under any of the other powers conferred by this act.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment striking out all of subsection 3 except the proviso. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WALSH. Is this a committee amendment?

Mr. SIMS. The committee as a committee has not acted on it, but it has been submitted to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and other members of the committee, and we believe that it is an improvement on the bill as reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMS: Pages 5 and 6, strike out the subdivision and insert in its place:

"To aid in equipping any private power plant or in expanding any such plant to such extent as he may direct by making advances, upon such terms as he may deem proper, to the operator of such plants. Such terms may include an agreement that, if at the time provided therein, which shall not be later than five years after the expiration of the war period, it shall appear that the actual reasonable cost of equipping or of extending such plant exceeded a sum fixed in or to be ascertained by a method prescribed in such agreement, and if the machinery, structures, or appliances constituting such extension or expansion, or their equivalent, shall have been maintained and operated in accordance with his directions, repayment of the whole or in part of such excess will be waived. Such agreement may provide further for determining the amount of such excess by arbitration or otherwise."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, those who have examined it think, and I have consulted——

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman desire the proviso retained?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment as read says to strike out subsection 3.

Mr. SIMS. Strike out all of subsection 3 except the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has not made perfectly clear just exactly what he wants. I am told by the Clerk that you ask to strike out, as it is stated first, all of this subsection 3 down to the proviso.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; but not to strike out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The written amendment here does not make that statement. Now, the gentleman offers the motion to amend by striking out all of subsection 3 down to the proviso and substitute in lieu thereof what the Clerk has just read?

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely. That is what I stated all the time.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know in what special respect this changes the language that was stricken out?

Mr. SIMS. It changes it in this way: This is to provide for the contract provisions, and if you notice the section we have just adopted we struck out the words "at the then value" and added "the amount," so that it might be fixed in the contract. This amendment is put in here in the interest of the Government and for the purpose of protecting it.

Now, I will read an explanation of the substitute section I have offered in lieu of the provisions of the bill down to the proviso:

"As the bill was drawn the standard for determining the Government's loss was 'the then value' of the property. This requires that a valuation be made, with all the attendant difficulties and uncertainties. Probably no term is productive of greater divergency of opinion or is more difficult to apply.

"The adoption of this standard means double payment for depreciation, it once being collected from consumers through rates and paid a second time by the Government.

"The fundamental reason for the advance of funds by the Government is that 'war-time' prices are excessive, and it is this excess that should be measured in ordinary cases rather than a difference between cost and value.

"Concretely, if the then value is fixed as a standard, the Government will lose probably from 10 to 20 per cent more than it reasonably should and would if 'post-war' cost were adopted. Applying the minimum percentage, the loss caused by the then value would approximate $20,000,000.

"While it will be admitted that the fair standard in normal cases is normal reproduction cost instead of the then value, neither standard will be fair both to the Government and to the company in all cases. There will be instances where the Government must pay the cost of building an extension, because the extension will not be needed by the company after the war. Its then value to the company will be a small part of its cost, although it may have been in use only a short time. Consequently, the then value standard would not be fair to the Government, because the property might have a greater value in a sale to others or for governmental use; but the Government could not take advantage of either alternative if the company had the right to purchase it at its value to the company. The reproduction-cost standard would not be fair to the company, because the property would not be worth such an amount to the company that had no use for it.

"Those who have worked upon the drafting of the bill and have negotiated contracts of the same character as those that will come before the President under this bill are of the opinion that in order to deal fairly with all situations it is necessary to leave to the contract the method of determination and the principles to be followed in each case. The contract can specifically provide what shall be done in each case, and thus make the standard definite and justly applicable to the conditions which exist. Further, such a plan will, in many instances, make unnecessary any valuation, which will save expense both to the Government and to the companies in reaching an adjustment.

I. TYPICAL CASE.

"(1) Facts assumed:

"(a) Required electrical apparatus to cost $5,000,000.

"(b) Government to provide or pay for 40 per cent, or $2,000,000.

"(c) Time of settlement to be four years after end of war. (Bill allows five years.)

"(d) Normal reproduction cost then of property represented by advance, 75 per cent of cost.

"(e) Property to depreciate at the rate of 3 per cent per annum.

"(2) Results under plan that Government will bear loss or difference between actual cost and normal reproduction cost at time of settlement:

Cost		$2,000,000
Normal reproduction cost (75 per cent)		1,500,000
Loss to Government		500,000
Government's investment		2,000,000
Amount returned to Government		1,500,000

"(3) Results under plan that Government will bear loss or difference between actual cost and the then value at time of settlement:

Cost		$2,000,000
Normal reproduction cost	$1,500,000
Depreciation—3 per cent × four years=12 per cent	240,000
		1,260,000
Loss to Government		724,000
Government's investment		2,000,000
Amount returned to Government		1,260,000

"(4) Difference between plans:

(a) Loss on basis of normal reproduction cost	$500,000
(b) Loss on basis of then value	740,000
Excess of (b) over (a)	240,000

"Percentage of excess to Government's investment, 12 per cent.

(NOTE.—If the war were to last four years, the excess would be 24 per cent of Government's investment.)

"(5) If the Government were to assume loss upon all facilities or upon the entire cost instead of upon 40 per cent, as above, the results would be—

"(a) Under plan that Government will bear loss or difference between actual cost and the normal reproduction cost at time of settlement:

Cost	$5,000,000
Normal reproduction cost (75 per cent)	3,750,000
Loss to Government	1,250,000
Government's investment	2,000,000
Amount returned to Government	750,000

"(b) Under plan that Government will bear loss or difference between actual cost and the then value at the time of settlement:

Cost		$5,000,000
Normal reproduction cost	$3,750,000
Depreciation, 3 per cent×4 years=12 per cent	600,000
		3,150,000
Loss to Government		1,850,000
Government's investment		2,000,000
Amount returned to Government		150,000

"(c) Difference between plans:

(A) Loss on basis of normal reproduction cost	1,250,000
(B) Loss on basis of then value	1,850,000
Excess of (B) over (A)	600,000

"Percentage of excess to Government's investment, 30 per cent.

II. EXCEPTIONAL CASE.

"(1) Facts assumed:

"(a) Additional electrical apparatus to cost $500,000.

"(b) Government to provide all or pay for all, because apparatus would not be needed after the war.

"(c) Time of settlement, two years hence. (Bill allows five years.)

"(d) Normal reproduction cost then of property, 80 per cent.

"(e) Property to depreciate to a value of 20 per cent, because company would have no use for it.

"(2) Results under plan that Government will bear loss or difference between actual cost and normal reproduction cost at time of settlement:

Cost	$500,000
Normal reproduction cost (80 per cent)	400,000
Loss to Government	100,000

"(3) Results under plan that Government will bear loss or difference between actual cost and the then value at time of settlement:

Cost	$500,000
Value (20 per cent)	100,000
Loss to Government	400,000

"(4) Difference between plans:

(a) Loss on basis of normal production cost	100,000
(b) Loss on basis of value	400,000
Excess of (b) over (a)	300,000

"(NOTE.—Neither plan is fair both to the Government and to the company under the facts assumed. The value standard is not fair to the Government, because the property might have a greater value in a sale to others than to the company, which has no use for it. The reproduction cost standard is not fair to the company, because the property would not have such a value to a company that had no use for it.)"

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the gentleman from Tennessee may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Now, that was prepared, after considering the bill, by the gentlemen who suggested these amendments—those who have been sponsors for the bill—and a concrete case is stated here by calculation to show the difference in the effect it will have on the contract provided for. The object of this amendment, the substitute for all of subsection 3 except the proviso, is to make it fair both to the party who may borrow or whose property may be improved by the Government, and also to the Government, providing that the contract for making the improvement shall specify the conditions of settlement. The term "then value" was such as to bring on endless trouble and confusion after the war period and the lease period had expired. I submitted it to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who had a whole day and a night or two to study it, and he, like myself, thinks it an improvement on the section as written, and is worthy of our best consideration before deciding to reject it.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, if the gentleman from Tennessee is through——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a parliamentary question. Will the substitute be subject to amendment before it is adopted or after it is adopted? I would like to change the "five years" to "one year," and I would like to give my reasons for it. I do not want to argue the adoption of this substitute. It seems to be in good form, however. I may want to add something about gas plants. May I make the motion after its adoption? If so, I move, before it goes further, that "five years" be changed to "one year."

Mr. SIMS. In what part of the amendment?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I can not tell in what part of it it is. You have got "five years" in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey to the substitute amendment offered by Mr. SIMS: "Strike out 'five' and insert in lieu thereof 'one.'"

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the House what under the sun the Government will do during the five years, if they make an agreement according to this clause? The proposition is that the United States agrees to aid and equip existing plants by advances.

Suppose a big plant, and that it is aided and is equipped by advances from the United States. Now, then, there is an agreement with the party that if the cost of equipping—and that is the amount spent by the United States—shall be in excess of its value, or whatever the amount is in excess of what the real amount given to the party is found to be five years after the war is ended, then the man shall pay less. He does not pay anything until then; and all he is asked to do, if the language of the bill is maintained in that amendment—and I do not know whether it is or not, because it was read hastily—is that during the five years the plant shall be maintained and operated in accordance with the President's direction. I believe that is in the amendment. Thereupon, after the war is over, after the demand for this power stops, the Government says to the man maintaining this and operating this property, "If you have got anything to do, or even if you have nothing, we will wait for five years, and then we will have a valuation and see what you shall pay." In the meantime the owner got the benefit of this equipment, and he got the benefit of the work he had done during the war. He has got the benefit of the plant, and all he has to do is to say he has no work afterwards and let it lie.

In such case the Government does not get a single cent until five years after the war. These matters ought all to be settled soon after the war. The war period ends six months after the declaration of the treaty of peace.

The declaration of the treaty of peace, if there is much negotiation about the reconstruction of the Balkans and Baltic Provinces, will be a year after the war, and it will be six years and six months after the war before anything will be done if an agreement for five years is made with these parties. In the meantime the man has all of this equipment in his factory. I do not believe, with the witnesses before the committee, that it ought to be five years, for the reason they give, that after the war there would probably be a slump and then a revival, and that the United States would get the benefit of that revival.

What business has the United States to speculate on what will take place after the war? We know that after the Civil War, with inflation not half as great as it is now, and business not half as great as it is now, business continued with great momentum, and it was not until 1870 that we had a slump, and after that property would bring nothing.

Let us settle up our affairs as soon after the war as possible. I moved to substitute one year instead of five before, but the House did not see fit to stand by me in that. I insist that neither the President nor anyone else should postpone the right of the United States to get back its money for five years after the close of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I want to talk upon the gentleman's amendment or not.

Mr. SIMS. This is only an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I ask for a division on that.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 14.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOUSTON). The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 5, line 23, after the word "plant," strike out the word "or" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "including plants in connection therewith for the production of gas, coke, toluol, benzol, coal-tar products, and any other useful products that may be produced through or in connection with the coking of coal or carbonizing of lignite, or through or in connection with the combustion of any fuel; or."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to lengthen this bill by inserting these words every time a power plant is mentioned, and I ask the chairman of the committee whether he does not consider it worth while to recur to page 1, line 8, after the words "mechanical power," and to insert the words of my amendment, and then strike out all these other amendments where they come afterwards, so that we will not have to add them in four or five places again?

Mr. SIMS. This section provides for the equipping of private power plants, and nearly all the things referred to by the gentleman from New Jersey are by-products, for which plants are not established in the first instance.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There are private power plants and gas works that may want to be enlarged and equipped in just the same way. You have to give the power to the President——

Mr. SIMS. When you establish a gas plant you establish it for the manufacture of gas and not for the manufacture of by-products, and when you establish a coking plant you establish it for the manufacture of coke and not for the manufacture of by-products. This amendment would give the President the power to loan money to aid in establishing plants for the manufacture of by-products only.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; to equip plants which manufacture by-products in connection with the other products. I think if it was put in the definition in the beginning you could omit it afterwards. It cumbers the bill to have these many amendments, and I submit to the gentleman that if we put it in the definition it will relieve the bill from complications. If this amendment is inserted after the words "mechanical power," in line 8, page 1, I will offer no more amendments on this subject and will be content that all the amendments which I have offered on this subject shall be stricken out.

Mr. SIMS. The purpose of this section is to give the President the power to aid in the equipping of private power plants and in the extending of such plants.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If these power plants produce these by-products, you want to enlarge that production, too?

Mr. SIMS. This says a plant, but it does not provide what the plant shall manufacture or what it shall produce. I know the gentleman's purpose is all right, but it does not seem to me that it is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment offered as a substitute by the committee is better than the original draft of the bill; but the explanation made by those who drafted the substitute seems to leave the question in doubt as to whether or not a piece of property that may be enlarged by the Government would not be confiscated by the Government at the end of the period of the war. For example, the Government is authorized under this act, if it becomes an act, to enter upon the premises of a power-plant company, to increase the size of the plant, and the explanation here indicates that if the Government can not reach a satisfactory settlement of the amount to be returned by the owner of the plant at the end of the war, the Government shall then have the right to sell a man's property to some outsider. It does not seem fair that the Government, which needs this additional power and hence is anxious to advance the money to enlarge the plant, and which enters upon private property for that purpose, should be permitted to sell that part of the property on which it enters for the purpose of enlarging the plant, to some one beside the owner of the plant. While I am not at all clear that the amendment would carry that conclusion, the explanation of the man who wrote the amendment clearly indicates that that is what would happen.

Mr. SIMS. Let me say to the gentleman that the substitute simply provides that the method of settlement and payment shall be made a part of the contract at the beginning.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, I know; and, of course, I think that is a wise provision; but the man who wrote the provision, and who suggested that a contract should be entered into, stipulating the conditions upon which the money shall be advanced, wrote an explanation as to what the amendment means, and I am going to try to explain what that explanation means.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it not simply a case of a man having assigned a faulty reason for a good provision, like the case of a court that renders a proper decision, but puts it on the wrong ground?

Mr. MADDEN. It is just as well to call attention to it, even though it is a faulty reason for a good case. I am not a lawyer, but I once heard of a young lawyer who lost his case in the court below because he assumed that the court knew about the law. When he appealed to the Supreme Court he went into a very elaborate explanation of the law, and the court interrupted him and said, "You must give this court credit for having some knowledge of the law." The young lawyer replied, "Your honor, that is the mistake I made in the court below, which lost me the case there, and I am not taking any chances now." [Laughter.] The man who wrote this explanation says:

Consequently the then value standard would not be fair to the Government, because the property might have a greater value in a sale to others or for Government use, but the Government could not take advantage of either alternative if the company had the right to purchase it at its value to the company.

Now, the point I am trying to impress on this vast audience is that it is not fair for the Government to enter upon the premises of a private concern for the purpose of enlarging its plant, which the person who owns the plant may not want enlarged, but the Government does, and then at the end of the war say to the man, "Because this plant is not worth anything to you it must be worth something to somebody else, and so we will just confiscate part of your property and sell it to some man who may want to go into competition with you." I do not think the Government wants to do that.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Would it not be equally unfair to the Government for the man who has it in his plant to say, "You have got to let me have it at such a price and figure, because you can not sell it to anybody else, and therefore you are helpless"? Now, is not this proposition a proper one, to fix in the contract itself the method of arriving at what the value shall be?

